"That notwithstanding the judicial decision of this court and of the Department of State made by two predecessors of the said Bayard in the said office of Secretary of State, the said defendant arbitrarily refuses to perform the duty imposed upon him by law, and to pay to this relator the said sums of money due and apportioned to him."

This constitutes unquestionably a statement of a clear legal right. If he is the assignee, and the money is in the custody of the Department, and by the statute the Secretary is directed to pay it over, after it has been set apart for the assignee, then undoubtedly the petitioner has the right to demand its payment.

The case is heard here upon the agreement of the litigants that the answer of the Secretary is, in all respects, to be considered as though it were a return to an alternative mandamus already issued; and the court has considered the case throughout according to the terms of this stipulation.

The reply to the allegations of the petition is thus stated in the return:

"This respondent, answering, saith that true it is that awards were made by the commission established by the Treaty between the United States and Mexico on the 4th day of July, 1868, for the amounts and in favor of the parties named in the said petition; and this respondent is advised that the said relator, Stephen V. White, doth claim an interest in the one half of each of said awards; and this respondent doth admit that the rights and interests claimed by the said White, as aforesaid, were recognized by one, although not recognized by another, of the predecessors of this respondent, and payments made to him accordingly. But this respondent saith that he finds it impossible as the matter now stands, to recognize claims and pretensions of the said White to the moieties of the said awards, without ignoring the conflicting claims and pretensions of a certain Richard H. Porter, between whom and the said White litigation in respect to the said award is now, and for a long time has been, pending.

"And this respondent further saith that he hath always been and is now willing to pay whatever sum or sums may be due on the said moieties out of moneys received under the said Treaty from the Republic of Mexico, on an order and acquittance signed by all the rival claimants of the said moieties; which your respondent respectfully submits is as much as could be done by him without embroiling the United States in a litigation in which it has no interest whatever."

Is this such a return to the supposal of the petition as would disentitle the plaintiff to the writ?

The well settled rules of the common law on the subject of mandamus have not been modified by statute in this jurisdiction.

In Harwood v. Marshall, 10 Md. 463, the court states with much fullness the principles by which the sufficiency of a return should be tested, and that case affords so clear an illustration of the manner in which we should examine that before us that we shall quote from it at length. The facts of that case were these: The Maryland Legislature had elected Marshall state librarian, and the incumbent Harwood refused to give up the office. Marshall applied for a mandamus to compel its surrender; and the court below ordered a peremptory writ. In the court of appeals it was insisted that the court below erred in ordering the mandamus because the return sufficiently denied the statement of fact upon which the petitioner relied as the ground of his right. The appellate court says:

"In this State, the proceedings in mandamus in such a case as the one before us are governed entirely by the rules and principles of the common law. The office in question is a public office, and not within the provisions of the Statute of 9 Anne, chap. 20, nor of the Act of Assembly of 1828, chap. 78.

"If the return state upon its face, with precision and certainty, facts which are sufficient in law to justify the court in refusing the writ, the facts alleged are not traversable; and whether they be true or false, the return is conclusive, and the writ is denied. The only remedy, if the facts alleged in the return be untrue, is by action on the case for a false return. 1 Harr. & J. 557.

"Such is the ancient and well settled principle of the common law governing this case, and remaining to this day unaltered by any statutory enactment in Maryland.

"In the excellent treatise of Tapping on Mandamus, p. 353, it is said: 'The averments of the return must be certain. The certainty required by the common law is, by some of the cases, stated to have been certainty to every intent, and therefore greater certainty than is requisite to a plea. Other cases have decided that the certainty or strictness which prevailed at common law was the same as that which governed estoppels, indictments or returns to writs of habeas corpus, and as to them it is laid down that nothing is to be taken or construed by intendment or inference, so that all material facts should be positively and distinctly alleged.' * * *

"If the return deny the supposal of the writ, the traverse must be single, direct and certain. The rule being that every distinct and material allegation contained in the writ must, if it be intended to contradict them, be traversed.

"The question in considering the sufficiency of a return by way of traverse must be whether, if the supposal of the writ be true and sufficiently averred, an action for a false return can be certainly maintained against the defendant; or, in other words, if the facts averred in their return, strictly construed as stated, may be true consistently with the truth of the suggestion of the writ, then the return is vicious.

"Let us apply these rules to the case before us: The facts stated in the writ are, that the petitioner 'hath taken and subscribed the oaths of office, as prescribed by the Constitution and laws for the state librarian.'

"The traverse in the return is as follows: 'This respondent knows nothing of the qualification of the said Marshall, to the said office of state librarian, saving and excepting from the pretenses of the said Marshal as set forth by him in these proceedings, and saving and excepting also, that, from an inspection of the books in the office of the Governor of the State, it appears, and this respondent so avers the fact to be, that the said Marshall did not take and subscribe the oaths of office, required by the Constitution and laws to be taken and subscribed by him before the Governor of the State, in manner and form as directed by the Constitution and laws.'

"This is not a good traverse. First, it is evasive, in not denying in direct terms, on the solemn oath of the respondent, the fact alleged in the writ; expressly disclaiming all knowledge of the fact, except from what is alleged, and from what appears from an inspection of the books in the office of the Governor, the averment amounts to no more than an allegation of a fact derived from the inspection of the books; or if this be not the true construction, the averment is at least ambiguous in its terms, the words, 'and this respondent so avers the fact to be,' are susceptible of being construed to refer either to the qualification itself, or to what appears from the books of the Governor; and in this view it is bad as wanting the requisite certainty. If the defendant were sued for a false return, the latter construction might be insisted on, with great force, in defense of the action."

And as the court held that those denials were not sufficient to break the force of the averments in the petition, which were therefore to be taken as established, they ordered the peremptory writ to issue.

Tested by this reasoning, it is perfectly plain that the answer in the present case is entirely insufficient. It would be faulty even as an answer in chancery, or in any ordinary legal proceeding, since it does not meet distinctly several of the material averments of the petition. It does not deny that the relator is the assignee, although it admits that he claims an interest in one half of the fund. The nearest approach to a denial of White's right as assignee is the statement that the respondent finds it impossible to recognize White's claims without ignoring the conflicting pretensions of Porter, between whom and the said White it avers that litigation in respect to the award is, and for a long time has been, pending.

Litigation in what way? It is not averred that Porter claims as assignee; for all that appears in the return he may claim only as a creditor of White or of the original assignors. It does not deny that White's claims as assignee have been adjudicated by this court, in cases decided upon hearings in which some of the justices who unite in this judgment participated. Nor does it allege in any way that there has been an appeal from those adjudications, or that a supersedeas has been obtained to tie the hands of White and prevent him from claiming his money at once. The reference to Porter's "claims and pretensions" cannot be considered as equivalent to a denial that White is the assignee, or that anyone else claims to be such assignee.

The answer does not deny that the particular sums have been set apart in the department to be paid upon the moieties assigned to White; or that the department had already paid him the dividends from the nine previous installments received from Mexico by the Secretary of State. At the best, each of the denials or averments is vague and uncertain. If an action were brought against the Secretary as for a false return in respect to these several statements in the answer, how could it be successfully contended that the answer denied the material supposals of the petition with such certainty as to sustain the action, when it is quite clear that it has not denied either of them with the directness, singleness and certainty required by the law of mandamus?

We are clearly of the opinion that as the answer does not deny with proper certainty the material averments of the petition, they must therefore stand as established, and as presenting a clear legal right to the money claimed.

8. The next inquiry is whether the function to be exercised by the Secretary is a ministerial duty. That would seem to be plain enough. The first section of the Statute of June 18, 1878, authorizes and requires the Secretary of State to receive and distribute in ratable proportions, to the claimants or their legal representatives or assigns, each of the installments which shall have been paid by the Mexican Republic.

This section of the statute was before this court in the case of U. S., Key, v. Frelinghuysen, 2 Mackey, 301.

That was an application for a mandamus against Secretary Frelinghuysen, to require him to pay over a part of an award which had been made in what was known as "The Weil claim" arising under this commission, but which the fifth section of the Act authorizes the President to withhold, if he should see fit, under certain circumstances. This court first speaks of the claims in general, which were not excepted in section 5, and says:

"If the Act had stopped here, there would have been a plain ministerial duty created by it, for the benefit of the parties in whose favor the awards were made, admitting of no exercise of discretion, and proper to be enforced by mandamus if its performance was refused."

The Act did stop there, so far as the present case is concerned, for this is not one of the cases excepted by section 5. But the particular case under consideration in 2 Mackey was one of two claims named in that section, which Congress thereby requested the President to investigate, and authorized him, in case he should be of the opinion that the charges of fraud presented as to those claims were well founded, or that other considerations therein referred to rendered it proper, in his opinion, that the case should be retried, to withhold payment of the awards.

The obvious design of this exception in the fifth section was to vary the general rule which applied to all claims not therein named; and as to those two claims, to confer upon the President a discretion which he was not to possess with reference to the claims not so excepted; otherwise, the provision in the fifth section would not have been necessary.

Although the supreme court held that the discretionary power created by section 5 still continued, it said nothing inconsistent with the declaration of this court as to the nature of the duty devolved upon the Secretary of State, with respect to the claims in general. It, therefore, remains as a valid decision of this court that (except as to the Weil and La Abra claims) the payment of the money by the Secretary of State, to the claimants and their assigns, under these awards was purely a ministerial duty, and such as this court could enforce by mandamus.

4. Only one point remains. Has this claimant any other reasonable or attainable remedy? Plainly not. This is his only mode of obtaining his money, and if relief is denied him here he would be indeed remediless in the premises, and that deplorable result would ensue which Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, declared would expose to obloquy our system of jurisprudence—that a suitor with a plain right to redress should be powerless to obtain it from the courts, because his rights are withheld by a powerful officer of a Government created for his protection.

We think it is our plain duty to direct that a peremptory mandamus shall issue, as prayed; and it is so ordered.

Powell M. BRADLEY,
v.
William M. GALT and Robert C. Hewett.

Where there is a traverse of a plea and on the trial the jury, under instructions, finds for the plaintiff, the appellate court, if it finds that the plaintiff was not entitled under the evidence to recover, can only set aside the judgment and remand the case for a new trial; it cannot render a final judgment for the defendant, for that would be to decide the issue of fact raised by the plea and traverse (overruling upon this point Benham v. Vernon, 3 Cent. Rep. 276, 5 Mackey, 18).

THE opinion of the court having been delivered remanding this case for a new trial (5 Cent. Rep. 435), counsel for plaintiff, with a view to carrying the case at once to the Supreme Court of the United States upon the question of law raised as to the sufficiency of the bond sued upon, informally suggested to the court that instead of sending the case back for a new trial a final judgment be entered for the defendant and thereby prevent the delay which must necessarily ensue before the vital question in the case, i. e.: the validity of the bond in suit, could be passed upon by the supreme court. The court having thereupon expressed a doubt as to its power to enter such a judgment, in the then state of the record, the point was argued by

Messrs. W. D. Davidge and A. C. Bradley, in support of the jurisdiction, and—

Messrs. W. F. Mattingly and Nathl. Wilson, contra.

Mr. Justice Cox delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case which was decided by us a few days ago a question has been raised as to the judgment which shall be entered; that is to say, since we have held that the plaintiff is not entitled under the evidence to recover, shall we enter judgment finally for the defendant or send the case back for a new trial?

Upon examining the record in that case we find that first there was a declaration, and then a plea, setting forth the facts which were the foundation of the court's opinion here, reversing the judgment below. That is, it set forth the fact that before the bond sued upon was given, another supersedeas bond had already been taken, and the judge had become functus officio and had no power to take a new bond.

If that had been demurred to, our course would have been plain sailing. We should have seen on the record what would justify us in entering final judgment. But unfortunately, the facts set forth in this plea were traversed by the defendant. The case went to trial, and under the instruction of the court the jury found a verdict for the complainant.

Now we set aside the judgment below. We cannot render judgment for defendant, without setting aside the verdict. In order to do anything, we must set aside that verdict first, and then we find simply an issue of fact; and in order to render a judgment for the defendant we must first decide the issue of fact in favor of the defendant. That it is not competent for an appellate court to do, and therefore we think we are entirely powerless to enter final judgment for the defendant.

Several cases have been cited to us in which it is supposed that the rule is different; for instance, the case of New Orleans Ins. Asso. v. Piaggio, 16 Wall. 378 [83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 358]. There the declaration claimed—it was a suit on a policy of insurance—first for loss of the vessel, then for loss of the freight, and then, as a separate item, $5,000 damages, for injury done to the credit of the complainant. The jury found not exactly a special verdict, but something very much like one, in which they allowed several items; so much for the vessel, so much for the freight, and $5,000 damages in addition, and a judgment was entered in conformity with the verdict.

The court was satisfied that the judgment and verdict were wrong, as far as the amount allowed for damages was concerned. Mr. Justice Clifford said that this particular error appeared on the face of the record, because the writ of error brought up the verdict and judgment in which it appeared that it was not necessary to issue a venire de novo in that case, but that, on the general authority given to the court to correct or modify the judgment below, the court could correct that judgment by striking out the $5,000 for damages, which they did. They did not set aside the verdict at all, but directed the court to enter judgment for the two items exclusive of the $5,000 damages.

The same remark will apply in the case of Barnes v. District of Columbia. [See 91 U. S. 540, bk. 23, L. ed. 440]. There this court had in the first instance ordered the case to be sent back for a new trial, but on reconsideration ordered a verdict for the defendant. But that was on an error on the face of the record. The question there was whether this District was liable for injuries received on the public highways which were under control of the board of public works, that is to say, officers not appointed by the District authorities. That question appeared in the very declaration, and the court had nothing to do but say "On the very face of the pleadings the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and we have to render judgment for the defendant." So that these cases are not precedents for the form of relief suggested in the present case.

There is, however, a third case directly in point, that of Benham v. Vernon, 5 Mackey, 18, 3 Cent. Rep. 276. There an action was brought for damages for false arrest against several parties and the court was satisfied on the evidence shown in the bill of exceptions, that there was no case against some of them, but that there was a sufficient evidence to go to the jury in regard to others. And the court did direct a final judgment to be entered in favor of some of the defendants upon reversing the judgment below and let the case go back for a new trial as to the others. There was no question made by counsel as to the form of the judgment. If the counsel for the plaintiff had objected to this form of judgment and stated that a new case might be made upon a further trial, we should have hesitated about it. We did feel some hesitation as it was, but the matter was not discussed or considered. We are satisfied that it was erroneous practice and we do not feel bound by that as a precedent.

Therefore, we can do nothing in this case but send it back for a new trial.

1. 3. The gift of the produce of a fund is a gift of the fund itself, unless there be words of qualification restraining the extent and duration of the interest therein.
4. So a bequest of personalty without words of limitation passes an absolute estate in the thing bequeathed, unless the contrary intention is plainly expressed or necessarily implied.
5. A testator bequeathed separate legacies to each of his three daughters, with directions to the trustees to invest and apply the interest to the use of said daughters, and in case of the marriage of any of them, to hold her share in trust for the maintenance of her and her husband, and the survivors of them, for life, then in trust for such issue as she might leave at the time of her death; failing such issue, in trust for the surviving daughters, and the issue of any deceased daughter. One of the daughters died unmarried. Held, that not having married, she died possessed of an absolute estate in the legacy bequeathed by her father, and that her testamentary disposition of it was valid.

APPEAL from a decree in equity, upon a bill of interpleader to obtain the construction of a will. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wm. Pinckney Whyte, for Virginia T. Lewis, legatee:

The intention of a testator is to be collected from the words of the will, and the whole of the will is to be considered and compared; and such construction should be made as will gratify every part of the will, if it can be done consistently with the general intent.

Bowley v. Lammont, 3 Harr. & J. 4; Dougherty v. Monett, 5 Gill & J. 459.

In the construction of a will, the intention expressed by the testator, to be collected from the whole instrument, if consistent with the rules of law, and there be apt words to express that intention, shall prevail.

All parts of a will are to be construed in relation to each other, and so as to form one consistent whole, if possible.

Chamberlain v. Owings, 30 Md. 454.

The general rule is that any words showing the intention of the testator to dispose of his whole interest in the thing devised will have the same effect as a devise to one in fee simple or forever.

A devise over of personal property must be done by express words or necessary implication.

Evans v. Iglehart, 6 Gill & J. 185; Cassilly v. Meyer, 4 Md. 10.

In bequests of personal property, without words of perpetuity, the legatee does not take a mere life estate, which can be enlarged by subsequent limitation, but an absolute estate, which is incapable of enlargement.

Edelen v. Middleton, 9 Gill, 161.

"A restriction on absolute ownership may be rejected as repugnant to the nature and incidents of the estate on which it is engrafted, unless there be a valid limitation over, upon the occurrence of some designated event."

1 Jarm. Wills, 257, 784.

Where there is a trust, however, and a manifest intention to modify the mode of enjoyment, the court will strive to maintain the intent. I do not think that the testator intended to give a life estate to these legatees.

There is no disposition made of the fund after the death of the legatees, if they remained single. The gift is couched in as broad and unlimited terms as possible; and then follows the direction as to investment, which implies that the property shall remain in the hands of the executors, and the donees shall only receive the income. But it is well settled that a gift of income or produce of a fund unaccompanied by words limiting the duration of the benefaction, confers an absolute estate.

Elton v. Shephard, 1 Bro. Ch. 532; Philipps v. Chamberlaine, 4 Ves. 53; Rawlins v. Jennings, 13 Ves. 39; Adamson v. Armitage, 19 Ves. 416; Str-tch v. Watkins, 1 Madd. 253; Clough v. Wynne, 2 Madd. 188; 4 Bradf. (N.Y.) 341.

This being a general devise of the whole residue of his estate without any words of limitation or perpetuity, devisees will take the entire and absolute interest of the testator, unless it shall appear that the testator intended otherwise.

There is no devise over of this property, and it is not presumed that the testator intended to die intestate of this portion of his estate.

The will must clearly manifest an intention to pass only a life estate before his children can be deprived of the fee.

It being clear that there is no limitation over as to the fortune of the unmarried daughter, Virginia Tayloe, she had power absolutely to leave it to her niece by will.

Mr. Henry Wise Garnett, also for Virginia T. Lewis, legatee:

A gift of personal estate without words of limitation is sufficient to pass the absolute interest; and a bequest of the income or annual produce of a fund is equivalent to a gift of the principal.

Hawk. Wills, p. 123.

A gift of personalty to trustees to pay the interest to "A" is an absolute gift of the principal.

Elton v. Shephard, 1 Bro. Ch. 532.

A bequest of stock to trustees, upon trust to pay the dividends from time to time to a married woman (for her separate use) is an unlimited gift of the dividends, and consequently passes the capital.

Haig v. Swiney, 1 Sim. & Stu. 487.

An indefinite bequest of the dividends gives the absolute property of stock.

Page v. Leapingwell, 18 Ves. 463.

A bequest of a fund to a woman, with the interest thereon to be vested in trustees, the income arising therefrom to be for her sole use and benefit, vests the capital for her separate use.

Adamson v. Armitage, 19 Ves. 416.

A gift of the interest of the capital sum of £1,000, to a wife, for her sole use and benefit, free from debts or control of any husband, held absolute gift of capital.

Humphrey v. Humphrey, 1 Sim. N. S. 536.

By a devise of the rents the land itself would pass, unless a contrary intention appeared.

Kerry v. Derrick, Cro. Jac. 104.

A devise of the rents of an estate is held to pass the fee.

2 Redf. Wills, 2d ed. 329.

The gift of the produce of a fund without limit as to time is a gift of the fund; and the interest of each of the legatees is vested and assignable.

Manning v. Craig, 3 Green, Ch. 436.

A bequest of the interest or produce of a fund, without limitation as to the extent of its duration, is a bequest of the fund itself.

Garret v. Rex, 6 Watts, 14; App. of Pa. Co. for Ins. on lives, 83 Pa. 312; Millard's Appeal, 87 Pa. 457.

An unconditional bequest of the dividends of the stock is a bequest of the stocks themselves.

Collier v. Collier, 3 Ohio St. 369.

When the "interest" or "produce" of a fund is bequeathed to a legatee, or in trust for him, without any limitation as to continuance, the principal will be regarded as bequeathed also.

Craft v. Snook, 13 N. J. Eq. 121; Gulick v. Gulick, 27 N. J. Eq. 498.

Where proceeds of sale are directed to be invested by executors and interest paid to A, B, and C equally, and the survivors of them, without limitation of time, and the will is silent as to further disposition of principal—held, to be a bequest of principal as well as interest.

Earl v. Grim, 1 Johns. Ch. 494.

A legacy to a trustee, of certain sums for use of B, and to be used for support and maintenance and no limitation over, is a bequest of an absolute interest to B.

McMichael v. Hunt, 83 N. C. 344.

A testator gave to A and B "$1,000 each, the interest to be paid to them annually by my executor, who is to be their trustee in this bequest;" held, that the bequest was of $1,000 absolutely, and not merely the interest on that sum.

Sproul's App. 105 Pa. 438.

In the construction of wills the law, in doubtful cases, leans in favor of an absolute rather than a defeasible estate; of a vested rather than a contingent one; of the primary rather than the secondary intent; of the first rather than the second taker, as the principal object of the testator's bounty, and of a distribution as nearly conformed to the general rules of inheritance as possible.

Smith's App. 23 Pa. 9; Sheriff v. Brown, 3 Cent. Law Rep. 772.

Where the devise over is made dependent upon the devisee dying before he comes of age, or without issue, or any similar event, it is considered that the devise is equivalent to a provision that the first donee shall take an immediate vested interest, liable to be defeated by the happening of the contingency named, or, if it do not happen, the estate then to become absolute and indefeasible.

2 Redf. Wills, 2d ed. 325, and cases there cited.

Mr. Leigh Robinson, contra:

It does not have to be argued that if a testator gives an absolute interest in lands or personalty and afterwards shows that he means the donee to take a less estate, the prior gift will be so restricted.

Sheet's Est. 52 Pa. 257; 3 Greenl. Cruise, 343.

As where the devisees or legatees are deprived of the right of alienation, or the property is directed to remain free for their children or heirs, and they are to have the use or income only for life.

Urich's App. 86 Pa. 386; Terry v. Wiggins, 47 N. Y. 512; Bell v. Warn, 4 Hun, 406; Collier v. Grimesey, 36 Ohio St. 22; Baxter v. Bowyer, 19 Ohio St. 490; Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 76 (31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 325).

The limitation in remainder shows that in the opinion of the testator the previous words had only given an estate for life. Id.

If expressions be used which show with sufficient certainty that a qualified gift was intended, a court of equity will look to the clear intention of the testator, and raise a constructive trust, where none has been declared.

Lucas v. Lockhart, 10 Smedes & M. 466.

Thus, where property was bequeathed in trust for the testator's daughter "and her heirs born and to be born," held, that the bequest vested in the daughter a life estate in the property with remainder to her children whenever born.

Woodruff v. Woodruff, 32 Ga. 361.

In the case under consideration, the legal estate is from the beginning vested in trustees to pay over to each daughter the interest as it may accrue and for the security of the other trusts confided, as the same or any of them might arise. It is quite true that a bequest of personalty, without words of limitation, passes an absolute estate. It is equally true that a bequest of personal property to a trustee, without words of limitation, vests in him the whole estate subject to the trust.

It is very singular, if the provisions of the paragraph in controversy were only intended to protect the property of these daughters from husbands in futuro, that similar provisions were wholly omitted from the paragraphs which made provision for daughters who had husbands in esse.

See Bacon's App. 57 Pa. 512; Davis' App. 100 Pa. 205.

The creation of a trust, the direction to pay over income, and the gift of the remainder after the death of the cestui que trust, control the general words of gift, and are inconsistent with absolute bequests.

Barrus v. Kirkland, 8 Gray, 514; Butler v. Gray, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 26. And see also the cases of Pillow v. Wade, 31 Ark. 683; Baker v. Riley, 16 Ind. 479; Noe v. Miller, 31 N. J. Eq. 235; Dean v. Hart, 62 Ala. 309.

A bequest of money for life and then over gives only the interest.

Field v. Hitchcock, 17 Pick, 182.

Equally the bequest of interest only gives an estate for life, and then over. A bequest of the use of personalty and of the personalty during life has the same effect.

2 Kent, Com. 352; 2 Story, Eq. § 844.

It is submitted that a bequest of a fund to trustees, with directions to pay over the income as it accrues to the cestui que trust, and upon the trust, equally distinct, to retain the principal during the life, and until after the death of the beneficiary, to await and satisfy other trusts which are then expected to arise, does not give to the beneficiary of the income the possession or disposal of the principal.

In opposition to this view, the following rule was cited in the court below: "A gift of personal estate, without words of limitation, is sufficient to pass the absolute interest. But it might be supposed that a bequest of the income or annual produce of a fund, as opposed to a bequest of a fund itself, would be confined to the life of the donee in the absence of a contrary intention. The rule, however, is otherwise, and it is settled that a bequest of the income of personal estate, without limit as to time, is a gift of the principal."

Hawk. Wills, p. 122.

The language cited virtually admits that an opposite view would be only natural. It is, however, of importance here not to controvert, but simply to explain the rule as stated. It is not desirable to multiply rules whereby a testator is presumed to have used words and forms of expression in the sense which they have acquired by decided cases, although such sense be different from their ordinary and natural meaning.

The rule is one of construction, founded on the old feudal law, that a devise of the rents and profits of real estate carries with it the property in the land. But while "A devise of the rents and profits of land will be construed as a devise of the land in order to carry out the testator's intention, it will not be so construed in violation of such intention."

Bowen v. Payton, 14 R. I. 257; Collier v. Grimsey, 36 Ohio St. 21.

In the case under consideration, the corpus of the estate is fully and distinctly given to the trustees, and the bequest to the daughters is of the income only, to be paid to them as it accrues. It is not the enjoyment of the principal, but the gift of the principal itself which is postponed. The direction to pay is the gift, and this gift is exclusively to surviving children or surviving sisters.

The conclusion that when the whole interest of a fund is given in perpetuity, without limit or qualification, the fund is given, follows from the inference, in such case, natural enough, that the testator of course intended to give the principal sum under this description: "If, however, from the nature of the subject, or the context of the will, it appear that the produce or interest of the fund only was intended for the legatee, the gift of the interest will not pass the principal."

Roper, Legacies, p. 421; Hamilton v. Lloyd, 2 Ves. Jr. 416.

This is the question to be decided. Is the bequest of income so unlimited as to be tantamount to a bequest of the principal? Is a contrary intention absent? Is there not a discrimination between the income and the principal? Is not the corpus or principal vested in the trustees until the death of each daughter, for the ultimate purpose of the will? Does it not appear that the produce or interest of the fund only was intended for the legatee? "Where it appears from the context of the will that no interest in the capital was intended to pass till the determination of the life estate, or other particular period, in such cases the gift of the income and the gift of the capital are considered as distinct gifts."

Wms. Exrs. p. 1067.

"The rule which gives an absolute interest in the fund, where there is a general gift of the income, is not a very strong rule."

Blann v. Bell, 5 De G. & Sm. 663.

The cases which hold that the gift of the income of a fund carries the fund too mean that the donee has the fund as completely as the income. Clearly, in the case at bar, the legatee could not touch the principal at any time during her life. She was entitled to the annual produce only; of this, and this only, could she dispose as she pleased. The construction contended for would defeat the scheme of the testator's disposition, by a single provision clearly repugnant to the whole tenor of the will.

Nothing in the cases cited by Hawkins conflicts with the proposition that the placing of property, whether real or personal, in the hands of a trustee, upon a distinct trust to pay over the income to the beneficiary, but with equal clearness not to pay over the principal, gives to the beneficiary a vested equitable estate for life.

In short "Where it is the manifest intent of a testator to sever the product from its source, a bequest of the income of an estate will not carry an absolute estate in the principal."

Bentley v. Kauffman, 86 Pa. 99.

"In Redfield's edition of Story's Equity, § 1067, the law is stated in accordance with the late English authorities; and there can be no doubt that this is the true rule, which, applied to the case before us, gives Mrs. M. a life interest only under her father's will. The whole fund is given to trustees, who are to pay her monthly the interest of it, to do which they must first collect and receive it; and therefore during her life it was a subsisting trust, intended to preserve the principal for those in remainder. Of course Mrs. M. could not call for a transfer of the fund from the trustees or executors; and if so, there was no error committed by the court below in confirming the report of the auditor."

Myers' App. 49 Pa. 114.

The bequest in controversy amounts to no more than a bequest to an unmarried woman and her children, in which case, by a great preponderance of authority, she takes a life estate, with the remainder to her children, if any.

A bequest of personalty to one for life, remainder to his issue, does not confer an absolute interest upon the first taker.

Sheets' Est. 52 Pa. 268; Keene's App. 64 Pa. 268.

In a conveyance to an unmarried woman and her children, "children" is a word of purchase, and she takes a life estate with a remainder to her children.

Fales v. Currier, 55 N. H. 392:

A testator gave his daughter one twelfth of his estate, directing that it should not be subject to the control of her husband, but should be hers and her child's or children's. Held, that the daughter took a life estate, with remainder to her children.

Noe v. Miller, 31 N. J. Eq. 234.

Bequests expressed in the form of the one under consideration have usually been construed to give a life estate to the parent with remainder to the children. Id.

A testator directed that the legacies given by his will to females, married or single, should be for their own benefit and for that of their children and should never be subject to the control of their respective husbands. Held, that the females took for their lives for their separate use, with remainder to their children.

Another and more familiar principle would be set at naught by the construction herein opposed. The various bequests over directed by the testator, after the death of his daughters and their husbands, are valid as executory bequests, and are of themselves inconsistent with an absolute estate in the first taker, and would be void for repugnancy, if such absolute estate had been given.

For if a legatee possesses the absolute right of property, he certainly has the power of disposing of it in any way he may think proper, and therefore he might defeat the devise or limitation over.

Burbank v. Whitney, 24 Pick. 155.

Mr. Justice Hagner delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case was filed by Mr. Snyder as Trustee under the appointment of this court, for instructions, as to the proper distribution of a bequest of $20,000 under the will of Colonel John Tayloe, to his daughter Virginia.

It avers that Virginia Tayloe died after executing a last will and testament, by which she bequeathed this $20,000 to her niece, Miss Lewis, who demands payment of the entire sum; but that the money is also claimed by the children and grandchildren of the sisters of the said Virginia, who deny the right of the said Virginia to bequeath the said property by her will; insisting that she was only given a life estate in the legacy by her father, and that upon her death, unmarried and childless, it devolved upon her surviving sisters and their children, under the proper construction of the will of Colonel John Tayloe.

The court below sustained the claim of the legatee, Virginia T. Lewis; and from this decree the present appeal is taken in behalf of the grandchildren of Mrs. Carter, one of the sisters of Virginia Tayloe. The clause referred to is as follows:

"I give and bequeath to my daughters, Catharine, Elizabeth M., Virginia, and Anne O. Tayloe, $20,000 apiece, to be invested in United States bank stock or in government securities, which stock or securities I do hereby direct that my executors, herein after named, shall hold in trust for my said daughters respectively, and shall apply the dividends, interest or profits of said stock or securities to the use and benefit of my said daughters, Catharine, Elizabeth M., Virginia, and Anne O. Tayloe, severally and respectively, as the said dividends, interest or profits shall accrue; and from and after the intermarriage of any of them, then my said executors shall hold the said bank stock or other securities, belonging to said daughters so marrying, in trust for the following purposes, that is to say: in trust for the maintenance of her and her husband during their joint lives, then in trust for the survivor of the said husband and wife during his or her life; and after the death of such survivor, then in trust for such issue as she may leave at the time of her death; and in case she shall die without leaving such issue, then in trust for her surviving sisters (my other daughters), and the issue of any deceased sister, such issue taking such share as the deceased sister, whom they represent, would have taken had she been alive to take; and it is my intention that the stock and securities, as also the dividends, interest or profits thereof, shall be utterly free from the power of control of the husbands of my said daughters."

*See note, Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

Then follows this provision: "And the better to secure the payment of these my daughters' portions, I do hereby direct that if the funds hereinafter particularly appropriated for the payment of debts and legacies shall be insufficient for the payment of debts and legacies, my estate generally must be charged to make up the deficiency to my said daughters."

Among the familiar principles of law laid down with reference to the interpretation of wills, which it will be well to keep in mind in arriving at a correct construction in the present case, are these:

First. It makes no difference whatever, in construing such a bequest as that to Virginia Tayloe, that the property was left in the hands of trustees. The same rules of construction to determine the quality of her estate, whether for life or in fee, are equally applicable to estates placed in trust and those which are not, except so far as the creation of the trust may throw light upon the intention of the testator. Fairfax v. Gunn, 60 Md. 55.

Again; it is a recognized principle that when a man has undertaken to make a will, it is presumed that his purpose was to dispose of his entire estate. If Colonel Tayloe intended to leave to his daughters only a life estate, and neither should have married, then the testator would have died intestate of the remainder of the $80,000, so bequeathed for life to his daughters; and this result would have been inconsistent with the legal presumption that the testator intended to dispose of the sum absolutely; and the will must manifest a clear intention that the daughters should have only a life estate, before the court would declare that the testator had only disposed of a life interest in the legacy, and had died intestate as to the remainder.

And, as to personal property, it is held that a gift of the produce of a fund is a gift of the fund itself, unless there be words of qualification restraining the extent and duration of the interest. And a bequest of personalty, without words of limitation or perpetuity, passes an absolute estate in the thing bequeathed, unless the contrary intention is plainly expressed or necessarily implied. Adamson v. Armitage, 19 Ves. 416.

There are in this will several bequests, which, it is conceded, give absolute interests, to which no words of limitation are annexed. For example: the testator gives and bequeaths all his slaves who were tradesmen and mechanics of every description, such as smiths, carpenters, joiners, wheelwrights, ship carpenters, masons, shoe makers, etc., to be equally divided among his sons, and all the plate which belongs to the house in Washington wherein he resided is directed to be equally divided, after his wife's death, among all the sons; and he also directs that all his stock of liquors and spirits on hand at his death should in the same manner be equally divided among all his sons; and these bequests of course passed absolute estates in the personalty so bequeathed without any words of limitation.

It is perfectly plain that this will was skillfully and artificially drawn. It is apparent from many items that the testator knew how to frame a devise or bequest for life in apt words; thus, in proper terms, he gives to his wife an estate for life in what is given to her; the charge upon the estates of several of his sons, in favor of one of his nieces, is properly limited to her life only; and so in other instances; all intimating clearly that he knew how to use words properly when he desired to create a life estate. And this circumstance is persuasive to suggest that he would have used similar plain words to limit the interest of his daughters in the fund, for life, if such had been his purpose.

The testator provided most munificiently for his sons and grandson. His will enumerates upwards of thirty plantations, which are devised to them, without exception. The bequests for the daughters are insignificant in comparison, and it would enhance the hardship, if the court should be compelled to cut down to life estates, the slender portions which from his abundance he doled out to his daughters.

Omitting the provision as to marriage from the clause under consideration, there remains not one word to limit the power of disposition on the part of the daughters, or to combat the idea that the testator contemplated the vesting of the property in their personal representatives in case of their intestacy, or their power to bequeath their shares by last will. The language preceding the words "and from and after the intermarriage of any of them," etc., constitutes an ample gift of an absolute estate in the several sums of $20,000 apiece to each daughter; although it declared that the money should be invested in United States bank stock or government securities, and be held in trust "for my said daughters respectively." Those words as fully confer an absolute estate in the sums designated as the bequests before referred to do in the plate and the wines bequeathed by the testator.

The bequest is first, directly to the daughters, of "$20,000 apiece" to be invested in stocks which he directs that his executors shall hold in trust for his said daughters respectively; applying "the dividends, interest or profits thereof to the benefit and use of the said daughters" severally and respectively, "as the said dividends, etc., shall accrue."

Thus far he had made a sufficient bequest of the absolute interest in the fund for the daughters, while single. We have no more reason to suppose that he considered his daughters incompetent, so long as they remained unmarried, to be trusted with $20,000 apiece, than that his sons were incompetent to hold the great estates he had devised to them. They were equally his children and as much deserving of their father's bounty. But he naturally contemplated the probability of their marriage, and he knew that new relations would arise as to the management and ownership of the personalty, from the time they should marry.

From that moment, in the absence of express provisions to the contrary, the legacies would devolve upon their husbands, who might waste it and leave their wives penniless; hence, as a prudent father, he proceeded to impose such limitations upon the gift as should serve to protect it from this risk. The management was first committed to trustees; and this provision would have served as a sufficient safeguard against unwise investments by an unmarried daughter. But the solemnization of a marriage would create new difficulties which it was the sole purpose of the latter part of the clause to deal with; and the testator therefore added the words "and from and after the intermarriage of either of them," etc., to provide for this new condition of things.

That these added words were only intended to apply to the daughters after their respective marriages seems plain to us.

If none of the daughters should marry, it is self evident that the added words could never possibly apply. Everything in the added sentences is predicated only on the marriage of either of the daughters, who in that event only is to be affected by the new provision, since the provision as to husbands and children could have no application to her until marriage. If the entire clause had been four times expressed in the will, each repetition referring to only one daughter separately, how could the added words declaring what should happen from and after the marriage of Virginia by possibility apply if Virginia should not marry at all?

It may well be, as was argued in behalf of the appellants, that an unmarried daughter could not have disposed of her legacy at her pleasure during her life; because if she had applied to the trustees to transfer the property, they would have urged the possibility of her marriage and the consequent coming into force upon that event of the provisions contained in the added words. But this possibility could not interfere with her power of disposal by will, since such disposition could only operate in favor of her legatee after the possibility of marriage had disappeared, namely: after her death.

The cases cited by the appellants' counsel in his careful brief were decided upon the particular phraseology of the will there under examination; and they afford no certain guide where the words are as different as they are in those cases from those before us.

No decision cited comes as near to the present case as that of Gulick v. Gulick, 27 N. J. Eq. 498, which is singularly like the present case. The fifth section of the will there considered reads as follows:

"I give and bequeath to my daughter Abby Maria the sum of $10,000, to be placed out at interest, on bond and mortgage, so soon as my estate can be collected without sacrifice; the bonds and mortgages to be taken in the names of my executors or the survivor of them, in trust for my said daughter Abby Maria, and the interest to be paid annually to her by my said executors or the survivor of them, and for her sole and separate use, and in nowise liable for the debts or subject to the control of any man she may marry.

"Should she marry and have a child or children, then after her death I give the said $10,000 to such child or children."

The daughter died, never having married, and her personal representative claimed the fund. It was decided that the daughter died seised of an absolute estate against the contention that she was only entitled to a life estate. The court says:

"The testator, it is perceived, first provides for a gift of the fund itself and then the method of its enjoyment by the legatee. The last is equivalent to a gift of the interest of the fund. It is perceived, also, that until we meet the words 'should she marry and have a child,' etc., there is no limitation, express or implied, of the time of enjoyment of this interest. The rule is well established that a bequest of the income of personalty without limit as to time is equivalent to a gift of the property. And the rule applies whether given directly or through the intervention of trustees. This absolute bequest was subject to the concluding clause of the section, 'should she marry and have a child or children, then, after her death, I give the said $10,000 to such child or children.' The legatee never married. The event, upon the happening of which the interest was limited over, never occurred. The rule therefore governs that where an absolute gift is made in the first instance, followed by a limitation over on the death of the first taker, the absolute gift is not defeated unless the gift over takes effect.

"Construing this section as an absolute bequest, limited over upon the happening of an event which has failed, the executor of Abby Maria is entitled to the fund."

This reasoning of the court is very applicable to the case at bar; and we conceive that under the proper construction of this clause, Virginia Tayloe died seised of an absolute estate in the legacy of $20,000, which she was competent to dispose of by her last will.

Being of the opinion that the decree below was correct, it is accordingly affirmed.

Abbot L. HITCHCOCK
v.
Virginia RICHOLD.

1. A married woman cannot contract in this District as a sole trader, notwithstanding the Married Woman's Act.
2. A married woman living with her husband, carried on the business of a retail dealer in boots and shoes, on her own account and with her separate estate. For the purpose of keeping up her stock and assortment of sizes she bought a quantity of boots and shoes of the plaintiff, giving her promissory note in payment. On a suit brought against her on the note it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, this not being a contract having relation to the defendant's separate estate, within the meaning of the Married Woman's Act.

APPEAL from a judgment in favor of defendant on a special finding of facts. Affirmed.

This was an action brought upon two promissory notes of $59.12, each, given by the defendant, a married woman, to the plaintiff, a merchant, in payment of a bill of boots and shoes bought by her to sell again. The declaration contained two counts, one upon each of the notes, and also the common counts. The pleas were the general issue and coverture. Replication "that the defendant had a separate estate and that the goods were purchased and the notes given in relation to and for the benefit of said separate estate."

Thereupon a stipulation was filed, expressly waiving a trial by jury and submitting the case to the court to be tried and determined under the Act of Congress, 13 Stat. at L. 501.

The special finding of facts by the court was as follows:

"The plaintiff is a manufacturer of boots and shoes in Boston, Mass., and the defendant is a retail dealer in boots and shoes in Washington City. The defendant is a married woman, the wife of Leopold Richold, and was such prior to the sale of goods to her by plaintiff, for which the notes sued on were given, and has always since her marriage cohabited with her said husband. The defendant was, in August, 1882, carrying on the business of a retail dealer in boots and shoes, on her own account, and with her separate estate in the District of Columbia. For the purpose of keeping up her stock and assortment of goods she began buying goods of the plaintiff in said month of August, 1882, and she bought goods of the plaintiff, for her said store, on the following dates; August 19, 1882; October 30, 1882; November 17, 22 and 29, 1882; and December 1 and 9, 1882.

"The defendant paid for the boots and shoes bought prior to December 1, 1882, and gave the notes now sued on, in promise of payment of the two bills bought on December 1 and 9, 1882. The goods so bought in December, 1882, were delivered to the defendant, and used by her in said store in keeping up her stock and assortment, and were sold by her therein; and the said notes given for the same have not been paid, and are still held by the plaintiff."

Then follows a copy of the notes sued upon.

The judgment of the court on these facts was entered for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. Edwards & Barnard, for plaintiff:

1. The contract of purchase of other separate estate to improve or enhance the value and usefulness of a separate estate already acquired or held by a married woman is a contract "having relation to her sole and separate property," under section 729, R. S. D. C.

Hauptman v. Catlin, 20 N. Y. 247; Colvin v. Currier, 22 Barb. 372; Machir v. Burroughs, 14 Ohio St. 519; Greenough v. Wigginton, 2 Greene (Iowa), 435; Phillips, Mech. Liens, pp. 142, 143; Harmon v. Garland, 1 Mackey, 1.

A contract for furniture to be used in a boarding house which belongs to a married woman is valid, as relating to her separate estate.

Tillman v. Shackleton, 15 Mich. 447; Harmon v. Garland, 1 Mackey, 1; Nispel v. Laparle, 74 Ill. 306; 24 Am. Law Reg. 365.

Also for horses bought for her livery stable.

Manderbach v. Mock, 29 Pa. 43.

Or for rent of a store to sell her goods in.

Knowles v. Hull, 99 Mass. 562.

The question in this case is, Shall not an absolute separate estate carry with it all the incidents to give it value in its efforts to accumulate and make an income and a livelihood for its owner? If not, then what investments are open to such estate, and how can it be as if its owner were unmarried? It is the estate that is invested in a business that gives credit to the business; and this is one of the elements of its value. If she could not "size up" her stock, a married woman using her separate estate in the business of a retail shoe dealer could not well dispose of sizes already on hand, for she could not attract customers, and her trade would fail; and if she cannot obtain credit on the faith of her separate estate invested in such trade, then her right to it, and power to dispose of it, and to contract about it, cannot be the same as if she were unmarried. She is limited and hampered, as she would not be under section 727, R. S. D. C.

The statutes on this subject usually secure, expressly or by implication, the wife's right to the natural increase of her property.

Stout v. Perry, 70 Ind. 501; Mitchell v. Sawyer, 21 Iowa, 582.

2. How shall the manufacturer be protected in extending a credit to a married woman whose separate estate is invested in business for goods sold for the benefit of that business, and in relation to it, if she is not bound by her contract of purchase? Neither the husband nor his property shall be bound by such contract.

R. S. D. C. § 730.

A married woman's rights in property are statutory in this District; but in equity, before the statute, her contracts relating to equitable separate estate were charged on such estate.

Conkling v. Doul, 67 Ill. 355; Todd v. Lee, 16 Wis. 480.

"Since her personal incapacity to contract is the main cause of a married woman's inability to trade at common law, all statutes enabling her to contract indirectly enable her to trade."

24 Am. Law Reg. 362; Haight v. McVeagh, 69 Ill. 624; Krouskop v. Shontz, 51 Wis. 204; Dayton v. Walsh, 47 Wis. 113; Tiermeyer v. Turnquist, 85 N. Y. 516, 521.

The statute says her right to property "acquired during marriage, in any other way than by gift or conveyance from her husband shall be absolute," etc.

R. S. D. C. § 727.

This necessarily implies that she may acquire property by purchase; and if she can acquire title to separate property by purchase, surely the contract to pay for it would be one relating to it.

In the case of Ritch v. Hyatt, 3 MacA. 536, Justices Wylie and Cox gave a different construction to this Act; but we submit that the dissenting opinion of Justice MacArthur in the same case is founded on the better reasoning and authority. That case did not require a construction of this part of the statute, as the land was in New York, and our law was not applicable, so that it should not be considered as an authority binding on this court.

Judge Wylie himself did not feel bound by that case, as shown by his opinion in Harmon v. Garland, a year afterwards. The defendant's right and title to the goods sold to her by the plaintiff in this case was absolute. These goods were bought long before the notes were given; were mingled with her previously acquired estate to enhance it; and were actually sold by the defendant, and the money received by her as the proceeds of her own property.

It would require an iron rule, indeed, to compel a court of justice, in such a case to give so narrow a construction to this statute as would allow a married woman, asserting the rights of a feme sole, to profit by such dealing at the expense of honest people.

We submit that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

Mr. Leon Tobriner, for defendant:

The Married Woman's Act of this District gives no power to married women to buy and sell as feme sole traders.

Ritch v. Hyatt, 3 MacA. 541; Schneider v. Garland, 1 Mackey, 355.

The construction given the statute in the cases cited is this: the statute was framed having in contemplation the manner in which a married woman, at common law, could acquire a separate estate.

The separate estate in relation to which she can, under the statute, "contract, sue or be sued," must be an estate acquired in the manner contemplated by the statute. No new mode of acquisition is given her, no other right is bestowed or liability imposed upon her but to "contract, sue or be sued" in relation to an estate acquired in that manner.

The contract sued on in the case at bar arises out of an attempted acquisition, not in any of the modes contemplated by the statute. It is then sought to fix liability upon a feme covert under a contract upon which she is not liable at common law, or under the statute in force in this District as construed by this court.

In Stewart v. Smith, 3 Mackey, 281, it was held that a contract by a married woman for the loan of money to carry on the business of a boarding house, in which she is engaged, is not a contract relating to her separate estate.

"Where a married woman, with her husband's consent, kept a restaurant and purchased groceries to enable her to carry on the business, held, not a contract relating to her separate estate."

Conkling v. Doul, 67 Ill. 355.

Goods were sold and delivered to a married woman doing business in her own name and right, with her own separate estate and with the consent of her husband; held, that she was not liable therefor.

Hasheagen v. Specker, 36 Ind. 418.

A statute empowered a married woman to carry on trade as a feme sole with a capital not exceeding $1,000, and fixed her liability to that extent; held, nevertheless, that she could not enter into a copartnership.

Bradstreet v. Baer, 41 Md. 19.

In Glover v. Alcott, 11 Mich. 470, the Supreme Court of Michigan held that the statutes of that State did not empower a married woman to carry on, on credit, a general trade or business; and although that court subsequently in Tillman v. Shackelton, 15 Mich. 447, limited the rule laid down by them in Glover v. Alcott, as not intended to include "any business usually carried on by females and which consists largely and almost necessarily of female labor, such for example as that of a milliner," it is submitted that the opinion announced in the first case is based upon sounder reasoning and authority, and should be adopted.

Statutes which authorize married women to hold property by gift, grant, purchase or devise from any person other than the husband, do not by implication carry the wife's earnings.

Yopst v. Yopst, 51 Ind. 62; Hoyt v. White, 46 N. H. 47; Nat. Bank v. Sprague, 5 C. E. Green (N. J.), 25; Jenkins v. Flinn, 37 Ind. 351; Rider v. Hulse, 33 Barb. 270.

In the case last cited the Supreme Court of New York held that the Acts of 1848–49, creating property acquired by a married woman "by inheritance, gift, grant, devise or bequest from some person other than her husband" her separate property, did not include the fruits of her own labor, or the profits or income of any business in which she may have embarked.

The statute has not changed that feature of the common law which makes the earnings of the wife the property of the husband.

Seitz v. Mitchell, 94 U. S. 584 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 180).

If she have the right to embark in business, she has the power to withdraw from the husband both her service and her presence. Her earnings, the result of her personal efforts in the conduct of her business, would vest in the husband and be liable to the claims of his creditors; while her stock in trade, the corpus of her "separate estate, would be protected as her 'sole property.'" Such an effect was never intended by Congress. A fair and reasonable construction was made by this court in Ritch v. Hyatt, when it said: "We think the words of the statute have given no new rights to the married woman, in respect to the means of acquiring property. It makes a very complete settlement of all that she had, and all that she may acquire, to her sole and separate use, without conferring any new right of acquiring property in her own right. A married woman could always acquire property by gift, either by means of deed or will from others; and that faculty is preserved and made effectual by the statute."

Mr. Justice James delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff claims that the shoes contracted for were, within the meaning of section 729 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District, a matter having relation to the stock of shoes already owned by the defendant in her separate estate, because a stock of shoes is made up of assorted sizes in certain proportions, and is kept in a merchantable condition by such additions from time to time. A subtle assumption is involved in this proposition, namely: that the separate estate of the wife in this case consisted, not of mere articles of personal property but of such property clothed in contemplation of law with peculiar qualities, because it is used by her as a sole trader. In short, the suggested relation between the articles contracted for and those already owned by her can be established only by showing that she is authorized by this statute to make any contract which may be necessary to the success of her business as a sole trader. Without this condition there can be no relation between the several lots of shoes.

We think it has been settled by former decisions of this court that this section confers no such capacity. Ritch v. Hyatt, 3 MacA. 536, and Schneider v. Garland, 1 Mackey, 350.

It is next claimed that even if this contract does not fall within the meaning of section 729, as a contract in a matter having relation to her separate estate, the defendant nevertheless had power, under section 727, to acquire property by purchase, just as a feme sole may so acquire property; and that, if she may acquire property by purchase, she may acquire it on the usual terms of purchase for a consideration, and therefore may bind herself to pay the consideration. The section referred to is in the following words: "In the District the right of a married woman to any property personal or real, belonging to her at the time of the marriage, or acquired during marriage in any other way than by gift or conveyance from her husband, shall be as absolute as if she were unmarried," etc. It is claimed that these words recognize her capacity to acquire, and in part give her capacity to acquire property in any of the ways by which property is acquired, and that they consequently give her the power to make a contract to pay for it.

This section does not pretend to regulate her capacity to acquire or her capacity to make contracts connected with, or with a view to acquisition. It deals simply with the completeness and absoluteness of her right to property acquired by her, in ways already known to the common law. In a word, it regulates her status as a proprietor, and not her power to make contracts. That subject is left wholly to, and is regulated exclusively by, section 729. The fact that this subject is taken up and disposed of in a separate clause or section excludes any implication that another section in any way affects the same matter.

The consideration of hardship and fraud upon creditors is entitled to no weight. It is their duty to know the law relating to the capacity of married women, just as they must be held to know the law as to the capacities of infants. If they deal in ignorance they must accept the consequences. Certainly it is not for us to add to or strain this statute. Our duty is simply to construe it.

Judgment affirmed.

ANGLO-AMERICAN INSURANCE CO.
v.
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Under the Act of March 3, 1877, governing the assessment of taxes in the District, the yearly assessments must be closed on the first day of July of each year, and the taxation computed from that day for the year ending June 30 next. Property which may come into existence during the interval is not liable to taxation until the commencement of the next taxable year. Thus where a corporation had filed its certificate of organization on the 23d of June, 1884, but no practical organization or subscription to stock had been made until the September following, when the Company announced itself ready for business, an assessment of taxes upon the capital stock for the year commencing July 1, 1884, is invalid and void.

APPEAL by the District of Columbia from an order of the Circuit Court made in proceedings upon a writ of certiorari, quashing a tax assessment. Order affirmed.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. A. G. Riddle, for the District.

Mr. William A. Meloy, for plaintiff.

Mr. Justice Hagner delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the District of Columbia from an order of the circuit court quashing the proceedings of the district authorities with reference to a tax levied against the defendant company.

The petition filed in the circuit court alleged that this Company had been compelled to pay a portion of a tax which it conceived to be illegal, and that it was threatened with process to compel the payment of the residue; and it asked that a writ of certiorari should issue, commanding the district authorities to certify into the circuit court their proceedings, that it might determine whether this averment as to the illegality of the tax was correct. Accordingly, a full return was made; and from the statement thus presented we find the following to be the facts of the case:

On the 23d day of June, 1884, articles of association were filed under the general laws of the District, setting forth the scheme of incorporation of the Anglo-American Insurance Company, stating the proposed amount of its capital, the number of shares, etc. Nothing more seems to have been done by the Company until the second of September, when, as it appears from the papers included in this return, a subscription was commenced; but this was not completed (even to the extent to which it was finally carried) until the 10th of September, on which day certificates for the stock were issued to the subscribers.

In December, 1884, the district authorities conceived it their duty to take notice of this scheme of incorporation (as the Company had published on the 10th of September that it was fully organized for business) with the view of exacting from it a tax upon its capital stock.

Accordingly, an assessment blank was presented to the Company to be filled under the appropriate head, as preliminary to the collection of the tax. This paper under date of January 22, 1885, was signed by Charles W. Tankersley, who swore that he was president of the Company, and filled in one of the spaces in this assessment blank which was entitled "Schedule of personal property." It contained a printed notification that it was to be returned on or before July 15, 1884, under a penalty of an additional charge of 50 per cent for any delay beyond that date, and purported to be an assessment for the taxable year ending June 30, 1885. The entire entry, partly printed, and partly in writing, is as follows—the words and figures in italics being those which were written by Tankersley, or by his authority, in the blank spaces:

"Capital stock of a corporation: All the shares to be appraised in bulk, at a fair marketable value, on the first day of July, 1884, and deduct the assessed value of all real estate owned by said corporation, fifty thousand shares, par value $10 each, subscribed and paid for September 2, 1884, fair marketable value on January 1, 1885 and now $5 per share—$250,000."

It appears that the entry on the assessment books of the district authorities was altered from time to time. In January, 1885, the total assessment was stated at $500,000 and the amount of tax at $7,500. That was changed after the 22d of that month, by reducing the assessment to $250,000; and it then read "1, ½ from September 1, 1884, on $250,000—$1,250; 2, ½ from January 1, 1885, on $250,000—$1,875." And the latter assessment was the basis of the bill finally presented to the Company.

Under circumstances which it is insisted on the part of the petitioner amounted to duress, the Company paid the $1,250, which was not one half of the tax for the year; the amount charged for what was called the other half being $1,875.

The contention of the Company is that the yearly assessments must be closed according to law, on the first day of July of each year, and that taxes on property generally are to be computed as of this last day until the 30th of June of the next year. It insists that it possessed no property on the 30th of June or the first of July, 1884; that although it had published to the world on the 23d of June a notice that it had filed its certificate of incorporation, yet it was not until the second of September, after the close of the previous assessment year, that any steps whatever were taken towards the realization of its promise; and it was not until the 10th of that month that it could properly be said to have completed even the partial subscription then made.

If this is a correct statement of the facts, then the District Government, in our opinion, had no authority whatever to levy this tax.

There are only two cases recognized by the law governing the assessment of taxes, in which it is permissible for the district authorities to add to the assessment after it has been closed on the 30th of June. Those exceptional cases are specified in section 12 of chapter 117 of the Act approved March 3, 1877, which although it appears from its general language to be applicable only to the current year, yet contains this provision:

"Sec. 18. That this Act shall remain in force as the tax law of the District of Columbia for each subsequent year after June 30, 1878, until repealed."

This Act was therefore in full force in 1885. The first exception thus spoken of appears in the twelfth section, as follows:

"Said assessors shall, before the first day of October, 1877, under the direction of the superintendent of assessments and taxes of said District, assess the value of all the real property not embraced in the assessment of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, inclusive of all buildings erected or roofed, improved or enlarged, and not heretofore taxed," etc.

And the other exceptional provision is this: "Where a person coming into the District subsequent to June 30, 1877, engages in trade of a permanent character, he shall pay a tax proportioned to the fraction of the tax year ending June 30, 1878, during which he conducted the trade," etc.

Neither of those provisions describes the case of an assessment of the capital stock of a corporation, which is specially provided for in section 11 of the Act; and it was properly conceded in the argument, on the part of the District, that neither of the two exceptional cases in which the assessors were authorized to add to the closed assessment could be held to include the case at bar.

But the reply of the District is that although it may be true the stockholders did not subscribe nor pay anything on their subscriptions until the second of September, or consummate anything in the way of practical organization until the 10th of that month, yet as they had filed their certificate of organization on the 23d of June, and on the 10th of September had published the advertisement, announcing that they had organized for business and that the capital of the Company was to be $500,000; had named the officers and thus held themselves out as an existing corporation—it resulted that the Company had rendered itself liable to assessment for the year 1884–5; that the incorporation having taken place before the first of July, 1884, they became liable to pay on their capital, whenever during the year they should make good their programme or scheme of business, notwithstanding the money might not be subscribed and paid until after the first of July.

We do not think this position can be sustained. The publication of the 23d of June was merely a project or scheme that might never be realized; probably a large proportion of such schemes, quite as fair of promise, perish and are never heard of again. Non constat that the $500,000 or $5 towards that amount, would ever be subscribed; and to say that the right to make an assessment could grow into being, from the mere fact of the incorporation, on the chance of subscriptions being made, seems to us to place upon too uncertain a basis the exercise of the sovereign power of taxation which always requires a grant to sustain it.

The case does not differ materially from that of a person living in another city until after the first of July and then removing to Washington. It is to be supposed that there has already been levied, by the authorities where he had lived, the usual tax on whatever property he had there in the way of stock or other effects, and that he will have been assessed at that place, for the whole year and not for a fractional part only. He removes here, we will say, in the latter part of the year, bringing his personal effects, to make this city his home. To tax him here and make him pay here upon the same property upon which he has already paid a full year's tax at his former home would be most unjust, unless his case should fall within one of the two exceptions already referred to.

For these reasons we think there was no authority for the imposition of this tax. It is unnecessary to consider the further argument on the part of the District, that the Company paid part of this tax voluntarily. The consent of the taxpayer could not confer on the Corporation the sovereign power of taxation, where it had not been given by law.

Nor do we intend to decide, on the other hand, that if the Company paid that part of the charge under circumstances of duress, as it insists, it can recover from the District the amount thus paid.

We simply hold, for the reason given, that the court below was correct in its decision, and that the entire proceedings ought to be quashed; and it is so ordered.

Re William J. HENNICK.

The Act of the late Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, imposing a license tax upon commercial agents, or drummers, whose business it is, as agents for nonresident manufacturers or wholesale dealers, to offer merchandise for sale, is unconstitutional and void as a restriction upon interstate commerce.

(Decided May 9, 1887.)

HABEAS CORPUS. Petitioner discharged.

The petitioner was arrested and convicted in the Police Court of this District for a violation of section 21 of the Act of the Legislative Assembly affirmed August 23, 1871, which is as follows:

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That a license tax shall be, and hereby is, imposed as follows, that is to say:

"First, Apothecaries shall pay, etc., etc., * * *.

"Second, Auctioneers shall pay, etc., etc., * * *.

"Third, Commericial Agents shall pay $250. Every person residing in the District of Columbia, whose business it is, as agent for nonresident manufacturers or wholesale dealers, to offer for sale merchandise, shall be regarded as a commercial agent." Acts, Sess. 1, p. 98.

After his conviction the petitioner sued out this writ of habeas corpus, the hearing upon which was certified by the justice holding the criminal court to the general term, to be there heard in the first instance.

Messrs. Francis M. Darby, Francis Miller and Guion Miller, for petitioner:

The validity of this license was in question in Humason's Case, 2 MacArt. 158. It was contended that the law was illegal, as to commercial agents, because it was in effect an attempt to regulate commerce, and therefore, unconstitutional; but the court held the contrary. This decision, so far as it declares that the Act is not a regulation of commerce, has been overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Robbins v. Taxing District of Shelby Co. 20 U. S. 489 (Bk. 30, L. ed. 694); S. C. 1 Interstate Com. Rep. 45.

This would seem to be conclusive of this case.

But it is claimed that this law was passed by the Legislative Assembly, by the authority of Congress, which has exclusive legislative power over this District.

Cohens v. Va. 6 Wheat. 441 (19 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 300).

But this court has decided that the Legislative Assembly had only municipal power of legislation; that it could not legislate on general subjects; and further that Congress could not give it power to do so.

Roach v. Van Riswick and Cooper v. Dist. Col. 4 MacArt. 171, 250; Dist. Col. v. Waggaman, 1 Cent. Rep. 823, 4 Mackey, 333; § 98 R. S. D. C; Dunphy v. Kleinschmidt, 11 Wall. 610 (78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 223).

It is certain, in view of the late decision of the United States Supreme Court that such a law is a regulation of interstate commerce, that Congress could not delegate to a mere municipal body its constitutional power over a great national interstate question.

As Congress could not clothe the Legislative Assembly with this power, its action in passing the License Law was utterly void; and that law cannot gain any validity from the tacit acquiescence of Congress.

The rule of "ratification" is laid down in the case of Mattingly v. Dist. Col. 97 U. S. 687 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 1098).

It is contended that the fact that Congress has amended this law by repealing some of its provisions has given it the same effect as if it had been passed by Congress itself.

But the Legislative Assembly by the very terms of the organic Act could not pass any law that the Legislature of the State could not. Can it be successfully contended that if, in disobedience of the restriction thus laid upon it, it attempted to exercise the highest constitutional function of Congress itself, the silence of Congress, or the repeal of some purely municipal regulations, is to be construed as a recognition and validation of this assumption of power?

Roach v. Van Riswick, 4 MacArt. 171.

But the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Tennessee case has conclusively settled that this law is, in effect, a regulation of commerce between the States; for in this connection, as in the case of the constitutional provision as to direct taxes, the District of Columbia and the Territories must be included.

Loughborough v. Blake, 5 Wheat. 319 (18 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 98).

At least it is an attempt to regulate commerce between the District of Columbia, and (in the case at bar) the State of Maryland. It reaches out and affects the interests of that State, and is in effect an exercise of the national constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce, and not of the exclusive power of local legislation over the District.

If it is an exercise of this national constitutional power, it must be subject to all the restrictions which the Constitution has imposed upon Congress. It must therefore be uniform. Either this regulation of commerce must be impartially applied to every man who engages in the business of a drummer, or it cannot be enforced against anyone.

The language of the supreme court on this subject, emphatic and oft repeated as it has been, is but an expansion of that of the Constitution itself.

Article 1, section 8, clause 1, says: "All duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Chief Justice Marshall, 5 Wheat. 319 (18 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 98), says: "The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts and excises, may be exercised and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American Empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia, or the territory west of the Missouri, is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties and excises, should be observed in one than in the other. Since, then, the power to lay and collect taxes, * * * is obviously coextensive with the power to lay and collect duties, imposts and excises, and since the latter extends throughout the United States, it follows that the power to impose direct taxes also extends throughout the United States."

Clause 6 of the same section provides that "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

See Passenger Cases, 7 How. 405 (48 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 758); Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 191 (22 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 69).

Now if this License Law does give or may give the City of Baltimore any preference over the City of Washington, or the contrary, it is in violation of this clause of the Constitution.

We contend therefore that even if Congress had formally passed this Law and it had been regularly approved by the President, with all the forms prescribed for the enactment of laws of the United States, it would still be void, because of its violation of the fundamental requirement of all such legislation, to wit: that of uniformity throughout the limits of the country; Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1; Cited in Gilman v. Sheboygan, 2 Black, 510 (67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 305); for this license tax is a tax on the articles to be sold by the drummer.

Brown v. Md. 12 Wheat. 444, 448 (25 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 687, 688); Cook v. Pa. 97 U. S. 566 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 1015); License Tax Cases, 5 Wall. 462 (72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 497); Welton v. Mo. 91 U. S. 275 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 347).

Judge Tucker thought that "duties" as used in the Constitution, "were probably intended to comprehend every species of tax or contribution not included in the ordinary terms 'taxes and excises'."

Cited in Pacific Ins. Co. v. Soule, 7 Wall. 433 (74 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 98).

Cooley, Const. Law, p. 494.

Direct taxes must be laid by the rule of apportionment; all others by the rule of uniformity.

Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533 (75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 482); Scholey v. Rew, 23 Wall. 331 (90 U. S. bk. 23, L. ed. 99).

In Ward v. Md. 12 Wall. 418 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 449), Mr. Justice Bradley foreshadows the recent decision in the Tennessee case.

"It will not be denied that that portion of commerce with foreign countries and between the States which consists of the transportation and exchange of commodities is of national importance, and admits and requires uniformity of regulation."

Welton v. Mo. 91 U. S. 275 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 347), cited and approved in Tiernan v. Rinker, 102 U. S. 123 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 103).

In respect of commerce between the States, which consists in the transportation, purchase, sale and exchange of commodities, there can of necessity be only one system or plan of regulations; and that Congress alone can prescribe.

Mobile Co. v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 238); Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299 (53 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 996); Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 158); Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 257); Walling v. Mich. 116 U. S. 446 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 691); Pickard v. Pullman etc. Car Co. 117 U. S. 34 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 785).

But suppose this tax is levied by Congress as the exclusive legislative power in the District of Columbia for the support of the government of the District of Columbia, it is still a tax on the commerce of the States with the District of Columbia, and subjects that commerce to burdens to support the local expenses of the District of Columbia. Can Congress compel the States to do this?

Cooley, Const. Law, p. 499.

We submit that the recent decision of the supreme court is universal in its operation and cuts up by the roots all local regulation of commerce; that it declares that requiring a license for drummers is a regulation of commerce; that therefore such license can only be required by Congress; and that Congress can only exercise its power to regulate commerce by the exercise of its constitutional powers so to do, under the constitutional restriction that the operation of its laws shall be uniform throughout the limits of the United States.

Mr. Henry E. Davis, for the District:

I. The law is, in effect, the law of Congress.

The power of the Legislative Assembly, which emanated from Congress, extended "to all rightful subjects of legislation within the District, consistent with the Constitution of the United States * * * subject to all the restrictions and limitations imposed upon States by the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States;" and all Acts of the Assembly were "subject to repeal or modification by the Congress of the United States."

R. S. D. C. §§ 49, 50.

The extent of the power thus conferred upon the Legislative Assembly was considered by this court in Roach v. Van Riswick and Cooper v. Dist. Col. 4 MacArt. 171, 250; and in Dist. Col. v. Waggaman, 1 Cent. Rep. 823, 4 Mackey, 328.

In the last mentioned case the very License Act under consideration was held as within the power; and in Dist. Col. v. Oyster, 1 Cent. Rep. 84, 4 Mackey, 285, the Act was administered by this court without any question or expression of doubt as to its being properly within the power granted and properly grantable by Congress to the Assembly.

The Act having, then, been within the power of the Assembly to pass, it was in full force and virtue from its passage, unless repealed or modified by Congress.

As was said by this court in Roach v. Van Riswick (4 MacArt. 172, 173), the "reluctance on the part of Bench and Bar to recognize legislation of the late government as valid, * * * has sometimes sought its excuse in the want of positive confirmation by Congress of the legislation in question. This, however, is a very unsatisfactory foundation for it. The organic Act, * * * which established the District Government, nowhere contains an intimation that the Acts of the new government are to be inoperative until or unless confirmed by Congress; but, on the contrary, by the strongest imputation, excludes such idea. The fiftieth section [of the revision] declares that all Acts of the Legislative Assembly shall at all times be subject to repeal or modification by the Congress of the United States. Until repealed or modified, the clear implication is that they are to operate proprio vigore. * * * It is plain to us that as far as Congress could confer the power of original and independent legislation, needing no confirmation, but complete and operative in itself, it has done so by the Act in question."

The effect of this is that the legislation in question, being that of a duly authorized and qualified agent of Congress in the Government of the District of Columbia, is that of Congress itself. And if that be not so, we have a distinct adoption by Congress of this legislation in the several Acts of February 17, 1873 (17 Stat. at L. 464), July 12, 1876 (§ 19, 19 Stat. at L. 83), and January 28, 1887, in part amending and in part repealing the Act of the Assembly; whereby, by the clearest implication, the rest of the Act is adopted.

II. The constitutional question.

The question raised by the petitioner is supposed to find support in article I, § 8 of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises * * * but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States" (clause 1), and that "The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes" (clause 3); and in section 9 of the same article, which declares that "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear or pay duties in another" (clause 6).

As to the first of these provisions, it is enough to say that the license tax in question is not a duty, an impost, or an excise, and is not, therefore, within that provision requiring uniformity throughout the United States. As to the last (§ 9, clause 6), the license law for the District of Columbia gives no preference to the ports of any State, or even of the District, over those of any other State; and it is not easily conceived how that clause can be thought to have any relevancy to the subject in hand.

A question seems, however, to be presented by the remaining of the three clauses above enumerated, viz.: whether, as a regulation of commerce, the license law for the District is invalid, as obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States?

1. It is not doubted that the law regulates commerce, in the sense of the Constitution. The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Robbins v. Taxing District of Shelby Co. 120 U. S. 489 (Bk. 30, L. ed. 694); S. C. 1 Interstate Com. Rep. 45, closes the door to any possible contention on that head.

2. It is equally certain that, as above pointed out, the law is, in effect, an enactment by Congress.

3. The question, then, becomes, Has Congress power under the Constitution to pass such a law?

If not, it must be either because such power is not granted, or is denied, to Congress by the Constitution.

The power is undoubtedly granted in terms by article I, § 8, clause 17, whereby Congress is given power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the District of Columbia. As was said by Marshall, Ch. J., in Loughborough v. Blake, 5 Wheat. 324 (18 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 100); "On the extent of these terms, according to the common understanding of mankind, there can be no difference of opinion."

But it is contended that this broad grant is limited by the restrictions which the Constitution has imposed upon Congress. Granting this, what restriction of the Constitution upon the power of Congress affects the question under consideration? Petitioner's counsel cite but two such restrictions as of supposed applicability—that requiring uniformity of duties, imposts and excises, and that forbidding preference to the ports of one State over another; both of which have been noticed above.

What limitations, then, exist on the power of Congress in regulating commerce? Seemingly none, except those distinctly prescribed by the Constitution, which "are expressed in plain terms," and none of which applies to the case in hand.

The question thus recurs: Does the regulation of commerce complained of emanate from Congress? That it does is shown above. "Although Congress cannot enable a State to legislate, Congress may adopt the provisions of a State on any given subject." A fortiori may it adopt the legislation of its own agency, in the exercise of one of its undoubted powers. The adoption by Congress of any given legislation "gives it the same validity as if its provisions had been specifically made by Congress."

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 196, 207 (22 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 70, 73).

4. The recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States (Robbins v. Taxing District, supra), in reality does not affect the question under consideration.

In that case it was held only that a given law of the State of Tennessee was invalid, as dealing with the subject of commerce, which, by the Constitution, was committed to Congress. The power of Congress, its extent and its limitations in the premises, were not under consideration.

5. The petitioner has no right to complain of the District License Law. He is not a member of a foreign Nation, nor of an Indian Tribe, and the law does not affect commerce "among the several States."

The District of Columbia is not a State, in the meaning of the Constitution.

18, L. ed. 827); Baltimore etc. R. R. Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. 86 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 360).

In respect to regulating commerce, there is in the Constitution no prohibition upon either Congress or any State to discriminate for or against the District, as between it and such or any State. "The sole restraints" against abuse in this respect are those mentioned by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden; and disregard of those restraints can only be reached by counter legislation; they cannot be affected by any action of the judiciary.

Mr. Justice Merrick delivered the opinion of the court:

I have been assigned to announce the opinion of the court in the case of William J. Hennick, certified to this court, from the criminal court.

The petitioner, as it appears by his petition, was convicted before the police court upon an information against him as a commercial agent, or drummer, so-called. The information states:

"That on the 14th day of April, 1887, at the City of Washington he did engage in the business of a commercial agent, to wit: the business of offering for sale as agent of Lyons, Conklin & Co., a firm doing business in the City of Baltimore, State of Maryland, certain goods, wares, and merchandise, by sample, catalogue, and otherwise, without having first obtained a license to do so; contrary to the provisions of an Act of the Legislative Assembly."

Prior to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States at its present term, in the case of Robbins v. Taxing District of Shelby County, 120 U. S. 489 [Bk. 30, L. ed. 694]; S. C. 1 Interstate Com. Rep. 45, there had been very great diversity of opinion throughout the United States as to the power of a State to tax commercial agents who were transacting business by selling goods by sample or by soliciting contracts for sale of goods owned by persons in other States than where the solicitation or sale was made. That diversity of opinion not only pervaded the legal profession, but, as it appears by this recent decision of the supreme court, it still existed in that tribunal; so that there is a complete justification for those who entertained that opinion, and who urged the liability under such laws.

By justification I mean justification up to the time that that decision was pronounced. That decision being pronounced, however, it is obligatory upon all other tribunals and upon citizens of the United States. It is not obligatory upon the supreme court itself, as a final adjudication, because it is liable to be reviewed by it and reversed by it if, in its better judgment hereafter, it should entertain a different opinion from that which has been expressed by itself, because it is a well defined rule, announced by that court, that in constitutional questions the rule of stare decisis is not obligatory upon itself. Constitutional questions are always open for revision by the supreme court itself, notwithstanding there may have been one or more decisions upon the subject. But, while open for revision by that court such decisions, until reversed by it, are obligatory upon all other tribunals, and demand implicit obedience from all citizens throughout this land.

In the case of Robbins v. Shelby County it was decided that a state law imposing a tax upon commercial agents who solicited contracts for sale of property owned by citizens of another State was beyond the power of the State to enact or enforce; that it was in contravention of the constitutional provision that Congress should have the exclusive power of regulating commerce between the States, a tax upon commercial agents or drummers of one State soliciting business within another State being a tax upon interstate commerce.

It was said in argument that that decision did not cover the whole proposition, that it was limited only to discriminations which were made by the Statute of Tennessee as against the citizens of other States, and that if the law had been equally as applicable to all travelers the decision would not cover it. But an inspection of that decision shows this to be a mistaken view of the subject. The court grasped the whole matter, discussed the whole matter fully, and decided the precise point as law, as will be seen from the following quotation from the decision:

"But to tax the sale of such goods, or the offer to sell them, before they are brought into the State, is a very different thing, and seems to us clearly a tax on interstate commerce itself. It is strongly urged, as if it were a material point in the case, that no discrimination is made between domestic and foreign drummers,—those of Tennessee and those of other States,—that all are taxed alike. But that does not meet the difficulty. Interstate commerce cannot be taxed at all, even though the same amount of tax should be laid on domestic commerce, or that which is carried on solely within the State. This was decided in the case of State Freight Tax Cases, 15 Wall. 232 [82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 146]. The negotiation of sales of goods which are in another State, for the purpose of introducing them into the State in which the negotiation is made is interstate commerce. A New Orleans merchant cannot be taxed there for ordering goods from London or New York, because in the one case it is an act of foreign, and in the other of interstate commerce, both of which are subject to regulation by Congress alone."

Thus it will be seen that it does not put the decision at all upon the question of discrimination between drummers within the State and drummers outside the State; but it says that no law which imposes upon the person soliciting sales for merchants outside of the State is admissible, because that is a regulation of interstate commerce.

In connection with that decision it is well to read an extract from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Walling v. Michigan, in 116 U. S. 456 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 694], which is as follows:

"The subjects indeed upon which Congress can act under this power are of infinite variety, requiring for their sucessful management different plans or modes of treatment. Some of them are national in their character, and admit and require uniformity of regulation, affecting alike all the States; others are local, or are mere aids to commerce, and can only be properly regulated by provisions adapted to their special circumstances and localities. Of the former class may be mentioned all that portion of commerce with foreign countries or between the States which consists in the transportation, purchase, sale and exchange of commodities. Here there can of necessity be only one system or plan of regulation, and that Congress alone can prescribe. Its nonaction in such cases, with respect to any particular commodity or mode of transportation, is a declaration of its purpose that the commerce in that commodity or by that means of transportation shall be free. There would otherwise be no security against conflicting regulations of different States, each discriminating in favor of its own products and citizens, and against the products and citizens of other States. And it is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign Nations and among the States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating state legislation."

And further down on page 457 [695] it is said:

"And after an examination of the causes which led to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, one of the principal of which was the necessity for the regulation of commerce and the laying of imposts and duties by a single government, the court says: 'But whatever may be the motive for the tax, whether revenue, restriction, retaliation, or protection of domestic manufactures, it is equally a regulation of commerce, and in effect an exercise of the power of laying duties on imports; and its exercise by the States is entirely at war with the spirit of the Constitution, and would render vain and nugatory the power granted to Congress in relation to those subjects. Can any power more destructive to the union and harmony of the States be exercised than that of imposing discriminating taxes or duties on imports from other States? Whatever may be the motive for such taxes, they cannot fail to beget irritation and lead to retaliation; and it is not difficult to foresee that an indulgence in such a course of legislation must inflame and produce a state of feeling that would seek its gratification in any measures regardless of the consequences.'"

Such is the declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States, of the spirit and scope of these constitutional provisions; that they are necessary to the harmony and repose of the States; that they are necessary to the equal justice and equal privileges of the citizens of all the States of this Union; that they cannot be restricted at all; and that whatever rule is made with reference to them must be a uniform rule by the Congress of the United States acting as the National Legislature, regulating and controlling the commerce of the entire domain of the United States, with a view to do equal justice between all the parts of the country and to take away any possibility of prejudice or any suggestion of injustice or discrimination by one as against another. That being so, it is manifest that any regulation upon this subject must be a regulation by Congress, in its capacity as the National Legislature.

Now, could Congress, if it had been so disposed, have delegated to the Legislative Assembly of this District the power to pass any such law? That is not an open question in this court. In the case of The District v. Waggaman, 1 Cent. Rep. 823, 4 Mackey, 838, this court said:

"In Roach v. Van Riswick, 7 Wash. Law Rep. 496, this court held that the very broad terms in which the organic Act of 1870 granted legislative powers to the Legislative Assembly had the effect to clothe that body with only such powers as might be given to a municipal corporation, and that it was not competent for Congress to delegate the larger powers of general legislation which it had itself received from the Constitution."

We have already shown by these extracts that this subject matter belongs to the larger power of general legislation,—belongs to Congress, as the Legislature of the Nation. It could not, therefore, within this announcement, delegate any such part of its general legislative power to a municipal legislative body. It is altogether outside the scope of a municipal body to legislate on this subject.

It would be marvelous indeed if, when the Constitution strips all the States of this Union of power to legislate on this subject, it could be pretended that a municipal body could be clothed with any such faculty. If a State cannot do it, how can a body inferior to a State do it? How can it be said to be within the power of a municipal corporation, when it is not within the power of a sovereign State, to legislate upon this subject matter? It would seem sufficient to stop at this point.

But it has been said here in argument that, the Congress of the United States having the exclusive legislative power of this District of Columbia, there is no restriction upon its capacity to act as such Legislature. If the question were before the court in that aspect, it would not be difficult to say that it is a proposition that cannot be entertained by any who regard the comprehensive power of the Constitution, the object for which it was formed, or the purposes for which this District of Columbia was dedicated to national uses, to maintain that a body may be established here in legislative form, in antagonism to the rights of the various States of this Union.

This community is not even a State. It is an organized body to be legislated over by Congress alone. This District has surrendered its right of representation, and that representation is vested in Congress; but still it is vested in Congress as the National Legislature, and it is to be exercised by Congress in subordination to the principles of the Constitution of the United States. The argument, pushed to its extreme, would simply be this: Congress is without constitutional restraint as to this District; the people are helpless, and not under the sanctions or protection of the Constitution of the United States at all; the United States has here a foreign territory in which it can legislate in antagonism to the interests of the States and in opposition to the policy which prevails in the Constitution, obligatory upon the States in their intercourse one with another to do equal and exact justice, one as to the other and each as to all. Such an argument cannot have any sanction at the hands of this court. This District is set aside and dedicated to the uses of the Nation, and if there be anywhere on the face of the earth a locality where no discrimination should be made as against the rights of any of the States or any citizens of the United States, it should be upon this soil where all are equal, on which each citizen has an equal right and in which each State has an equal right, as regards all the other States and as regards the United States itself. This Territory is dedicated simply as a temple of justice, as a temple where the liberties of the Nation are to be sacredly preserved; and it is for that purpose that it should be exempt from hostile control or the possibility of antagonism with the purposes of the Union. Congress was vested with the power of exclusive legislation for this District, but not at all for the purpose of enabling it to legislate in any manner in hostility to the rights of any of the States of the Union.

Can it be supposed for an instant that any of the States would have ceded to the Government of the United States a district for the seat of its Government in which hostile legislation should be exercised towards the interests of the citizens of those States or the citizens of their sister States? We cannot suppose such a thing possible. We cannot suppose that when the Congress was vested with power to legislate over this District it was clothed with any power to act as such Legislature in hostility to the rights of the States or to do anything regarding the interests of the citizens of one State which any State of the Union could not do with regard to the citizens of any other State. We are subject to the Constitution of the United States. Here, if anywhere, the Constitution should be venerated, and the most sedulous regard should be had for each and all of its provisions, and we should rejoice that we are under its provisions; we should rejoice that we are under its protection; we should rejoice that we are set apart for the purpose of ministering to the temple of justice, the temple of "Equality of Laws" which has been established in our midst.

It seems impossible, therefore, to argue from the fact that Congress has exclusive legislation over this District that it has the power of the tyrant through this District over the States of the Union. The whole idea is inconsistent with the spirit of our institutions, utterly inconsistent with the object for which the Constitution was formed, and for which this district of country was set apart for the uses of the general government. Therefore, even if Congress had undertaken, with regard to this District, in its general capacity as the Legislature for the District, to pass such a law, it would have been outside the power of Congress so to do; because, as a National Legislature, it can only legislate under the commercial power upon the principle of uniformity, which is to pass laws equally operative upon any, every, and all parts of the Union; and therefore any discrimination in favor of this community would be in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution of the United States.

But we need not go that far for the purposes of this case. It was only necessary to speak of it for the purpose of repelling the argument, and making it be seen how we regard the relations of this community to the legislative power of Congress and to the several States of the Union. It is enough for the purposes of this cause to say that the delegated power to the Legislative Assembly of this District was the delegation only of municipal power, and that any attempt to legislate in this respect is ultra vires a municipality as it is ultra vires the power of a State of this Union.

For these reasons the court is of opinion that the prosecution was without authority; that so far as this law operates on this class of cases it is null and void, and that the prisoner must be discharged from custody.

But it is necessary to add that this decision on this branch of the law is not at all inconsistent with the decision that was made in the Case of Waggaman, where it was held that the Legislative Assembly was empowered to impose a license tax upon people doing business within the District of Columbia. All occupations which are limited to the District of Columbia are subject to the taxing power. That is what was held in that case, and there is nothing in this case at all inconsistent with it. If this party had taken out a license for the District, for the purpose of soliciting business within the District, for sales by people within the District, he might have been subject, and would have been subject, to the license law. But upon the face of this information it appears affirmatively that his exclusive business was to act as the agent of citizens of other States, soliciting contracts of sale for goods within those States, thereafter to be brought under the dominion, and within the control of the taxing power of the District. Therefore, there is no inconsistency between the two decisions. They are entirely harmonious, and there can be no difficulty in maintaining that in the aspect in which this case is presented, it is directly in the face of the decision in Robbins v. Shelby County, directly in opposition to the whole current of decisions upon the commercial power of the United States as expounded by the Supreme Court of the United States, and cannot be permitted to stand as law.

Mr. Riddle: If I apprehend this decision correctly, it leaves the law to be enforced against the citizens of the District.

Mr. Justice Merrick: Unquestionably.

Mr. Riddle: The license law can be enforced against the citizens of the District?

Mr. Justice Merrick: Against citizens of the District who are soliciting sales for people within the District. But a citizen of the District who is employed as an agent of a citizen of another State, for the purpose of selling the goods of that citizen of the other State, cannot be restrained from so doing by the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. Riddle: I quite apprehended that.

Mr. Justice Merrick: And further than that, I will say that if his business had been to solicit business as a drummer within the District, and he had mingled with it the business of the people of a State, he would be obnoxious to the law, not for soliciting business for citizens of States, but as acting as a drummer generally. But here, the information says that he is charged with doing exclusively the business of a commercial agent, soliciting and selling his goods for citizens of other States. That is the exclusive business with which he is charged, and therefore it may well stand with the other matter about which the counsel has made the inquiry.

NEW JERSEY.

Court of Chancery.

John EASTWOOD
v.
Lawrence WORRALL *et al.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage, held, on the facts, that the alleged defenses of an agreement to extend the time of payment of the mortgage and an agreement to assign the same, are not maintained.

(Decided April 12, 1887.)

Bill to foreclose a mortgage. On final hearing upon bill, answers in nature of a cross bill, replication and proofs. Decree for complainant.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. W. Hubbell, for complainant.

Mr. P. H. Gilhooly, for defendants:

The complainant's bill should be dismissed because his mortgage was not due when his suit was commenced.

The time for payment was extended for five years from February 5, 1881, by agreement in writing between the parties.

See Eastwood v. Worrall, 3 Cent. Rep. 77; 4 Cent. Rep. 91.

Hubbell admits that the bond and mortgage after execution were mailed to him by Mr. Worrall, and that he immediately inspected them and observed that they were payable in four years from February 1, 1883; he recorded them and delivered them to Eastwood, but he claimed that Mr. Worrall had changed 1881 to 1883, and that neither he nor Eastwood ever made any objection. This amounts to a ratification.

Wharton, Agency, §§ 86, 87.

Eastwood is bound by the acts of Hubbell, not only because he was his agent and attorney in this affair, but because of previous dealings between the same parties upon the same subject matter, in which Eastwood adopted all that Hubbell had done in his behalf.

Id. § 87.

The agreement made by Hubbell with Mrs. Worrall for one year additional time was upon a good consideration, and binding upon the complainant.

An agreement to extend the time of payment of a mortgage is a valid contract, and will be enforced in equity.

Bigelow v. Rommell, 9 C. E. Green, 117.

The agreement may be by parol.

Tompkins v. Tompkins, 6 C. E. Green, 338.

In this case the complainant in October, 1867, agreed to extend the time for the payment of interest until June, 1868. He filed his bill to foreclose in January, 1868; and at the February Term, 1871, his bill was dismissed because it was prematurely filed.

Jones, Mort. §§ 1189, 1190.

The complainant should be decreed to execute a written agreement to assign his bond and mortgage and all collateral securities to the defendant, Lawrence Worrall, or to such person as he shall procure to take the same, whenever the money due the complainant shall be tendered him. In this State he cannot be compelled in the absence of such agreement to assign his mortgage.

Davis v. Flagg, 8 Stew. Eq. 491.

The relief asked for in the cross bill of defendants should be granted.

Where a party agrees to assign a claim upon delivery of certain notes, and the notes are tendered, equity will enforce the performance of the contract.

Cutting v. Dana, 10 C. E. Green, 265.

So of a contract to purchase a debt.

Adderly v. Dixon, 1 Sim. & Stu. 608.

So of a contract to assign choses in action.

Pomeroy, Cont. § 20, p. 24 and notes.

So of an agreement to execute and deliver an instrument in writing.

Id. § 291.

So of covenants to renew a lease.

Fry, Spec. Perf. § 948.

So of contracts for the sale or assignment of things in action, where the legal damages might be too uncertain and conjectural to constitute an adequate compensation.

3 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. § 1402, p. 443. See note 2.

So a contract to renew a license.

Domestic Telegraph etc. Co. v. Metropolitan Telephone etc. Co. 12 Stew. Eq. 160, 164; S. C. 14 Stew. Eq. 241.

If a contract can be completely performed at the time, although there may be future acts dependent upon it, the court will be able to grant specific performance.

Fry, Spec. Perf. § 553.

A verbal agreement to plant peach trees and divide the profits has been enforced, the trees having been planted.

McKnight v. Robbins, 1 Halst. Ch. 229; affd. Id. 642.

Part performance took this case out of the Statute of Frauds.

See Adderly v. Dixon, 1 Sim. & Stu. 608.

It is settled in England that choses in action are not comprehended in the phrase "goods, wares and merchandise."

Browne, Stat. of Frauds, § 296.

In Massachusetts shares of stock are held to be within the statute, but not letters patent.

Id. §§ 296, 297.

The English rule has been adopted in New Hampshire, Indiana, Georgia and Alabama.

Wood, Fraud, § 503.

But in New Jersey this precise point does not seem to have been decided, except inferentially in Brown v. Brown, 6 Stew. Eq. 650.

In Massachusetts, Maine, Maryland, Vermont, and Connecticut, choses in action are regarded as goods, wares and merchandise. In California, Dakota, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, Minnesota, Montana, Utah, Wisconsin and Wyoming, choses in action are included in the statutory provisions; while in Alabama, Delaware, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia, the Statute of Frauds does not extend to the sale of goods, wares and merchandise.

The defendant's remedy is by cross bill.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This suit is brought to foreclose a mortgage given by Noah Worrall and Wade B. Worrall, to the complainant, January 4, 1869, upon land in the City of Elizabeth, to secure the payment of $20,000 in one year from the date of the instrument with interest. The defense is twofold; one ground is that the time for payment of the mortgage was extended in June, 1883, for the period of four years from the 5th of February in that year, in consideration of the giving by the defendants, Georgia A. Worrall, holder of the second mortgage upon the premises, and her husband, Lawrence Worrall, of a mortgage for $5,000 on her own property in Monmouth County, as collateral security for the payment of the complainant's mortgage; the other ground is that the complainant in 1881, in consideration of the giving to him by the same parties of a like collateral mortgage upon the same property of Georgia A. Worrall, agreed with them to extend the time of payment of the principal mortgage for five years from the 5th of February in that year, and also that he would accept payment of that mortgage whenever tendered to him by them, and would upon such payment assign the mortgage and the bond, the payment of which it was given to secure, with all collaterals, to anyone whom they might designate; and that he would execute an agreement binding him accordingly.

It appears that an agreement was drawn about that time and sent to the complainant to be signed by him but he did not sign it. It is said that when he received the paper he was making his preparations for a visit to Europe and that owing to press of business he did not sign it and that when he returned, finding as he alleges that Worrall and his wife had not complied with what he states was part of the terms, the payment of taxes upon the Elizabeth property, he was unwilling to sign it and in fact never did execute it and it has been lost.

The questions raised are whether the alleged extension for four years from the 5th of February, 1883, was made, and whether the complainant made the agreement to assign. The alleged agreement to assign is not proved. It may be added that the money due upon the principal mortgage has never been tendered to the complainant, and he has been willing to assign upon receiving the money, although he has denied, as he still does, that he ever made such agreement.

As to the agreement to extend the time of payment: Mr. Worrall testifies that there have been four extensions granted by the complainant, but according to his testimony there were only three; the first for one year, from January 24, 1878, to January 24, 1879, the next for three years, from January, 1879, to January, 1882, and the third for five years from the last mentioned date, i. e., to January, 1887. The bill was filed February 16, 1886.

It seems clear that there was a definite agreement between the parties for an extension of five years from either the first of January or 6th of February, 1881, in consideration of the giving of the $10,000 collateral mortgage. Mr. Hubbell, who was the attorney for the complainant in that matter, says in his testimony that the extension was for five years from the 6th of February, 1881, but in his letter of May 12, 1883, to Mr. Worrall he says that the complainant "recognizes the agreement already made providing for a five years' extension from January 1, 1881;" and in a subsequent letter to the same person dated May 22, 1883, he refers to the extension as one of five years from January 1, 1881.

The complainant in the replication says that the extension was from February 5, 1881, and he seems to have thought so when he testified in the cause.

On the other hand, Mr. Worrall testifies that the five years' extension was from the month of January. The discrepancy as to the month in which the extension began is not material. The important question is as to the year. The $10,000 collateral bond and mortgage which were given in pursuance of that agreement were dated February 5, 1881, and were made payable in five years from that date. It is very noteworthy that Mr. Worrall did not deny, nor did he in any way protest against or seek to correct or even refer to the statements in the letters just mentioned, that the extension was for five years from January 1, 1881, but passed them by in silence. Nor does he give any plausible reason for not speaking of them. It may be added that in the answers, both of which are sworn to in pursuance of the call of the bill, it is stated that the agreement was that the time should be extended for the term of five years from the 5th day of February, 1883, and further that the principal debt will not be due until the 5th of February, 1888. They are both sworn to by Mr. Worrall.

These statements are contrary to his testimony upon the subject. He says, however, that they are erroneous and that the mistake is due to a clerical error. Nor do the collateral bond and mortgage for $5,000 which were given in 1883, considered in the light of the evidence in reference to them, support the claim that the extension was until 1887. Those instruments were drawn by Mr. Hubbell. As drawn by him the bond was payable in four years from February 5, 1883, and the mortgage stated that the money would be payable in four years from February 5, 1881, and it stated that such was the condition of the bond. Mr. Worrall altered the mortgage before execution, by changing that statement therein so as to conform to the statement in the condition of the bond.

Mr. Hubbell says he cannot account for those errors in the bond and mortgage, and that he did not perceive them until the papers were returned to him executed, and that he then regarded the mistakes as of no importance practically, because the bond and mortgage were given merely as collateral security. In his letter of May 12, 1883, before referred to, in which Mr. Hubbell asked for a collateral bond and mortgage for $5,000, he said that if such bond and mortgage were given, the complainant would execute an agreement not to call for the principal (of the principal mortgage) in five years from January 1, 1881, provided that the interest and taxes should be paid in the meanwhile; and added that (as before stated) the complainant recognized the agreement already made providing for a five years' extension from January 1, 1881, but that the complainant insisted that it was upon condition that the interest and taxes should be paid, and that as the taxes for 1881 and 1882 had not been paid, and the total amount of taxes and assessments had been allowed to exceed by the sum of $900 the market value of the bonds (Alabama State bonds which in 1879 Worrall had deposited with the complainant to answer for the payment of taxes upon the property) held by the complainant as security, the agreement was forfeited.

The $5,000 bond and mortgage were given in pursuance of that application and proposition; and the evidence leads to the conclusion that they were given in order to obtain not a new and further extension, but the benefit of the extension of 1881 which in consideration of the giving of such collateral security the complainant was willing to recognize and accord. The evidence does not establish the defense that the bill was filed prematurely.

There will be a decree for the complainant, in accordance with this decision.

Tyler R. BLAKE
Mary J. GARWOOD et al.

1. A mortgagor cannot maintain a bill to interplead against one who claims, as agent of the owner of the mortgage under a power of attorney, to be entitled to the money due thereon, and against a daughter of such owner who forbids the mortgagor to pay the money to such agent on the ground of the mental incapacity of the owner when she executed the power of attorney, without joining such owner as a party to the bill.
2. The agency was revoked or inoperative, when such owner became incapacitated, to all who had notice of the fact, and therefore such alleged agent has no claim to the money, and there is no foundation for the bill to interplead.

BILL of interpleader.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. S. Clymer, for complainant.

Mr. B. D. Shreve, for defendant Garwood.

Mr. M. B. Taylor, for defendant Cox.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

This bill is styled an interpleader. It is filed by a mortgagor. He admits the execution of the mortgage, and that there is a certain amount due. He says that Mrs. Ross, the owner of the mortgage, is incapacitated, from age or other causes, to take the money due; that Cox claims to be her agent by virtue of a power of attorney, and as such entitled to the money, and claims the money of him; that Garwood is a daughter of Mrs. Ross, and forbids him to pay said money to Cox because Mrs. Ross was of unsound mind when she executed said power of attorney, and prays that said Cox and Garwood may interplead and settle their rights, and that he may pay the money due into court, and be dismissed with his costs, and for subpena against Cox and Garwood only.

Mrs. Ross is not made a party. The case must rest here until she is brought in. Her insanity is no excuse. Her insanity or imbecility makes it all the more necessary for the court to have her in court. The method of bringing the unfortunate into court is well known.

Perhaps, under the circumstances of the case, I will be justified in saying that I cannot see why Cox or Garwood is brought into court. The bill proceeds on the ground that Mrs. Ross is insane or mentally incapacitated to contract, and that Cox was once her agent, and claims to still be. Supposing him to have been an agent, and supposing Mrs. Ross to be incapable to contract, then clearly, on the best of reasons and highest authority, that agency was revoked, or inoperative when she become incapacitated, to all who had notice of the fact. Matthiessen etc. Refining Co. v. McMahon, 9 Vroom, 536; Hill v. Day, 7 Stew. Eq. 150.

Therefore Cox is an utter stranger to the complainant, who, from the complainant's own showing, has not the slightest claim against him.

If I am correct in these views, and in my understanding of the law, there is no foundation for the bill to interplead.

If the defendants ask for it, I shall advise a decree dismissing the bill. And I will refuse to advise any decree in favor of the complainant, until Mrs. Ross is before the court. I do not mean to be understood as saying that this bill can be so fashioned as to stand.

Ira YAGER.

Where in a warranty deed of land the grantee assumes and agrees to pay certain bonds and mortgages on the property, as part of the purchase money, he becomes the principal debtor, and equity will compel him to discharge the obligation.

BILL to compel the grantee of realty to discharge a mortgage thereon assumed by him. Decree for complainant.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. S. Appleget, for complainant.

Mr. Wm. Clark, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

The complainant sold to defendant a tract of land for $4,000. In the deed was this clause:

"And the said Ira Yager doth assume two certain bonds and mortgages, held on said property, one held by Jacob Fisher for $500, and one held by John F. Applegate for $2,300, which sums the said Yager is to pay, and is deducted from the said purchase money."

The deed contains covenants of warranty. The deed was executed and delivered in 1869. The defendant immediately took possession of the land, but neglects to pay the balance due the mortgagees.

Yager became the principal debtor and Cubberly the surety, in the judgment of law. In such case equity will compel the principal to discharge the obligation. Irick v. Black, 2 C. E. Green, 189; Marsh v. Pike, 1 Sandf. Ch. 210; 10 Paige, 595.

I think the complainant is entitled to the aid of the court in compelling the defendant to discharge this obligation. He must pay the whole balance due. I cannot determine the amount due, as the holders of the mortgages are not before the court, and they have a right to be heard. But it is the business of the defendant to know the amount due, and to pay it.

There ought to be a decree in accordance with these views, with costs.

John M. HARPER
v.
Archibald C. McELROY.

1. On a bill by a lessee for an injunction to restrain the grantees of his landlord from trespassing on one of two lots which he claims he rented, but for which the alleged trespasser has a conveyance in fee, there being a serious dispute between the complainant and his landlord, whether or not such lot was included in the verbal agreement to rent, and it being plain that the complainant had only a license to pass over such lot, held, that the order to show cause should be discharged, with costs.

2. An injunction will not issue unless the complainant's right to the subject matter in dispute, and also to the remedy, is clear. If there be reasonable or serious doubt, the injunction will be denied.

ORDER to show cause why an injunction should not issue to restrain trespassing and the cutting of trees. Discharged.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Meredith and Mr. B. Stockton, for complainant.

Mr. F. Voorhees, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

The bill in this case is presented by a lessee, asking for an injunction to restrain the grantee of his landlord from trespassing on one of two lots which he claims he rented, but for which the alleged trespasser has a deed of conveyance in fee. The complainant did rent one lot, and insists that he also rented the adjoining lot, which extends from the rear of the first one to the Delaware River. This last one has been conveyed, and the purchaser has entered upon it, and has cut a sycamore tree and two pines. He has also commenced excavations for a house cellar. It is declared that the defendant threatens other similar acts of trespass.

It is admitted that an injunction will not issue unless the complainant's right to the subject matter in dispute, and also to the remedy, is clear. If there be reasonable or serious doubt, his prayer will be denied. The cases on this point are collected in Stewart, Dig. p. 620, §§ 13, 15.

This plain and most valuable rule forbids that I should make the order in this case absolute. There is a serious dispute between the complainant and his landlord, whether the rear lot was included in the verbal agreement to rent or not. The landlord is very emphatic that it was not, and says that he only gave the complainant permission to pass over the rear lot to the river. I think it appears that the rear lot was, all of the time, offered for sale; that the complainant not only knew this fact, but had made offers for it, or made inquiries about the price.

These facts make one thing only quite plain, which is that the complainant had a license simply to pass over the rear lot to the river, which was revocable, at any time, by the owner. If he acquired any other right by his agreement, it is not established before me.

This view renders it wholly unnecessary for me to decide whether the trees cut were ornamental shade trees or not, and whether the threat to cut others should be restrained by injunction or not.

I will advise that the order to show cause be discharged, with costs.

To a bill filed for the construction of a will of real estate, the heirs at law of the testator are necessary parties.

DEMURRER to a bill for the construction of a will. Allowed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. H. Morrow, for demurrant.

Mr. L. DeWitt Taylor, contra.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

The demurrer is for want of parties. The bill is filed for the construction of a will, in and by which the testator attempts to dispose of his real and personal estate. One of the questions is whether he has succeeded in disposing of the former or not. If not, his heirs at law are interested.

The legatees and devisees named in the will are made parties, but the heirs at law of the testator are not. It is said that it does not appear but that the legatees and devisees are his only heirs at law. This, I think, might be answered by saying that they are not made parties as heirs at law, but only as legatees or devisees; consequently, they would not, as heirs at law, be bound. I understand the rule to be that you must present the party to the court in the precise capacity in which you wish to charge or bind him. See Wade v. Miller, 3 Vroom, 296; Kirkpatrick v. Corning, 11 Stew. Eq. 234.

The demurrer must be allowed with costs.

Wilbur N. WICKHAM et al.

A judgment creditor of a mortgagor, who is made a defendant in a suit to foreclose the mortgage, may compel the mortgagee complainant, who took possession under his mortgage before such defendant obtained his judgment, to account for the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises.

MOTION to strike out parts of an answer to a bill to foreclose a mortgage. Denied.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. C. Fisk, for the motion.

Mr. H. V. Condict, contra.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The complainant files a bill to foreclose a mortgage on the lands of one of the defendants. Another defendant, Newkirk, who was made a party because he had obtained a judgment against the mortgagor, answers and says that the complainant is in possession of the mortgaged premises, and has been for a long time, and that he should account for the rents and profits.

So much of the answer as relates to this possession and accounting the complainant moves to strike out. He rests this motion on the ground that he took the possession under his mortgage long before the defendant obtained his judgment, which act of taking possession so destroyed the mortgagor's equity of redemption that nothing of interest was left in the mortgagor that the judgment could become a lien upon; and consequently, having no lien, he is not entitled to be heard in his effort to compel the mortgagee in possession to account. It is said that this resistance is fully supported by the case of Ketchum v. Johnson, 3 Green, Ch. 370, 377.

In that case it is said: "By the English law the equity of redemption, even if the mortgagor remain in possession, cannot be sold on execution at law; but in this country it is otherwise. The mortgage is deemed with us a mere security for a debt, and the property may be sold by execution, subject to the lien. It may well be doubted, however, whether this is so when the mortgagee is in possession, for if the mortgagor surrenders that, the position of things is materially changed. The entry of the mortgagee, or a foreclosure, puts a new aspect on the rights of the parties. Before entry or foreclosure it is held that the equity of redemption may be sold on execution against the mortgagor, but not afterwards. Then the legal title in the mortgage becomes the subject of a sale by execution against him. This is the doctrine recognized in Jackson v. Willard,* 4 Johns. 42; Collins v. Torrey,* 7 Johns. 282."

Accepting the law as thus expounded, the inquiry is not ended. The whole case is not met. The inquiry does not cease with the determination of the question whether or not the judgment creditor can find things tangible on which to levy; for equity often aids a judgment creditor when his law execution is wholly unavailing. Indeed, this seems to be a highly favored and most useful branch of equity jurisprudence. On every hand creditors are seen coming to this tribunal to have their judgments at law satisfied out of equitable interests of the defendants.

In this very case the defendant mortgagor has rights; manifestly equities exist between him and the complainant, else why is the complainant here in court? Why does he file his bill to foreclose? Undoubtedly, to cut off or bar the right of redemption which the mortgagor still has. "Once a mortgage always a mortgage."

I cannot conceive of such a thing as a mortgage or pledge without the right to redeem the thing pledged. But the complainant treats the title under which he has possession as a mortgage; and all the equities which the mortgagor ever had he still has, among which is the right to an account from the mortgagee in possession, extending to all the rents and profits. This is such familiar law that I will not cite authorities.

Therefore, it seems to follow as a matter of course that the judgment creditor of the mortgagor is likewise entitled to an account. It is simply a question of the amount due upon the mortgage of the complainant. It can make no difference whatever how he has been paid, if paid at all, whether by the cash of the defendant mortgagor, or by the products of his lands subject to the mortgage. In such cases the law does not bar the creditor, if the mortgagor refuses or declines to demand the account; the law permits the creditor to make it. Were it otherwise, debtors would find the most abundant protection against the just demands of their creditors, not only from executions at law, but from all proceedings in equity.

I will advise an order denying the motion to strike out, with costs.

MOTION to dismiss bill of interpleader. Granted.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. S. Appleget, for the motion.

Mr. C. T. Cowenhoven, contra.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The complainant, by the bill, states that a mortgage was given upon certain land to secure the payment of $3,801 and interest to Eliza Pullen, widow, and William A. Pullen, Catharine A. Applegate, Caroline Berrien, Emma Rogers and George E. Pullen; the interest to Eliza Pullen for life, and the principal, at her death, to be equally divided among the others; that he purchased the land, subject to the mortgage, and assumed the payment thereof; that Eliza Pullen, to whom the interest was payable for life, and on whose death the principal was payable to the others, is dead, and that he is ready to pay the principal, but cannot safely do so, because of conflicting claims to the money; that Catharine A. Applegate and her husband are dead; that she left children, who claim her share, and that the defendant, John Berrien, pretends to be her administrator, and has notified the complainant not to pay the money, due on the mortgage, to anyone; and that he, Berrien, claims an interest in the share to which Mrs. Applegate would be entitled if she were now living.

Not only are Berrien and the children of Mrs. Applegate parties to the bill, but the other persons who are entitled to shares of the fund, William A. Pullen, Caroline Berrien, Emma Rogers and George E. Pullen, are made parties also. And the complainant asks leave to pay into court, not merely the share of Mrs. Applegate, but the whole fund; and he prays, not that Berrien and Mrs. Applegate's children may interplead as to her share, but that the defendants may interplead as to the whole fund. William A. Pullen, Caroline Berrien, Emma Rogers and George E. Pullen now move to dismiss the bill. It is clear that it has no equity as to them. The controversy as to Mrs. Applegate's share cannot justly affect any interest of theirs in the fund. They have no interest whatever in that dispute, nor have they any in the subject of it. They make no claim to that share, and the complainant might safely pay their shares over to them.

The bill states, indeed, that Berrien has notified the complainant, in writing, not to pay the money due on the mortgage to anyone; but it also states that his claim is confined to Mrs. Applegate's share, and that the opposing claim is that of her children to that share. According to the bill, there is no controversy as to the other shares.

Nor is the alleged claim of Berrien so stated as to warrant a decree of interpleader. The bill states that he claims to be the administrator of Mrs. Applegate, and also that he claims an interest in her share; but it does not state what that interest is, nor how it was obtained, whether by assignment or how otherwise. But it does state that he claims that the share is due to him personally, and that it is also due to him as administrator of Mrs. Applegate. According to that statement, the share might safely be paid over to him as administrator.

In a bill of interpleader, the claims should be specifically set forth, so that they may appear to be of the same nature and character, and the fit subject of a bill of interpleader. Story, Eq. Pl. § 293; Mohawk etc. R. R. Co. v. Clute, 4 Paige, 384.

The bill will be dismissed.

William A. BOYER et al.

1. A mortgagee who has assigned the bond and mortgage before any payment of interest is due, cannot, in a suit to foreclose the mortgage for default in payment of interest, be permitted to put in the defense to the suit that before the assignment the interest was settled with him but not indorsed, as against the purchaser who had no knowledge of such payment.
2. (Filed —— — 1886.)

BILL to foreclose a mortgage. Decree for complainant.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. D. J. Pancoast and J. Willard Morgan, for complainant.

Mr. C. T. Reed, for Dickson and Boyer.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

Frederick J. Gilling, being a member of the Association above named, borrowed therefrom $800, and gave his bond and mortgage to secure the repayment thereof, dated March 31, 1876.

On December 19, A. D. 1878, said Gilling, being indebted (so it is alleged) to the defendant, James F. Dickson, in the sum of $2,000, executed to him a bond and mortgage on the lands named in the bill of complaint, to secure the repayment thereof. The condition was that the bond should be paid in five years, with interest, semi-annually, at 6 per cent, but in case default in the payment of interest should be made for thirty days, then the principal should be considered due.

On March 5, 1879, before the first six months' interest fell due, Dickson assigned this bond and mortgage to the complainant, first, as collateral security for the payment by said Gilling of the balance due on his bond; and second, to retain, out of any moneys that may be recovered on said bond, the sum of $500, and to pay the same to Cooper, Stone & Co., on account of a judgment against the said Gilling, and to pay the balance to said Dickson.

This bill is filed to foreclose the mortgage given to Dickson and assigned to complainant, and expressly charges that no part of the interest has been paid. Of course, the five years not having elapsed, the right of the complainant to bring his suit rested wholly upon this allegation. The only defense attempted by the evidence and the argument of the counsel was that the whole amount of the interest for the five years had been paid, although not indorsed on the bond. James F. Dickson and William H. Boyer, a subsequent purchaser, answer, and meet the charge of nonpayment of interest, if answered at all, in these words:

"That these answering defendants have in all particulars complied with the condition of said $2,000 bond and mortgage, and charges that the same is not due and owing until December, 1883."

In his testimony Dickson says the interest on this bond was paid for the five years between the making thereof in December, 1878, and the assignment to complainant in March, 1879, by a settlement between himself and Gilling of their accounts, but no indorsement of such payment was made on the bond.

Supposing the answer is sufficiently responsive to the charge in the bill that no interest has been paid; such a defense cannot justly come from the lips of Dickson, who made the assignment. The law imposes silence on him. He cannot be permitted to send the man with whom he deals on such a trail, and when he has gone a long distance at great expense, not only to call a halt but demand a return.

And where stands Mr. Boyer? Is he in a position to claim any benefit from the alleged payment of interest? Under the circumstances, I think not. It does not appear, by the answer or otherwise, that he paid one dollar for the premises. He alleges that he purchased, subject alone to the said bond and mortgage, for $2,000. He does not allege that the interest then due had been paid, nor that he was told it had been paid, nor that he supposed or believed it had been paid, nor that he in any way assumed the payment of the bond or any part of it. I can see nothing in the case that raises the slightest equity between Boyer and the complainant in favor of Boyer.

Besides, the testimony shows most satisfactorily that the bond and mortgage created no legal liability in equity as between Gilling and Dickson. It was a scheme devised to aid Gilling, and was without any other consideration than such aid. And I am very clear in the conviction that the alleged credit of five years' interest on the $2,000 (being $600), on settlement of their accounts, almost immediately after the mortgage was executed, had no other consideration than friendship, or some prospective advantage to Gilling as betweeen himself and his creditors in case it became convenient to interpose it for that purpose; and that neither party relied upon the bond and mortgage as an evidence of liability as between themselves, nor upon the alleged credit of interest as a discharge in their mutual accounts; but if I should be mistaken in this last, it would be highly inequitable to allow their negligence or indifference to be pleaded when others have been misled thereby.

There is no fact or circumstance in the case which calls for an application of the rule of law that an assignee of a mortgage takes it subject to all equities between the prior parties thereto, insisted upon by the counsel of defendants.

I shall advise a decree for the complainant, with costs.

Jennie E. NEILSON, Admrx. of John Neilson, Deceased,

v.

Ira D. WILLIAMS and Wife.

1. One of two sureties of a guardian of an infant who has paid a judgment in the orphans' court against his principal, fixing the amount due from him as guardian, may file a bill to compel his cosurety to pay one half of such amount and to make disclosures respecting the conveyance of his property, without first obtaining a judgment at law against his cosurety.
2. A promise by one to his intended wife before marriage: that all he had or might have was to be hers, is not sufficient consideration for a deed made by him to her fourteen years after marriage and after he had failed.

BILL in equity to enforce contribution by a cosurety on a guardian's bond. Decree for complainant.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. S. Clymer, for complainant.

Mr. C. G. Garrison, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

Mathews was appointed a guardian of infants, and John Neilson and Ira D. Williams became his sureties. Mathews became insolvent. The orphans' court, upon an accounting, found that there were in his hands and due to the wards $829.99, which he failed to pay. The complainant's intestate offered to pay his half of the amount so found due to the infants, and there is some proof that Williams, the other bondsman, agreed with Neilson to pay the other half. This, however, is denied by Williams, which, in my judgment, is not decisive of the case.

The bond was prosecuted and judgment recovered thereon against the obligors. Execution was issued, the property of Neilson levied upon, when he paid the whole amount that remained due. Thus it will be observed that Neilson, one of the sureties, discharged the entire obligation by paying the $829.99, the amount which was adjudged to be due from the guardian by the judgment of the orphans' court, together with the interest and costs of the judgment at law.

Neilson's administratrix brings this suit to recover from Williams, his cosurety, the one half of the amount of money which he has so paid, as well the one half which he voluntarily paid after the judgment of the orphans' court against his principal, as the one half of what he was compelled to pay after the judgment at law against him and his cosurety. In order to success in this direction, he found it necessary to compel discovery by the defendants. This he attempted to do by leave of Mr. Justice Parker, in the circuit court, under which such discovery was made as to induce her to file this bill. In the bill, she alleges that Williams was possessed of real estate, and that after this liability was incurred and the inability of the guardian to pay had been made certain, he conveyed his lands to his wife for the purpose of preventing the complainant from collecting the amount equitably due from him.

As I understood the counsel for the defendants, three objections are made to any decree against them: first, the complainant has no standing in court; second, the conveyance was not fraudulent, but bona fide, and for a valuable consideration; and third, a tender was made for the one half of the judgment at law, including costs and interests, and the cost of these proceedings up to the time of the tender, which was refused. The propositions thus involved we will consider.

Has the complainant a right to institute these proceedings? In other words, Has the court jurisdiction of the case made by the bill? It is urged that the want of jurisdiction arises from the absence of any judgment at law in favor of the complainant against the defendant. This objection, I think, beyond question, must fail so far as concerns the judgment at law on the bond against all the obligors. Surely this court would not require the idle process of establishing again by a judgment in a court of law the obligation which one of these parties is under to the other, since the statute authorizes a court at law to proceed without any such additional adjudication; and the force of this, I think, is conceded in the fact that a tender was made. I conclude that the court has jurisdiction of the case made by the bill.

Other things being established, Can this court, in this proceeding, compel the defendants to make disclosure of their transactions which are alleged to be fraudulent, in order to secure the payment of the amount which was voluntarily paid by Neilson after the judgment of the orphans' court finding the amount due, without also obtaining a judgment of a court of law determining the amount due as between the sureties? It seems to me this should be answered in the affirmative. A judgment is not always necessary. It was so determined by the chancellor in Haston v. Castner, 2 Stew. Eq. 536, and by the court of errors and appeals in the same case, 4 Stew. Eq. 697.

In that case the complainants had filed their claims under the statute, with an executor. The estate in the hands of the executor proving insufficient to discharge all the debts for which the testator was liable in his lifetime, the complainants filed their bill to set aside certain conveyances which had been made by the testator in his lifetime to two of his children. No judgment was obtained upon the claims presented by the creditors, who were afterwards complainants in this court. Under the circumstances it was held that a judgment at law was not necessary. Without more, I think the spirit of the rule thus established ought to control this case.

But we have a case decided by the chancellor, and reviewed by the court of errors and appeals, more nearly like the one in hand. I refer to the case of Shurts v. Howell, 3 Stew. Eq. 418, and 4 Stew. Eq. 796.

That case came before the chancellor after the case of Haston v. Castner, and was reviewed by the court of errors and appeals at the same time at which they disposed of Haston v. Castner. Shurts was the executor of Aller, and Aller and Howell were sureties to Wilcox on his bond as guardian. Wilcox became insolvent. The orphans' court found and adjudged that he had in his hands $3,285. Aller's administrator paid the whole amount with interest. Howell refused to contribute in his lifetime, and after his death his administrator refused to contribute. Howell in his lifetime had made an assignment of a bond and mortgage to his daughter. Aller's administrator filed a bill asking the court to declare that assignment fraudulent. The assignee of the mortgage and the administrator were made parties. There was a demurrer to the bill; one of the points urged was the absence of a judgment at law. The demurrer was overruled. In that case the proceedings show that the orphans' court had fixed, by its judgment, the extent of the liability of the guardian. The court of errors adopted the views of the chancellor. It seems to me that the rule there laid down is reasonable and just, and that any other would impose unnecessary hardships, risks and delays.

Looking at the case in hand, the judgment of the orphans' court fixed the amount due from the guardian. The judgment was not appealed from; and so long as it is not attacked for fraud or mistake I think it should be accepted as conclusive upon the sureties of the guardian. Hence, a judgment at law was unnecessary before the complainant filed this bill, in order to compel the cosurety to pay one half of the amount which the complainant's decedent had voluntarily paid, and to make disclosures respecting the conveyance of his property.

Look now at the question respecting the consideration: it is said that, prior to the marriage of Williams and his wife, he promised that all he had, or that all he had or might have, was to be hers. I think this must go for naught. The marriage took place in 1866, but there was no conveyance until after the emergency created by the failure of Mathews in 1880. To my mind this removes all doubt. But besides, Mrs. Williams says she did not know but that she would have married Mr. Williams anyhow. To accept of such an allegation, sustained only by the verbal testimony of the parties themselves, after the lapse of eighteen years, I think would be most dangerous, and wholly contrary to the policy of the law.

If I am correct in the foregoing views, the question of tender need not be considered; for, manifestly, the whole amount due was not tendered.

I think it is my plain duty to advise a decree for the complainant, in accordance with the prayer of her bill, with costs.

Charles F. FITCH
v.
Elizabeth M. T. BROWER et al.

Where a maker of a note desires to pay the amount due on it to the person entitled to receive it, but one person claims the amount of it by virtue of a transfer to him before maturity and another claims it by virtue of an attachment and claims that the former is not a bona fide holder, held, that such maker is entitled to a bill of interpleader, to settle the question who is entitled to receive such payment.

MOTION to dissolve injunction and dismiss bill of interpleader. Denied.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. Y. Johnson, for the motion.

Mr. C. F. Fitch, contra.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

This bill is an interpleader. The question is: At the time of filing the bill, were there such claims upon the complainant, as a stake holder, as justified him in coming into this court for aid?

The complainant resides in New Jersey, the defendant Brower in New York, and the defendant The Express Publishing Company in Pennsylvania. The complainant purchased a printing press of the Campbell Printing Press & Manufacturing Company, of New York, and gave his note therefor, dated October 9, 1882, payable in three months, for $1,050.10 at the Philipsburg National Bank.

On October 19, 1882, the said The Express Publishing Company issued an attachment out of the court in Pennsylvania, against the said Campbell Printing Press Company, and had it served on the complainant, who happened at the time to be within the jurisdiction of that court.

By virtue of this attachment the plaintiff therein claimed to have seized upon and attached, under the law, all the right, title and interest of the said The Campbell Printing Press Company in or to the said note, it being served in due form upon this complainant. This suit in attachment is still pending and undetermined. The defendant therein, the Campbell Printing Press Company, refuses to make any defense to said action in attachment.

But the same note was transferred to Brower, and, as far as it appears, for a valuable consideration, and before maturity. This fact was communicated to the complainant, January 10, 1883, after which he was informed that the said note was transferred on December 9, 1882, about six weeks after the attachment had been issued and served.

The complainant offered to pay Brower the amount due upon the note, provided she would indemnify him against the attachment; but on this proposition they did not finally agree.

The bill alleges that complainant immediately informed the said The Campbell Printing Press Company of the service of said writ of attachment.

The complainant says he is desirous of paying the amount due on the note to the person entitled to receive it. But he says that while the defendant Brower claims the amount due on said note by virtue of the transfer before its maturity, the said The Express Publishing Company also claims it by virtue of said attachment, and insists that, although she (Brower) took the note before maturity, she is not a bona fide holder.

Brower has commenced suit in New Jersey against Fitch, the complainant, for the recovery of the amount due on the note.

These are the complications which lead to the filing of this bill. Do they make a case? The parties defendant have answered. After the answers were in, it was agreed between counsel that a motion should be made, as on demurrer, to dismiss the bill for want of equity. Counsel were heard.

I thought then that this case came so nearly within Briant v. Reed, 1 McCart. 271, that I ought to follow it. I thought a cautious man would not feel safe in paying either claimant.

But counsel for Brower came in and urged a rehearing. It was thought the court had misunderstood the force of the argument on one important point, viz.: that the note which represented the rights or interests which were attached was payable at Phillipsburgh, New Jersey, and not in Pennsylvania, where the attachment issued, and that these things being so, the attachment did not and could not bind Fitch, in any sense, and that he was not and could not, by any legal procedure, be placed under any obligations to the plaintiff in attachment.

Then it appears that, on the first discussion, two points were urged: the one above stated, which it is thought the court did not fully comprehend, and also that a note duly transferred to a bona fide holder before maturity is not the subject of an attachment. The latter proposition is not disputed, so far as I am aware. It seems to be very reasonable, and in strict accord with the law governing commercial paper. But I thought it did not devolve on the complainant to show that Brower was such bona fide holder for value. I thought the law did not impose such a burden on him. I thought that he might justly ask this court to help him in this regard, and that this court would be justified in compelling both claimants to stay their hands as against Fitch, until they should settle that question, as to the bona fides of the transfer, between themselves.

I thought then that there was difficulty enough on the other point to warrant me in retaining the bill; and I still think the bill should stand. My mind does not rest so contentedly on this branch of the case as on the other; but I have been and am impressed with the view that these attachment proceedings, having been served on the defendant, create such a claim as also to bring the case within the learned opinion in Briant v. Reed.

It is not what I might or what any other judge might decide, under the facts as given, as to the very right of the parties in the law, but whether there is such a claim made as ought to impel this court to say, to the parties claiming: "You must settle this between yourselves." I might believe that the law is with Brower, and that it would be safe for me to dismiss this bill and thereby send the complainant to contest the demand of the plaintiff in the attachment in another State; but then, since this point has not been decided in either New Jersey or in Pennsylvania, I might possibly be in error, which again, as I think, brings the case within Briant v. Reed.

The counsel of Brower says that Fitch gave his note, which Brower holds, and that the note is made payable at Phillipsburgh, a place outside of the jurisdiction in which the attachment issued, and that it is necessarily beyond the power of the court in a foreign jurisdiction to change the terms of the contract, and to compel Fitch to pay anywhere else than at Phillipsburgh. The attachment proceedings, it is urged, are a nullity as to the amount due upon the note, and so absolutely so as to dissipate the thought that the plaintiff therein makes any claim whatever against Fitch worthy of the attention of this court.

In Tingley v. Bateman, 10 Mass. 343, in Nye v. Liscombe, 21 Pick. 263, and in other cases in Massachusetts and New Hampshire and Vermont, under their statutes, the question raised has been decided in accordance with the view of Brower's counsel.

But it has not been settled, as I understand the law, in Pennsylvania, in such a way as to leave no room for doubt. I admit the reasonableness of the rule. I think it ought to be adopted in general terms. I think the views expressed as to commercial paper, in Drake on Attachments, see chap. 28, § 573, etc., are just; but the labors of that learned editor most conclusively show how wide is the field of discussion generally, and how divergent are the views of the different courts in the Union as to the attachability of commercial paper.

And as to the exact point now pending (the attachability of a note payable, in its very terms, outside of the jurisdiction issuing the writ), the views of the same author are reasonably convincing; see chap. 19, § 47, etc., but, as intimated above, that very important question is not, even in Pennsylvania, beyond the domain of legal controversy. I am not sure that this complainant could resist the attachment in Pennsylvania, on the ground that it was payable in New Jersey by its very terms, notwithstanding, I say, I think it ought so to be. The bill shows that the note was still in the hands of the defendant in attachment at the time the writ issued. It also shows that the said defendant knew of the existence of the attachment, and of its service on this complainant. There are cases which declare that, after such knowledge, the defendant could not assign or transfer the note without fraud. But the bill also declares that the assignee took the note with knowledge.

Now, then, under these complications of facts and allegations (which allegations, on this motion, I must take as facts), and the uncertain or contrary declarations of the Courts of Pennsylvania on the subject of such attachments, ought this court of equity, in New Jersey, to compel one of its citizens to take his chances before a foreign tribunal, and thereby settle these conflicting claims?

In the first place, in Ludlow v. Bingham, 4 Dall. 47 [4 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 736], the court said commercial paper could not be attached before it became due.

But in Kieffer v. Ehler, 18 Pa. 388, it was determined that such note could be attached in the hands of the maker before maturity, subject to the rights of a bona fide holder before such maturity.

In Childs v. Digby, 24 Pa. 23, 27, the court says that anyone having the possession of goods or effects may surrender them in obedience to a judgment in a foreign attachment, although he may happen to be in a foreign jurisdiction at the time the writ issued.

But this case is criticised in the same court; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Pennock, 51 Pa. 244, 253; and, I should suppose, would not be followed in that State. But, in the last case referred to, the thing sought to be attached was a chattel, and not a mere credit, as in the case in hand. And the court said that if the thing attached were the proceeds of the goods (a credit), instead of the goods, a different question would be presented.

Noble v. Thompson Oil Co. 79 Pa. 354, is very much relied on; but in that case the discussion was more particularly on the precedence to be given to an assignment in Pennsylvania, or to an attachment in New York. Certain general principles are recognized in the case, as they are everywhere. The case does not decide that Fitch would not, in any event, be bound as garnishee, since the obligation which he was under to the defendant in attachment was to be discharged in New Jersey, by its very terms.

It still seems to me that this is a fair case for an interpleader bill; that there is such reasonable doubt arising from this claim as to justify the court in requiring the defendants to settle it, and not to put the complainant to the risk and cost. It is not the mere assertion of the right, without more; but it is a claim through the process of a court which has jurisdiction, by statute, in such cases, generally; and I think the defendants in this suit should proceed to determine whether, in this case, such court has acquired jurisdiction of the thing sought to be attached or not, so as to compel Fitch to pay as garnishee or otherwise. In other words, there is the same sort of claim as controlled Chancellor Green in Briant v. Reed, supra.

BILL for an injunction to restrain the sale of certain real estate. Granted.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. M. Robeson, for complainant.
Mr. W. H. Morrow, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

In 1879 the complainant joined with her husband in conveying the title to certain lands to her father, and the father at once conveyed them back to the complainant. In 1883 the complainant's husband and his brother, as partners, became indebted to the defendants, Greer and Larison, who recovered judgments, issued executions, and levied upon the land included in the above conveyances, as the land of the complainant's husband. They threaten to sell the same. This bill is filed to restrain such sale.

The defendants insist that if there was any such conveyance, the deeds were not recorded, and that they had no notice of them; and that, therefore, the conveyances are no bar.

The complainant says that the same day that the deeds were executed and delivered, she caused them to be mailed to the clerk of common pleas of the county, with a request to record the same, and to inform her of the necessary charges therefor, and also promised to remit the amount of such charges on the receipt of such information. She also says that the defendants had actual notice.

The deeds reached the clerk's office. They were received by him. He neither recorded them nor indorsed them in any manner. He says they were "pigeon holed." He says it was his custom to receive and record all deeds from persons whom he knew to be responsible, whether the fees for recording were paid or not; but if he did not know the party who deposited the deed for record, he would not record it until the fees had been paid, but would "pigeon hole" it.

I am not satisfied that the deeds were "lodged" with the clerk, for record, within the true meaning of the Act; and yet there are very good grounds for holding that they were so lodged, and that the clerk had no right, without more, to put them in a private place. It is the duty of the clerk to record the deeds lodged with him for that purpose; and it is the duty of the grantee to pay him therefor the fees allowed by law. I do not discover by the Act that the clerk can refuse to record until the fees are paid.

The obligation of the respective parties is not fixed in order of time by the law; but it would seem reasonable to require the payment of the fees in the first instance, since the statute imposes a penalty on the clerk for any neglect, and subjects him to a liability for all damages which any party may sustain for the nonperformance of any duty.

But I think the defendants are barred because they had actual or direct notice through their attorney or agent, Mr. Fisher. Mr. Dickerson, Mr. Fisher and others were together, respecting the liabilities and assets of Dickerson & Co.; and Dickerson said to Warren, in the presence of Fisher, that they held the premises in question under lease from his wife; that the place belonged to his wife, and he supposed she would rent it. This was before the judgments were docketed. These statements, thus sworn to by Dickerson, are not questioned in any manner. They are entitled to all the force of an uncontradicted statement by an unimpeached witness.

The answers of the defendants deny all notice in the most positive manner. Although sworn to, this is not enough. The broad rule, giving so much weight to an answer under oath, is not quite universal. I think this case comes within the exception. Where it is the duty of a defendant to know of the existence of a fact, he is charged with knowledge, whether he knows it or not. The court will not allow a defendant to make the defense of ignorance, when it was only necessary for him to open his eyes, that he might see and be informed.

The counsel or attorney of the defendants, Mr. Fisher, was informed, and information to him was knowledge to the defendants. This being apparent to the court, the court seems to be obliged to follow the exception to the general rule. Were it not so, in every case, in order to avoid the effect of notice, the party has only to put forward his agent. In every such case, in order to have all the advantages of an answer under oath, it is only necessary that the principal direct his agent to learn everything, but communicate to his principal nothing, so that he may swear that he is without any notice. The doctrine which should control in such cases is announced in Smallwood v. Lewin, 2 McCart. 60.

I think the injunction should prevail, and will so advise.

Howard IVINS et al., Exrs. of Thomas W. Ivins, Deceased.

Where a creditor of a deceased person brought a suit in equity for the recovery of the amount claimed to be due him from the executors, without having filed his claim with them or established it by judgment at law, they having recognized the claim by payments thereon, held, that a preliminary injunction (issued in the suit to restrain the collection of an alleged fraudulent claim from the property of the deceased) will not be dissolved on motion before the final hearing, the question whether the suit can be maintained not being decided.

MOTION to dissolve an injunction restraining a sheriff from paying over moneys procured on a sale of property under an execution on a judgment alleged to have been confessed in fraud of complainant's rights as a creditor. Decree for complainant.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. I. W. Carmichael and W. H. Vredenburgh, for complainant.

Messrs. J. H. Gaskill and F. Voorhees, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

A very interesting question arises in this case. Can the creditor of a deceased person, who has never filed any claim whatever with his executors or administrators, maintain a suit in equity for the recovery of the amount due upon his alleged claim, without first having established such claim by a judgment at law, however much such executors or administrators may have recognized the existence of such claim? It is true that, in this particular case, other questions are involved, but it seems to me they are utterly without vitality unless the former be decided in favor of the complainant.

The complainant had and has a claim of several thousand dollars against the estate of Thomas W. Ivins, deceased. He never filed any claim with the executors. The rule to bar expired long ago and was made absolute. The executors, during the period of limitation fixed by the rule and afterwards, made payments on one or both of these claims. Within the statutory period other claims were presented, all of which the executors have paid. They have filed no account nor obtained any decree of distribution.

The complainant alleges that there is a large amount of assets, real and personal, in the hands of the executors, and that he is entitled to the payment of his claim or a pro rata share thereof out of those assets. He also says that the testator gave the residue of his estate, after the payment of his debts, to his wife, Mary A. Ivins, who is also executrix, and alleges that she holds the balance of said assets as executrix, but which, however important it may be ultimately, I shall not now attempt to decide.

The bill further alleges that the said Mary A. Ivins, as devisee, confessed a judgment to James Lippincott, administrator de bonis non of George W. Ivins, deceased, for a real debt of over $49,000, on which execution was issued, and by virtue of which execution the sheriff levied upon all the interest of said Mary A. Ivins in the estate of her deceased husband, and sold the personal property, the proceeds of which he now holds.

The allegation is that this is a device to defraud the complainant, and that it is illegal; and he asks an injunction restraining the sheriff from paying those moneys as directed by the writ. A preliminary injunction was allowed. The defendant, Mary A. Ivins, has answered. The above facts are not disputed. The allegation of fraud is. There are other statements in the bill which are denied.

The defendants come in and ask that the injunction be dissolved, insisting that there is no equity in the bill, and that the complainant has relief in the orphans' court or in a court of law. They also insist that if there is any equity in the bill it is fully answered.

I think the injunction should not be dissolved. If the complainant is entitled to his share of these assets under the law, I think they ought not to be swept away beyond his reach by means of this confessed judgment. I cannot believe it was the intention of the Legislature to make the beneficial provisions of the Act to depend upon questions of priority thus obtained. The ninety-fourth section of the Orphans' Court Act (Rev. p. 773) says:

"Any creditor who shall not exhibit his claim to the executor or administrator as aforesaid, within the time limited and prescribed by the said court, shall be forever barred from prosecuting or recovering his said demand, unless the estate shall prove sufficient after all debts exhibited and allowed are fully satisfied, or such creditor shall find some other estate not inventoried or accounted for by the executor or administrator before distribution, in which case such creditor shall receive his ratable proportion out of the same."

I believe that this section embraces the complainant, provided he has taken the necessary steps before filing his bill. I am inclined to believe that he has no standing in court until he has filed his claim in writing, under oath, with the executors; Haston v. Castner, 4 Stew. Eq. 697; or established his claim by an action at law. This, however, I do not decide. I think it merits fuller consideration than I can now give it; and since the defendants will not be greatly injured, and, if the complainant is right, he, in all probability, would be irreparably, it seems to be my duty to maintain the injunction. The costs of this motion to abide final hearing.

The amendments asked for by the complainant I think should be made without re-engrossing the bill. Copies thereof to be served within ten days upon the solicitor of the defendants.

I will advise a decree in accordance with these views.

BILL for distribution of a fund.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. D. Holt, for complainants.

Mr. James S. Atkin, for Mrs. Conner.

Mr. E. T. Green, for McPherson & Maharg.

Mr. G. D. W. Vroom, for Hughes, Hutchinson & Co.

Messrs. Howell & Brother, for Samuel Heath.

Mr. James Buchanan, for S. B. Packer.

Mr. F. C. Lowthorp, for J. P. Baily.

Mr. D. Cooper Allinson, for J. P. McGalliard.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

In this case I find that the consideration which the complainants agreed to pay for the houses to be built by the defendant Walton, independent of extras, was....	$20,840 00
I find that Walton did extra work to the value of	1,073 48
	$21,913 48

I find that the complainants paid Walton, cash	$12,870 60
And his due bill	2,040 00
To which is to be added the cost of completing the buildings after his failure	3,458 01
Showing a balance of		$3,544 87

This would be the cash due to Walton on the contract, had not the contract made provision that $6,000 of the consideration money should be paid in houses. The contract provides that on final settlement Walton shall take two of the houses on Wall Street, at $6,000, in payment. The title to these houses is still in the complainants, and the amount due Walton is not equivalent to the value put upon the houses in the agreement, by $2,455.13.

Because of Walton's failure to complete his contract, a number of material men, having claims which Walton refused to pay, presented their claims to the complainants and demanded payment. The claims greatly exceed the balance due, $3,544.87. But this balance is in the two houses and lots to be conveyed to Walton by the contract. And the case is complicated by the fact that Walton agreed with one J. W. McKelvy to convey one of the Walton houses to Mrs. Conner for $2,500. I find that the complainants had knowledge of this agreement, and in the law assented to the transfer. I do not mean to say they assented to the price.

Mrs. Conner was put into possession. Walton had a right to make sale of his interest in these two houses. I know of no principle embodied in the mechanics' lien law, nor in any other, that offers a bar to such a transaction. Nor was he obliged to wait until the contract between him and complainants was complete, and a final settlement concluded. The complainants could not interfere, nor could creditors of Walton. The rights that may spring up between laborers and material men, on the one hand, and the complainants on the other, under such a contract, filed, as this was, under the statute, is perhaps a more difficult question. It is not so clear to my mind that the complainants were not bound to retain the $6,000 until the final settlement, or at least until a reasonable time after the contract was completed. However, it may be claimed that it could make no difference in the result; which is perhaps the truth.

On November 1, 1879, the defendant Walton gave an order on the complainants for $1,000 to McPherson & Maharg, material men. McPherson & Maharg now claim that they are entitled to be first paid the amount of this order out of the funds still due on this contract to Walton.

It is claimed by counsel that this was an assignment of $1,000 of these moneys to McPherson & Maharg. This view is resisted. It is said that the order was general, having no application to any certain funds, and that at the time of its acceptance, if it was accepted, there was no such amount due on this particular contract. As to the first point, Mr. McPherson, the defendant, says:

"That it was distinctly understood at that time that this order was not in payment for any lumber that went on Wall Street; he still owed us that amount and $1,164 on our books over that amount; that he gave me the order for, and he owed me $1,250 on notes that had been furnished within four months from the date that I made this thing, making $3,400; the order was not for lumber furnished for the Wall Street or Clinton Street houses; it was a general order."

With such a clear and emphatic statement as this from Mr. McPherson, it is quite apparent that the other material men are justified in resisting the payment of this $1,000 order out of the funds in hand.

As to the next point, the acceptance; he took the order at once to one of the complainants, Mr. Joseph McPherson, who said "there was no money coming to Mr. Walton at that time," and "out of the first money due Mr. Walton he would pay this order."

There was no formal acceptance, but the complainant, Mr. Joseph McPherson, took possession of the order, and held it until the day of hearing, over three years. When asked whether or not Joseph paid him the cost, he answered:

"No, sir; there was no money coming to Mr. Walton; he gave me, after some days, a note 'for $1,000.' He gave me this note for $1,000, which I supposed was for the order; went to the office and credited Benjamin F. Walton with $1,000 on our books; but my brother's understanding of the matter was, as I afterwards learned, that he loaned me that $1,000 to assist me, as I needed money."

I find from these facts that the complainants accepted that order, and that the defendants McPherson & Maharg were entitled to the payment thereof out of the first money due to Walton on that contract. That order has not been paid; I shall advise a decree directing its payment out of the funds in the hands of the complainants due to Walton on the contract named.

Besides the amount of this order, other large sums of money were due McPherson & Maharg. On November 3, 1879, three days after they obtained the order, they gave notice to the complainants that they should look to them for the payment of $1,000, for materials furnished to Walton in the construction of the houses above referred to. This notice was given under the third section of the Act respecting mechanics' liens.

The other material men resist this claim also. They insist that every such demand is founded on a request of the debtor to pay, and of a refusal by him of a sum of money actually due, and that in this case there was not $1,000 due, if anything. The views expressed by the Chief Justice in Reeve v. Elmendorf, 9 Vroom, 125, 133, very emphatically sustain this view of the statute. His language is:

"A privilege to make exorbitant and ill founded claims, and on a refusal of payment to intercept such sums and hold them in the hands of the owner an indefinite time, would be simply an instrument of vexation and oppression. The statute says the workman or material man shall give notice of the contractor's refusal to make payment, and of the amount due to him or them and so demanded; and it proceeds to authorize the owner thereupon to retain the amount so due and claimed. Obviously, then, the amount demanded must be the amount due. As the amount claimed is to be retained by the owner, it would be a sheer injustice to allow more to be claimed than is justly due. If the workman or material man claims therefrom more than has in fact been earned by him, such exaggeration is, I think, fatal to his right to use the statutory procedure against the owner."

These plain, sensible and business like rules settle this branch of the case against McPherson & Maharg. They had taken the order November 1, for $1,000; and although the defendant McPherson says it was on the general account, yet the order itself expressly says it was to be charged against Walton's account respecting these houses, and it nowhere appears that the complainants had any other account with Walton. I say they had procured that order November 1, when the defendant McPherson admits there was nothing due to Walton from complainants, and on the third of November he makes this demand of $1,000, when the order had not yet been paid nor formally accepted.

Besides this, the statement of account, showing all the materials furnished to their particular houses, offered in evidence, presents, in the aggregate, only $1,144.22, without crediting the order, leaving, over and above the order, only $144.22, including therein two items furnished November 5, and also including several items which may not belong in that list at all. Plainly, then, since the order is accounted a valid claim, it is my duty to advise the rejection of this one.

We next come to the claim of Hughes, Hutchinson & Co., for $1,500, which was made of the complainants January 2, 1880, at 12 o'clock and forty minutes. This claim is resisted by other material men, not because Walton did not justly owe them for materials furnished on this contract to that amount, but because that amount was not due at the time of the demand and notice. It is said that he truly owed them, but that the time for payment had been extended by Hughes, Hutchinson & Co., by accepting notes which had not yet matured. And Dey v. Anderson, 10 Vroom, 199, is relied on.

The value of the goods furnished was $1,630.52, from May 29, 1879, to January 2, 1880. Including this, they had an account against Walton, at this time, amounting to $5,811, for $3,762 of which they had taken and held Walton's notes. These notes were given from time to time on the general account, and, it is admitted, included large portions of the items of material furnished for these houses. It is also admitted that these notes all matured after the demand and refusal. Under the decisions in our own courts, then, these facts would seem to exclude all necessity for further inquiry, and to oblige me to advise against the claim of Messrs. Hughes, Hutchinson & Co.

J. P. McGalliard & Co. filed their claim with complainants January 2, 1880, and notified them to retain the amount out of any moneys due Walton. The claim was for $1,300. This amount was not only not due to him from Walton on account of these houses, but the whole claim was embraced in a note or notes which had not yet matured. Hence, further consideration of this demand would prove unavailing.

I shall advise a decree in favor of the payment to Samuel Heath of the sum of $123.73, with interest from January 2, 1880, and of $326.82, with interest from January 13, 1880, next after the payment of the order for $1,000 given to McPherson & Maharg.

The defendant Samuel B. Packer gave three separate notices to the complainants and directed them to retain the amounts named in each; one of them was for $104.15, one for $450, and one for $368.65. The first two were served January 3, 1880, and the last January 6. It is unfortunate for the first one that it contains items amounting to $69.74 for materials for flagging the sidewalks in front of the houses named, which, I think, are not proper for such a claim. This obliges me to reject the first claim, under Reeve v. Elmendorf, supra.

The same principle of construction condemns the third claim. The noxious items are small, indeed; one being "Two flaggers ¾ day at $2.50—$1.80," and one "One laborer ½ day at $1.50—.75," but the statute is not to be construed by numbers or quantities, but upon principle.

Upon this intelligent view, Walton is as well justified in refusing a bill that has an excess of $2.55 as of $255. And in such a case, on no conceivable grounds could the complainants justify a payment of any part of the claim under the statute.

The claim for $450 stands without any such weakness. I shall advise its payment.

Fletcher Coleman presented a claim for $105.20, and having been refused payment by Walton, he gave the complainants notice to retain that amount. I will advise the payment of that claim. His claim matured or was made complete, under the statute, February 24, 1880.

Josiah P. Baily had an account amounting to $856.43, against Walton, for materials furnished him to go into these houses. He demanded payment of Walton, April 7, 1880, and he refused to pay; of this refusal he at once gave notice to complainants, and requested them to retain that sum. I think this claim is free from objection, and advise its payment with interest.

I will advise a decree directing the sale of the two Wall Street houses by a master of this court, unless Mrs. Conner pay into court $500 for the lot purchased by her of Walton, within thirty days from a service of a copy of the decree which shall be made in this case upon her, and unless Benjamin F. Walton pay into this court the sum of $3,000 within thirty days from the service of a copy of the said decree. Both Mrs. Conner and Walton will be required to pay interest on the said sum, respectively, from the first day of April, 1880.

Upon the payment of these moneys, the complainants will be required to execute a deed or deeds in accordance with the terms of their contract. If Walton or his assigns fail to comply with this provision, then, upon a sale, this court will direct the execution of proper conveyances.

I will advise that the claims be paid in the order in which I have considered them. Those claimants who have prevailed are entitled to costs out of the fund; those who have not, must pay their own costs

MARYLAND.
COURT OF APPEALS.

John C. LAMB, Appt.,
v.
Henry TAYLOR, Sr.

1. In an action by a father to recover for the loss of services of his daughter, caused by her seduction, slight evidence is sufficient to establish the relation of master and servant.
2. In such a case, if the daughter is living with her father, rendering services, the fact that she is over twenty-one years of age is immaterial.
3. It is immaterial whether the services rendered by the daughter were paid for or not, or whether any special contract existed.
4. It is no objection to the father's right of action that the daughter was employed by a third party out of her father's house during the day, and that she paid for her board at her father's.
5. It is too late, after prayers have been granted by the court, to raise the objection for the first time that evidence in the case, upon which a prayer was based, was illegal.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court, entered upon a verdict for plaintiff of $10,000 damages in an action for seduction. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Robinson, Irving, Stone, Yellott and Bryan, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

The rulings of the court below complained of in the first bill of exceptions were the refusal of defendant's first prayer and the granting of plaintiff's first prayer.

Defendant's first prayer was as follows:

"That the plaintiff has offered no evidence legally sufficient, under the pleadings in this case, to entitle him to recover; and their verdict must, therefore, be for the defendant."

Plaintiff's first prayer was as follows:

"If the jury find from the evidence that Rachel Taylor is the daughter of the plaintiff, and that she has always lived with him and performed service for him as his servant in and about his household, and 'slight service' is sufficient to sustain this action; and further find that while she so lived with her father and performed service for him as aforesaid, she was seduced by the defendant and gave birth to a child begotten by him, and the plaintiff lost her service by reason of the confinement and lying in of said Rachel, and was subjected to the payment of costs and charges on account thereof, then they ought to find for the plaintiff, notwithstanding they may believe that the said Rachel was, at the time of said seduction, over twenty-one years of age."

The rulings complained of in the second bill of exceptions were the refusal of defendant's second prayer and the granting of plaintiff's third prayer.

Defendant's second prayer was as follows:

"If the jury find for the plaintiff, they are restricted in their estimation of damages to such loss of services as they find the plaintiff sustained by reason of the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter by the defendant."

Plaintiff's third prayer was as follows:

"If the jury find the facts stated in plaintiff's first prayer, it is competent for them to find such damage for the plaintiff as they may deem right and proper under all the evidence in the cause."

Mr. Benjamin Kurtz, for appellant:

The daughter was over twenty-one years of age at the time of the alleged seduction, and was also under a contract of employment with another from whom she received wages.

The alleged services were rendered to the mother; and although it may be contended that they inured to the benefit of the father, they were entirely voluntary and gratuitous on the part of the daughter, and the natural and usual outcome of her filial relation. There was no legal right in the father, based upon support furnished the daughter or any other consideration, which entitled him to command her services. On the contrary, the daughter seemed to be supporting the father. She was not, therefore, his servant, de facto; and he cannot maintain this action.

Y. 45; Bigelow Torts, p. 291.

Drop from the record in this appeal that Rachel A. Taylor was the plaintiff's daughter, and consider her only as a factory girl boarding in the house in which the plaintiff lived, and rendering his wife the voluntary services referred to, and who would then contend that this action could be maintained?

Plaintiff's third prayer was misleading. It allowed the jury to take into consideration the probable expense of supporting the illegitimate child, and to award damages therefor to the plaintiff, which they are not entitled to do.

Also to award damages for the breach of promise of marriage, for which the daughter had her separate right of action. This evidence, although admitted without objection, it was the duty of the court, ex mero motu, to exclude from the consideration of the jury in awarding the plaintiff damages.

The broadest rule of damages yet suggested, in actions of this kind, allows the jury to consider evidence outside of the loss of services and expenses for medical treatment, etc., only to compensate the plaintiff for the injury done to his feelings as parent, etc.

Mr. Alex. H. Hobbs, for appellee:

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, Taylor, against the defendant, Lamb, for the seduction of his daughter Rachel. The declaration is in the usual form, alleging loss of service, etc.

The evidence shows that the daughter was over twenty-one years of age; that she was living and always had lived with her father and mother, but from the age of fourteen had been working during the day in the cotton mills at Woodbury, returning to the house of her father at night; that she received her own wages, and out of them clothed herself and paid her board to her mother, and sometimes assisted her mother in paying her rent; that the family consisted of the plaintiff, his wife and two daughters; that this daughter gave birth to a child at home, and was kept there about two months, and the doctor who attended her in her confinement had charged the bill to the plaintiff, which he had not paid.

It was further proved by the daughter that she was seduced at home and that when not working in the mill her father had no control over her and that whatever services she rendered were entirely voluntary. The evidence relating to the service is as follows:

The plaintiff says "That the said Rachel, after returning from the mill in the evening, would assist her mother in the work about the house, and when her mother was taken sick she made up her bed for her."

The daughter herself says that in the morning before going to work at the mill, and in the evening after her returning she would assist her mother in her work about the house, and when her mother was taken sick she made up her bed for her; this is the evidence as to the services of the daughter.

It is well said by a learned author (Sutherland on Damages) that slight evidence is sufficient to establish the relation of master and servant, and that the allegation and proof on that point is almost an unmeaning formula, an obeisance to a shadow of the past, to reach the actual grievance.

So in the case of Mercer v. Walmsley, 5 Harr. & J. 27, the court said: "Any slight service will be sufficient to raise the inference of fact that she was his servant."

So in Keller v. Donnelly, 5 Md. 218, the court said: "The slightest evidence will suffice to prove the relation of master and servant."

The evidence of the services rendered so as to establish the merely technical relation of master and servant, is certainly in this case sufficient. According to her testimony she daily did some of the ordinary woman's work about the house. There are many cases to be found where the action has been sustained where the evidence of the service was much less than we find in this record.

Nor does it matter that the daughter was over twenty-one years of age. If the daughter is living with her father, rendering services, that connection is sufficient although she is over twenty-one years. Mercer v. Walmsley, 5 Harr. & J. 27.

It has been settled by this case and many others both in England and this country, that a father may maintain an action for the seduction of an adult daughter, provided she is living with him and rendering him any service however slight. This law we do not understand to be questioned; but it is insisted that these services must not be voluntary, and that the fact that the daughter was in service elsewhere will defeat the action.

But the services of an adult daughter to the father must be voluntary, as he has no legal right to require them after her majority.

It is immaterial whether the services so rendered by the child are paid for or not, or whether any special contract existed. Lipe v. Eisenlerd, 32 N. Y. 229; Badgley v. Decker, 44 Barb. 577.

The other question argued by the appellant, that because the daughter in this case was engaged in the cotton mills, and paid her board at home, the plaintiff could not recover, is not tenable upon authority.

It was said in Mercer v. Walmsley, above quoted, that where the daughter is over twenty-one years and living with her father, any slight act of service is sufficient to establish the relation of master and servant. In the common acceptation of the term, the place where the daughter boards and lodges is the place where she is said to live. She may work out by the day, but where she eats and sleeps is her home, and there she lives, more especially when that place is her father's house which has always furnished her with shelter. But ample authority is not wanting on that point.

The case of Rist v. Faup, 4 Best & S. 409, was this: The daughter lived in her father's family, and was always at home from 6 o'clock in the evening until 7 o'clock in the morning, and while there assisted in the house work. That from 7 o'clock in the morning to 6 in the evening she was in the service of the defendant as a laborer on his farm. Held by the court, unanimously, that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury.

The case of Badgley v. Decker, 44 Barb. 577, was this: The mother kept a boarding house, and the daughter, who was over twenty-one years of age, kept a milliner's shop in her own name, but lived with her mother and helped her to do the work about the house; and it was held that the mother could recover.

So in the case of Villepigue v. Shular, 3 Strobh. (S. C.) Law, 462, the daughter, over twenty-one, owned the house and furniture in which she and her mother lived, but she performed services for the mother. Held, that the mother was entitled to recover.

In this last case the court said: "That the daughter was owner of the establishment may serve to show her merit and her mother's destitution, but did not render the injury more tolerable to the mother."

So in the case before us the fact that the daughter paid her board and sometimes aided in paying the rent shows that she was rendering a service to the family more important and commendable than the mere formal averment of the loss of service required in the declaration.

From the cases above cited we are of opinion that the court below committed no error in the rulings on the first bill of exceptions.

The second exception contains a prayer of the defendant which was refused, and a prayer of the plaintiff which was granted. We do not understand the appellant to make any serious contest about his second prayer which the court properly refused; but he insists that the prayer of the plaintiff contained in that exception should not have been granted. This prayer of the plaintiff, so granted, instructed the jury that it was competent for them to find such damage for the plaintiff as they may deem right and proper under all the evidence in the cause, provided they found the facts as stated in the plaintiff's first prayer.

The reason assigned why this prayer should not have been granted is that the jury might, under it, have taken into consideration the expense of supporting the child, or damage for the breach of a promise to marry, as something was said in the evidence about the defendant having been required to give bond for the support of the child, and a breach of promise to marry was proved by the plaintiff.

If, in a case of this sort, only legal testimony is before the jury, the instruction is clearly correct. But a prayer cannot properly be made to perform the office of an objection to illegal testimony. If any of the testimony offered by the plaintiff was not legal testimony in the cause, it was the duty of the defendant to object to its admissibility at the time it was offered. When the objection is to the evidence, if it is known or apparent, it must be taken before and not after it has gone to the jury. If unaware of the objection to the admissibility of such evidence at the time of its offer, he must raise his objection within a reasonable time thereafter. It is too late after the prayers have been granted by the court based upon the evidence, or the argument before the jury commenced. Dent v. Hancock, 5 Gill, 120; Davis v. Patton, 19 Md. 120.

No such objection having been made in the court below, this court, even if it was to concede that any of the evidence was inadmissible (which we by no means do) could not remedy the error. It was very ingeniously argued by the counsel for the appellant that, although the court could not now decide the question of admissibility, the court had the right to examine and see if it, or some of it, might not have improperly affected the verdict.

But this is not so. If the evidence is in the case, it must be considered and allowed its full force. Gibbbs v. Gale, 7 Md. 76.

Perceiving no error in the ruling of the court below on the second exception, the judgment must be affirmed

BALTIMORE & OHIO R. R. CO., Appt.,
v.
James A. GOULD, Trustee.

The owner of a tract of land, on a plat of which a street called Henry Street was designated, but not then opened or used as a street, conveyed a portion of the land by a deed containing the following description: "Beginning at the corner formed by the intersection of the north side of Winder Street and the east side of Johnson Street, and running thence easterly binding on the north side of Winder Street 379 feet, more or less, to the corner formed by the intersection of Winder and Henry Streets; thence northerly binding on the west side of Henry Street 320 feet, more or less, to the corner formed by the intersection of Henry Street and Wells Street, as now laid out and widened; thence westerly binding on the south side of Wells Street * * * containing two and one half acres, more or less." Thereafter Henry Street was closed by the public authorities with the acquiescence of the then holder of the abutting lot conveyed by said deed. Held, in an action of ejectment by the original grantor, that said deed did not convey the fee in the road bed of Henry Street, and that, on its ceasing to be used as a street, the grantor was entitled to recover possession of the road bed to the center in front of said abutting lot, from the holder of said lot.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court, in favor of plaintiff in ejectment. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Bryan, Robinson, Stone and Irving, JJ.

In addition to the facts stated in the opinion, it appeared that by certain mesne conveyances the leasehold interest in the land conveyed to Preston, as stated in the opinion, became the property of the defendant in this action prior to 1874, and the defendant has ever since held possession thereof.

Messrs. John K. Cowen and Hugh L. Bond, Jr., for appellant:

At common law the title to the bed of a highway or fresh water stream is prima facie presumed to be in the owners of the adjacent land.

Salisbury v. Great Northern R. Co. 5 C. B. N. S. 174; Simpson v. Dendy, 8 C. B. N. S. 433; Berridge v. Ward, 10 C. B. N. S. 400; Micklethwait v. Newlay Bridge Co. 55 L. T. 336.

The title to the bed of a fresh water stream is, in the language of Sir Matthew Hale, in the owners of the land on either side, "of common right."

*Ex parte Jennings, 6 Cow. 518, 537, note a.

So when land adjoining a stream or highway is conveyed, the presumption of law is that the conveyance is intended to carry the bed of the adjoining highway or stream to the center, unless there be something in the deed or the circumstances to show a clear intention to exclude the highway or stream.

3 Kent, Com. 433; Berridge v. Ward, 10 C. B. N. S. 400.

If a lot adjoining a highway be described by reference to a plat, the moiety of the highway will pass, although the lines of the lot as shown on the plat include no part of the highway.

S. 400; Watson v. Peters, 26 Mich. 509; Champlin v. Pendleton, 13 Conn. 23.

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin had before it this very question in Kneeland v. Van Valkenburgh, 46 Wis. 434, decided in 1879. The property was described as the tract of land "known as the east part of lot number 1," etc., "and bounded as follows: commencing at a point on the south line of Biddle Street," etc., thence running back from the street and around to Lake Street; "thence northerly on the westerly line of Lake Street to the south line of Biddle Street; thence westerly on the south line of Biddle Street to the beginning." The court held that the adjoining moiety of each street passed by the description.

See also Woodman v. Spencer, 54 N. H. 507, and note thereon in 14 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 418; Salter v. Jonas, 10 Vroom, 469; Hinchman v. Paterson Horse R. R. Co. 2 C. E. Green, 75; Paul v. Carver, 23 Pa. 223; Cox v. Freedley, 33 Pa. 124; Transue v. Sell, 105 Pa. 604.

The decisions of the Courts of Massachusetts and New York are in conflict with those which we have cited.

Perley v. Chandler, 6 Mass. 454; Alden v. Murdock, 13 Mass. 256; Tyler v. Hammond, 11 Pick. 193, 213; Sibley v. Holden, 10 Pick. 249; Newhall v. Ireson, 8 Cush. 595; Phillips v. Bowers, 7 Gray, 21; Boston v. Richardson, 13 Allen, 146, 153; Webber v. *Eastern R. The difference between the Massachusetts and New York Courts, on the one hand, and the other courts whose opinions we have cited, on the other, is exactly that between Judge Redfield's associates on the Vermont Bench and himself, in the decision of Buck v. Squiers, 22 Vt. 484.

In the note on Woodman v. Spencer, 14 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 418, Judge Redfield says: "Many years back we had occasion to participate in the careful consideration of the question with able associates, with whom we could not agree, but who decided that the question was one of intent merely, to be determined like any other question of construction, by the intention of the grantor, as drawn from the words of the instrument as applied to the subject matter."

Messrs. Charles Marshall and Thomas W. Hall, for appellee.

Irving, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment brought by the appellee against the appellant, for the recovery of a strip of land, being the one half of the bed of "Henry Street," between "Winder Street" and "Mills Street," as those streets are laid down on "Poppleton's plat" of the City of Baltimore. "Henry Street," however, was never actually opened by the city as a street or used as such, and had been in fact closed by order of the city council, and rejected as a street before the institution of this suit. The land on both sides of Henry Street, as laid down on Poppleton's plat (where the land sued for lies), belonged to Alexander Gould, Sr. By his will he gave it to trustees, with power to sell in whole, or in lots, as they thought best, and to open such streets as they thought proper. The plaintiff in this action (the appellee) is, by decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, the legitimate successor to the trustees named in the will, who have either died or resigned. The originally appointed trustees sold to J. Alexander Preston a portion of this land, all of which at the time was unimproved land. In the report of sale, which was ratified by the court, the land sold to Preston is thus described: "All that parcel or square of ground situated in the City of Baltimore, and which is bounded by 'Winder Street' on the south, 'Johnson Street' on the west, 'Wells Street' on the north, and 'Henry Street' on the east." In the deed of the trustees to J. Alexander Preston for the property thus sold him, and dated the 2d of December; 1872, it is described as follows: "Beginning for the same at the corner formed by the intersection of the north side of Winder Street and the east side of Johnson Street, and running thence easterly binding on the north side of Winder Street 379 feet more or less to the corner formed by the intersection of Winder and Henry Streets; thence northerly binding on the west side of Henry Street 320 feet more or less to the corner formed by the intersection of Henry Street and Wells Street as now laid out and widened; thence westerly binding on the south side of Wells Street 379 feet more or less to the intersection of Wells and Johnson Streets; thence southerly binding on the east side of Johnson Street to the place of begining, containing 2½ acres more or less."

As already stated, at the date of this sale and deed, the grantors owned the land on both sides of this projected "Henry Street."

Subsequently to this conveyance, to wit: in March, 1874, the trustees conveyed to the appellant the land on the other side of "Henry Street;" and by express description in that deed the conveyance was in terms "to the center of Henry Street."

It is an admitted fact in the cause that at the time of these deeds being executed Henry Street had not been opened as a public street, nor actually used as a public highway, and had not been used as a private way. It is also admitted that, by an ordinance of the city, approved on the 9th of November, 1874, Henry Street was by proper officers closed, and damages were assessed to the appellant as the owner of the property on each side of the street so closed, to the amount of $500; and the appellant was also assessed to the amount of $725 for benefits for the acquisition of the bed of the street free from the public easement; in all which the appellant acquiesced and settled with the city accordingly.

*See editorial note to this case, Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

By the well established law as laid down in White v. Flannigan, 1 Md. 525, and Moale v. Mayor, 5 Md. 314, and Hull v. Mayor, 56 Md. 188, the deed to Preston, by calling on the street, operated as a covenant that the grantee should have a permanent right to use the street as such. In fact, by so calling on a street laid out on the public plat of the city made by due authority, there is a dedication by its owner of the use of such street by the public as a street. The owner may retain the fee by a description which does not cover the street and does not convey it to the grantee; but such fee is burdened with the easement which the deed gives, by necessary implication, in calling for the street; and the easement is confined to a use of the street for the purpose of a street. When that is abandoned entirely, as and for a street, by the public and the grantee, if the road bed has not been conveyed the unrestricted rights of the grantor will revive; and the implication spoken of will interpose no obstacle to a recovery of possession by the grantor of the abutting lots, from the grantee thereof, if he has appropriated the road bed to his individual use as his property.

As we have already seen, the street which was mentioned in Preston's deed has been abandoned by the city, with the acquiescence of the appellant, which has been paid for the injury it was supposed to sustain by the closing of the street between its lots.

If, therefore, the deed to Preston does not convey the street bed, to the center thereof, the court committed no error in allowing a recovery to the extent claimed in the declaration.

The ordinary presumption is that a conveyance of land bordering on a highway carries the fee to the center of the highway, so that the question always is whether the description or the deed is such as to repel this presumption, and exclude the road bed from the operation of the conveyance. Mr. Angell, in his work on Highways (§ 141) says: "Whether the soil passes or not is purely a question of intention, to be ascertained in each case from the description contained in the deed, explained and illustrated by all the other parts of the conveyance, and by the localities and subject matter to which it applies."

The same author, in section 315 (3d ed.), says it may be stated as a fair conclusion from the authorities that a grant of land described as bounded generally "by" or "on" or "along" a highway carries the fee to the center of the highway, if the grantor owns so far; and as on the other hand, where the descriptive words are "by the side of" or "by the margin of" or "by the line of" or expressions equivalent thereto, the soil of the highway is excluded.

Chancellor Kent states the law in the same way; and this court in Peabody Heights Co. v. Sadtler, 63 Md. 533, laid down the law in accordance with the view of those distinguished authors. This rule of construction, however, and of determining the question of intention on the part of the grantor has not uniformly obtained; but in some of the States stronger language indicative of intention is required to rebut the presumption of intent to grant the way as a part of the fee sold. But this court having emphatically adopted the views of Chancellor Kent and Mr. Angell as a fair deduction from the weight of authority, it will not be necessary or profitable to review the cases cited from other States by the counsel for appellant and relied on as containing the better law.

We see no reason to depart from the view adopted in Sadtler's Case, 63 Md. 533, and the only question for us to decide in this case is whether the descriptive language in the appellant's title paper (the deed to Preston) is of such definite character as to lead to the same conclusion, as to intention, as the deed in Sadtler's Case did. In other words, it is whether this deed can be distinguished from that case in any way, so as to make this deed include the fee in the road bed; whereas, Sadtler's deed did not.

No stone bounders are called for in this deed, as was the case in Sadtler's deed; but the description of the starting points and endings of the lines, and of how the line from one to the other is to bind, fixes the beginnings and endings of the lines with as much certainty and positiveness as if stones had been called for in the deed. We have already quoted the language of the deed, and following it literally, the counsel for appellant, with commendable candor, admitted that the road bed was not included within the lines of the deed. The description could not be made more definite. The line is expressly made to "bind on the west side of Henry Street."

The very language is used which the authorities we have cited say will rebut the presumption of intention to convey the fee in the street bed, and which this court decided in Sadtler's Case had that effect there.

In the Sadtler deed stones were described as located on particular sides of the road, and the lines from stone to stone were described as running along the road. Of course being a straight line it was held that it must of necessity follow the same side of the road on which the stones were located. Here not only are the points of departure and ending quite as distinctly fixed, but the line from one to the other is confined to particular sides of the streets in terms.

As to the street here concerned, it is "to bind on the west side of Henry Street;" if possible, it is even more definite than the description in the Sadtler deed; and we are wholly unable to see any distinction between the cases in favor of appellant's contention. The report of the sale filed by the trustees gives no description of the property, save that it is a square of ground bounded by certain streets. The deed follows and makes the description more certainly intelligible as to the intention in the sale as to the street bed.

It operates as the deed in the case of Langley v. Jones, 33 Md. 179, was held to operate to make the description of the property more perfect and intelligible than the sheriff's return had left it. The report, therefore, cannot be resorted to as supplying an intention by presumption, which has been expressly excluded and rebutted by the deed made to carry out the intentions in fact of the parties. Looking to the localities and subject matter on which the deed was to operate (as Mr. Angell says may be done) it is not unreasonable to suppose the grantor intended to reserve to himself the fee that the benefits of actual condemnation for public use or shutting the same up when resorted to (as had not then been done) might result to him.

The argument of appellant's counsel was in reality against the soundness of the policy adopted in the decision in Sadtler's Case, and a contention that sound public policy did not justify adherence to the doctrine of Chancellor Kent and Mr. Angell adopted in Sadtler's Case. Public policy, it was contended, had induced a contrary view to prevail in many other places, and it was submitted that serious inconvenience and most unexpected results would follow in the City of Baltimore from adherence to the principles settled in Sadtler's Case. Such results may occur in some cases; but it will be because the parties to deeds have not taken the precaution to protect themselves, as was done by the appellant when it took its second deed direct from the trustees. We have been able to see no good ground for retracing our steps, as being contrary to sound public policy. We have been able to find in this case no affirmative evidence of intention different from that which we have indicated the language used imports, according to the best authority.

No objection was made to the plaintiff's prayer, granted by the court below, other than to the principles of law which it declared. From what we have said, it is apparent that we think there was no error; and the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

Susanna V. GAITHER.

Complainant's husband, shortly after their marriage, purchased a farm and paid for it, but had the deed made out to a third party as grantee, who was put in possession. After her husband's death, complainant filed a bill to have dower laid off and assigned to her in said farm, as land of her deceased husband, claiming that his having the deed made out to a third party was in fraud of her dower rights. Held, that a decree directing commissioners to lay off and assign dower to complainant in said farm should be affirmed. (Miller, J., dissenting.)

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County, in equity, in favor of complainant in a bill for the assignment of dower. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Robinson and Bryan, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richard R. Beall and W. P. Maulsby, Jr., for appellants.

Messrs. Thomas Anderson, W. V. Bowie, Jr., and Arthur W. Machen, for appellee:

The statute gives dower in lands held by equitable title.

Code, art. 45, § 5; Laws 1818, chap. 193, § 10.

It is a fraud upon the wife to attempt to cheat her of her dower in such land.

The circumstance that the equitable title may be aliened without the wife's concurrence, whereas the legal title cannot be, is immaterial, where the conveyance is not bona fide, but is fraudulent as against her, and therefore, so far as her rights are concerned, void.

Nothing can be more completely alienable, at the pleasure of the husband, than his personal property; yet it is well settled that a conveyance of personal property made for the purpose of defeating the wife's legal rights is null and void as against her.

Hays v. Henry, 1 Md. Ch. 337; Dunnock v. Dunnock, 3 Md. Ch. 140; Feigley v. Feigley, 7 Md. 562; Sanborn v. Lang, 41 Md. 113.

And even if the conveyance of an equitable title is free from fraud, it will not always bar dower.

Bank of Commerce v. Owens, 31 Md. 325.

The doctrine that the wife's right to dower is protected in equity against any conveyance made by the husband, with intent to defeat it, is well established by authorities elsewhere.

2 Scribner, Dower, 163; Chandler v. Hollingsworth, 3 Del. Ch. 99; Brown v. Bronson, 35 Mich. 415; Swaine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. 482; Petty v. Petty, 4 B. Mon. 217, 219; Jiggitts v. Jiggitts, 40 Miss. 718; Youngs v. Carter, 10 Hun, 194.

The fact that such a conveyance may carry out a previous purpose, not communicated to the wife, as to settle property conveyed to the husband by a former wife upon her family, is immaterial.

Brown v. Bronson, 35 Mich. 415, 418.

Where a husband with his own money purchased land, but, for the purpose of defrauding his wife of her right of dower therein, caused the conveyance to be made of a life estate only to himself, with remainder in fee to his daughter, it was held that the vendor's conveyance of the remainder to the daughter would be treated in equity as the husband's conveyance, and that in respect to the widow's dower right the husband would be taken to have been seised of an estate in land which he had afterwards conveyed away.

Crecelius v. Horst, 4 Mo. App. 419.

As to the favor with which the wife's right to dower should be regarded, see Reed v. Whitney, 7 Gray, 583.

The correlative doctrine of the invalidity of antenuptial conveyances by a wife, in fraud of the marital rights of her intended husband, cases for the application of which have more frequently arisen in England, is well settled both there and here.

Miller, J., delivered the following opinion:

This case was assigned to me to prepare the opinion of the court therein. The record is a large one and the testimony voluminous. The questions of law involved are important and those of fact depend upon a close scrutiny of the testimony and great care in deducing conclusions therefrom. The duty thus imposed I discharged to the best of my ability, but the conclusions I have reached have not in all respects met the approval of my brothers who heard the case with me, and they are in favor of the affirmance of the decree in toto. The parties however in this, as in every other case, are entitled to the best considered judgment of each judge who heard it; and instead of a silent dissent I have deemed it proper to express my views at some length, the excuse therefor being such as I have stated.

The bill was filed by Susanna V. Gaither to have dower laid off and assigned to her in all the lands of her deceased husband, James B. Gaither, who died in February, 1885, and the only controversy made in this court relates to her right to dower in what is called the "Locust Grove Farm," containing about 150 acres.

Mr. Gaither was twice married. His marriage with the complainant took place on the 17th of June, 1879, about seven months after the death of his first wife. He had no children by either marriage, but had taken to his home, when she was a child, Emily V. Cecil, a grand-niece of his first wife. This child was treated as a daughter by him and his wife, and was raised and educated by them as such. They were both devotedly attached to her, and she, with equal devotion and affection, regarded them as her parents. The legal title to all the lands mentioned in the bill, except this Locust Grove Farm, was devolved upon Mr. Gaither by the will of his first wife, executed in August, 1871, and it appears that when he was first married he had very little property of his own. He purchased the Locust Grove Farm at a trustee's sale on the 10th of November, 1879, after his second marriage, for $2,300 cash, and paid the money to the trustees; but before the sale was ratified he procured an order from the court by which Emily V. Cecil was substituted as purchaser in his stead, and the court afterwards ratified the sale as made to her as purchaser, and the trustees thereupon executed a deed conveying the land to her. This deed bears date the 17th of January, 1880, recites the order substituting Emily V. Cecil as purchaser, and conveys the property to her absolutely and unconditionally.

Miss Cecil, the grantee, afterwards (on the 30th of November, 1882) married James E. Rabbitt; and she and her husband subsequently, in October, 1884, sold and conveyed the land to John S. Crawford, one of the defendants to the bill.

From these facts, about which there is no dispute, it is apparent that Mr. Gaither was never vested with the legal title to this farm. By his purchase from the trustees, and payment of the purchase money, he acquired an equitable interest therein, but, so far as appears from the face of the papers, he held such equitable title at least not longer than up to the date of the deed from the trustees. If then there was nothing more in the case, there would be no difficulty in deciding that the complainant was not entitled to dower in this land.

In this State the right to dower has always been regulated by the common law, with the single modification thereof made by the Act of 1818, chap. 193, which provides that "A widow shall be entitled to dower in lands held by equitable title in the husband; but such right of dower shall not operate to the prejudice of any claim for the purchase money of such lands, or other lien on the same." Code. art. 45, § 5.

This statute was construed by the court of appeals in Hopkins v. Frey, 2 Gill, 359, and Miller v. Stump, 3 Gill, 304; and in the latter case the court declared that this Act "does not say and it ought not to be construed to mean that the widow shall be entitled to dower in lands held by equitable title in the husband at any time during the coverture."

By this the court undoubtedly decided that this Act does not give to the wife the same right of dower (indefeasible except with her consent, where the husband holds or acquires an equitable title) that the common law gives her where he holds or acquires the legal title; and such has been its accepted construction ever since that decision was made. It has always been held that an absolute sale and transfer of an equitable interest in land, by the husband alone, during his life, will bar all claim to dower. It was so decided by the chancellor in Bowie v. Berry, 1 Md. Ch. 452; and this doctrine is in nowise impugned by the decision of this court in Bank of Commerce v. Owens, 31 Md. 320.

In that case the husband was seised of the legal title in the land upon which theretofore the wife's inchoate right of dower had attached at common law. She had joined her husband in the execution of mortgages, and the property was afterwards sold under a deed of trust executed by the husband alone, for the purpose of paying all mortgages and incumbrances according to their legal priority; and the court held that she was dowable of the surplus after payment of the mortgages in which she had joined, and that this was her right at the common law. That was all that was actually decided in that case, but it may be inferred from what the court said in its opinion, as well as from the decision of the chancellor in Mantz v. Buchanan, 1 Md. Ch. 205, and of this court in Lynn v. Lynn, 27 Md. 547, that the same result would follow in the case of a simple mortgage of an equitable interest, although the chancellor, in Purdy v. Purdy, 3 Md. Ch. 547, seems to have regarded a mortgage as a transfer or parting with the equitable estate.

But no such question arises in the present case. There is here no mortgage nor any claim to a surplus. The claim is for the assignment of dower in the land, and from the construction placed upon this Act of Assembly by all these decisions, it seems to me quite clear that the husband has the same power of absolute alienation over an equitable interest in land that he has over his personal property, and that the same alienation that will defeat the widow's right to a distributive share in the one will defeat her claim to dower in the other.

But the complainant charges in her bill that her deceased husband adopted the plan of having this farm conveyed to Emily V. Cecil for the purpose of cheating and defrauding her of her dower in his estate; and it is contended that the whole arrangement was a scheme devised and carried out to accomplish that purpose; that Miss Cecil was made the mere nominal holder of the legal title, while Gaither remained the real and substantial owner, and that such was the understanding between them when the transaction took place. Before considering the testimony upon which this grave charge is founded, it is well to ascertain clearly what the law upon this subject is; and in doing this reference must be made to the Maryland decisions only, because they alone are binding authorities in the case, and it would seem that they have settled the question.

In Hays v. Henry, 1 Md. Ch. 337, a bill was filed by a widow for relief against certain conveyances of leasehold property (a house and lot) as made in fraud of her rights. The husband was living apart from his wife, and with a woman by whom he had children. He bought the property with his own money, and had it conveyed to the woman, who a few days afterwards conveyed the same to him upon certain trusts; but this trust deed contained a covenant that he should hold and use the property without hindrance from her, and he lived and died in the house. Both deeds were recorded on the same day, and were parcels of the same transaction. In deciding the case the chancellor lays down the law in very clear and emphatic terms, to the effect that while a husband cannot by will deprive his widow of her share of his personal property, there can be no doubt of his power to dispose of such property absolutely during his life, without the concurrence of his wife, and free from any claim on her part, provided the transaction is not merely colorable, and be unattended with circumstances indicative of fraud upon her rights.

"If the disposition," says the chancellor, "by the husband be bona fide, and no right is reserved to him, then, though made to defeat the claim of the wife, it will be good against her, because an act cannot be denounced as fraudulent which the law authorizes to be done. But if it be a mere device or contrivance by which the husband, not parting with the absolute dominion over the property during his life, seeks at his death, to deny his widow the share of his personal estate which the law assigns to her, then it will be ineffectual against her."

He then proceeds to decide the case before him, and decides it for the widow, upon the express ground of the reservation in the deed of trust, in favor of the husband, and his continued possession of the property down to the time of his death. In speaking of the purpose of the transaction he says: "That purpose, I am fully convinced, was to deprive the complainant of her share of her husband's estate," and adds: "This purpose, there is no doubt, could have been accomplished by an absolute and unconditional alienation of the property by sale or gift; and although such alienation was made with the intent imputed to this act, it would not vitiate it provided there was a transfer of the possession as well as the title and no reservation whatever to the husband."

It is plain from the whole tenor of the chancellor's decision in this case that when he declared that the disposition made by the husband must be bona fide, he had no reference to good faith on the part of the husband towards the wife, but to the transaction itself, as between the husband and his grantee or donee. The plain meaning of his language is that the transfer by the husband, whether by sale or gift, must be absolute and unconditional and not colorable merely.

In Dunnock v. Dunnock, 3 Md. Ch. 140, there was a bill by a wife for alimony out of the estate of her husband, who had abandoned her; and the charge was that he had conveyed away by bill of sale certain negro slaves, with a design to defraud her of her right to a reasonable maintenance, and of all interest (present or prospective) in these slaves. The chancellor found upon the proof that the bill of sale was absolute on its face, was accompanied with delivery of possession, and that there was no such reservation of right in the husband as to "defeat his unquestionable right to give away his personal property, to the prejudice of his wife's claim to a distributive share after his death," and denied the relief prayed. There was parol proof of a written agreement between the grantor and grantee, that the latter should return the negroes to the former when he should call for them, or forfeit $1,200. This proof was not admitted, but the chancellor held that such an agreement would not have affected the case, even if it had been proved, because it did not bind the grantee to return the property, but only to do so or pay $1,200. In this case the chancellor reaffirmed the law as he had stated it in Hays v. Henry, 1 Md. Ch. 337, and in the course of his opinion said:

"It is not enough to show that the conveyance, assuming it to be without a valuable consideration, was made to defeat the claim of the wife; that the law allows the husband to do by gift, so far as his personal estate is concerned, provided there be no right reserved to himself; and it is not a mere fiction by which, not devesting himself of the dominion over his property during his life, he attempts after his death to deprive her of her distributive share thereof."

In Feigley v. Feigley, 7 Md. 537, a wife filed a bill for a divorce and alimony; she subsequently amended her bill and charged that her husband, in order to deprive her of all hope of any provision out of his property, and confederating with his sister for that purpose, had executed a deed conveying to the latter all his interest in the estate of his deceased father, for a trifling and pretended consideration; that this conveyance was merely fictitious, and not intended really to deprive the grantor of the benefit of this estate, but to save the same for his own use, and the sister was brought in as a party to the suit. The case was elaborately argued, and the court, after deciding that the wife had, under the terms of the Statute of Elizabeth, a standing in court to impeach the deed, considered the question whether it was a bona fide transaction or the result of a deliberate purpose to defraud the wife of her claim to alimony. Upon this question they say they had no doubt but that the deed was executed by the husband in fraud of her rights, but that there was no direct or sufficient proof (in face of the denials in her answer) of any fraudulent participation by the sister in the transaction, and that there was no such glaring inadequacy of consideration as would of itself stamp the transaction with fraud, and thereby render the deed void; they, therefore, reversed so much of the decree below as vacated this deed, and refused to allow the wife alimony, because the husband had no estate out of which it could be allowed. There is plainly nothing in this decision which overrules or modifies the law as laid down by the chancellor in cases above cited.

In Sanborn v. Long, 41 Md. 107, a widow filed a bill to vacate a deed of real and personal property executed, as she averred, by her husband, in contemplation of his death, and with the avowed and express purpose of depriving her of her distributive share of his estate. It was conceded that she was entitled to dower in the real estate, the husband having had the legal title thereto, and the controversy was over her right to her share of the personal property. The court conceded that the legal principles involved were stated with substantial accuracy by the chancellor in Hays v. Henry, but that the facts showed that there was a reservation of an interest in the grantor, and that he remained in possession of the property until his death. The gist of the court's opinion in this case is in the following extract:

"The facts that the power of attorney was prepared at Sanborn's instance and sent on to be executed before the deed was made; that it secured to him the unlimited right of disposing of the property as owner; that he did so deal with it by having a portion of it mortgaged to obtain money for his own use; and that he remained in possession of it till his death, conclusively show that though the deed was absolute on its face, the intent and purpose of the transaction and of the parties was that while Sanborn retained dominion and control over the property in his lifetime, his wife should have no part or share of it after his death. This being so the case falls directly within the principles laid down by the chancellor in Hays v. Henry, and by this court in Feigley v. Feigley. The deed was not made bona fide, but as respects the wife was fraudulent, and cannot operate to deprive her of her legal rights as widow and distributee."

The fair conclusion from these authorities is that a husband may alienate his personal property and his equitable interest in land, either by sale or gift without the concurrence or assent of his wife; and if the transfer be absolute and unconditional, and without any reservation of interest in or control over the property to himself, and if the possession be parted with or delivered in pursuance of the conveyance, it is valid, even though his intent and purpose in making it may have been to deprive his wife of her dower or thirds therein, provided there be no fraudulent participation on the part of the grantee or donee in such intent or purpose. In fact this power of the husband over such property has been so long recognized by the courts, and so often exercised, as to have become not only a well established principle of law, but a settled rule of property upon which a large number of titles depend.

But on the other hand if the transfer be colorable, merely, that is to say if it be a mere device or contrivance by which the husband does not part with the absolute dominion over the property during his life, but seeks thereby to defeat the claims of his widow at his death, the law pronounces it a fraud upon her rights; and this fraud may be proved and established by his retention of possession during his life, by a reservation of an interest to himself on the face of the conveyance, or by any outside agreement or arrangement between him and his grantee or donee, to the effect that he shall receive the benefit of, or have control over the property, during his life, or by any other fraudulent participation on the part of the grantee or donee to aid him in his purpose of defeating the rights which the law gives to his widow upon his death.

The question then is, Does the proof in this record make out a case of such fraud in the transaction relating to this farm? The testimony is voluminous; and all that can be expected in an opinion is a statement of the facts bearing upon the material points, established by the preponderance of proof.

It appears, then, that at the date of Mr. Gaither's second marriage the favorite and petted child, Emily, had grown to womanhood; and after the marriage she and the new wife did not get along well together, although there is no proof of any open rupture between them. Mr. Gaither then determined to provide her with a separate home and residence, and accordingly purchased this farm and had the title conveyed to her in the manner already stated. The deed from the trustees was absolute on its face, without any reservation or condition whatever, and was promptly delivered and recorded.

In December, 1879, shortly after his purchase and before the deed had been executed by the trustees, Mr. Gaither fitted up and furnished the house upon the farm, and Emily went there to live and her brother John F. Cecil lived with her, up to the time of her marriage on the 30th of November, 1882. During the three years prior to her marriage Mr. Gaither cultivated the farm and received the proceeds of the crops, but at the same time improved the place, by clearing up, ditching and liming the land and putting up new fences. When the marriage took place he attended a reception given at the house, and there in the presence of a number of witnesses and guests he declared he had given her this farm and that there was not the "scratch of a pen against it," and then addressing the young couple said "Now, my children, you must go to work and do the best you can." After this and up to the time of his death in February, 1885, he was never in possession of the property. All this is quite consistent with what a father upon his second marriage would have done under similar circumstances for a grown up and unmarried daughter by his first wife, to whom he wished and was able to make an advancement.

But it appears that on the 12th of June, 1879, five days before his marriage to the complainant, he also conveyed certain personal and real property in Gaithersburg to Emily V. Cecil, the consideration therefor, as stated in the deed, being love and affection and "her devoted attention to me," the grantor, "for years past."

But by this deed he reserved a life estate in the property to himself, and moreover did not deliver it until some weeks or months after his marriage, and no question is made as to the complainant's right to dower in this real estate, He also took from the grantee an agreement in writing to reconvey this property to him in fee simple, at any time he should call upon her to do so, under a penalty of $5,000; but this agreement was executed after, although it is dated before, her marriage.

In February, 1883, Mr. Gaither desired to have the reversionary interest in this Gaithersburg property conveyed to John F. Cecil, the brother of Mrs. Rabbitt; and the latter seems to have been willing to execute such a deed, but her husband refused to join in the conveyance, and in this refusal was supported by his father. This brought about a bitter quarrel between Gaither and the Rabbitts, and the former instituted an action at law against Mrs. Rabbitt and her husband, upon two sealed notes or single bills each for $3,000 payable on demand and bearing interest from date and both purporting to have been signed by Mrs. Rabbitt before her marriage. The first bears date the 22d of March, 1882, and is a renewal of another one to the same effect which had been accidentally destroyed. This one was signed by her before her marriage; but the second, although dated the 17th of June, 1879, was in fact signed by her in her maiden name in March, 1883, after her marriage.

Mrs. Rabbitt and her husband then filed a bill in equity for an injunction to restrain the prosecution of this suit, upon the ground that these notes were without consideration and void. The bill states at length the circumstances under which and the purposes for which these notes were given, and prays that they be delivered up and canceled. A preliminary injunction was granted, and in his answer to the bill Mr. Gaither disavowed all intention of proceeding upon the second note; and in the narr. which he afterwards filed in the law case, he declared only upon the first. He insisted in his answer that this note was given upon a valuable, valid, and sufficient consideration; that he required it of her when the Locust Grove farm was deeded to Emily V. Cecil, and denied that the transaction was a gift to her. This suit was a protracted one, and was prosecuted with much bitterness on both sides. Mr. Gaither died before it was decided, but after he had testified; and his executors were made defendants.

The position taken by Mrs. Rabbitt in her testimony was that she executed the note upon the representation of Mr. Gaither, in whom she placed implicit confidence and trust, that he wanted it in case she should die before he did, so that her relations in St. Mary's County could not get the property, and that it should only be used in that event; that she kept it in her own possession, and delivered it up to him in March, 1883, and executed the other note at his instance, and upon his suggestion that in his hands they could be used as a means of inducing or making h— husband unite in the conveyance of the Gaithersburg property to her brother; while that of Mr. Gaither was that he had required her to give him this note as security for the purchase money he had paid for the Locust Grove farm.

The court reviewed the testimony in an elaborate and able opinion, decided the case in her favor, and passed a decree (from which no appeal was taken) making the injunction perpetual and canceling both notes. The court held that the proof showed that Mr. Gaither made a free and voluntary gift of this farm to Mrs. Rabbitt, and that the note was without consideration and was executed under the circumstances and for the purpose stated by her in her testimony.

The present complainant was not a party to that suit, and of course is not bound by the decree or by anything said in the court's opinion. But the record and testimony taken in that case was offered in evidence in this, and is therefore to be considered. The testimony which bears upon the question whether there was any fraudulent participation on the part of Mrs. Rabbitt in the supposed or actual intent of Mr. Gaither to defeat his wife's right of dower in this land, is mainly that of Mr. Gaither and Mrs. Rabbitt. The latter was not examined as a witness in the present case; she died before it was decided, leaving two infant children who have been made defendants. The testimony of the other witnesses in both cases throws very little light upon the question now under consideration. Her testimony shows that she had the utmost confidence in Mr. Gaither, who stood to her in loco parentis; that he was her adviser in all business matters; that she did whatever he required; that she looked upon him as a father, was grateful to him for his kindness and benefactions; and it may be fairly inferred that had she remained unmarried she would have devoted this property, as well as everything else she had, to his use if his necessities had required such a sacrifice.

On cross examination she was asked: "Was it not understood between you and Mr. Gaither that he was to use and farm this place as long as he lived or thought proper to do so?" And her reply was "Yes, sir; he was to use it as long as he lived, but never to sell it from me; but after I was married he gave it up to me, and said now let my husband work it; that he was not going to work it any longer; he said he was buying lime and fixing it up for me and he wanted me to stay there as long as I lived, and never to sell it."

Her husband also testified that about two weeks after his marriage Mr. Gaither said to him: "I give up this place to you, and all that is on it except my wheat crop; and now you can go ahead, because I have been bothered with it long enough, and if you need any help I will help you all I can;" that the delivery of possession and control over the place was absolute, and he was only to have the privilege of harvesting and threshing his wheat crop the following summer, and that he asked as an accommodation (which was accorded) permission to keep his hogs there until fattening time, and a heifer until the first of the year.

It is quite probable that if the donee had remained unmarried, things would have gone on as at first. She would have continued to live in the house, and Mr. Gaither would have continued to cultivate and improve the farm, but whatever may have been the original understanding between them as to his continued possession of the property, it was abandoned by him upon her marriage; he knew and approved of her contemplated marriage; and when it took place he delivered possession to her and her husband. The weight of proof on this point is overwhelming, and the legal conclusion is irresistible that this gift was fully and finally consummated during the lifetime of the donor. Nor is there anything to be found in the testimony of Mr. Gaither when carefully examined to warrant the conclusion that Mrs. Rabbitt was a participant in this alleged fraud upon the rights of his wife.

He admits upon cross examination that he did not have any agreement with Mrs. Rabbitt that she should deed the property back to him whenever he wanted it; that he never said anything to her on that subject and never told her that she was merely to hold the title and convey it back whenever he wished. Then, upon re-examination by his own counsel, this question was put to him: "You have stated on cross examination that you never said anything to Emily V. Cecil about reconveying the Locust Grove farm to you, nor had any arrangement or understanding with her, by which said farm was to be reconveyed, and yet you state you knew she would convey it to you if you asked her. How do you know it?" And his answer was: "It was my opinion, from the confidence I had in her. I mean that I simply believed that she would do it." But his mere belief as to what she would do is by no means tantamount to an agreement on her part to do it, and this is what must be proved in order to make her a participant in the fraud. Her own conduct itself refutes this imputation. When the gift was perfected by delivery of possession on her marriage, she thereafter firmly asserted her rights as donee. She voluntarily joined her husband in filing the injunction bill, and resolutely and successfully resisted the effort of Mr. Gaither to enforce the note in order to subject this property to its payment.

Here, as in every other case where fraud is charged or imputed, it must be made out by clear and satisfactory proof; and it is not the province of a court to strain the evidence in order to establish it, even in aid of the favored claim for dower. Beyond doubt the evidence is insufficient to fasten the imputation of fraud in this transaction upon Mrs. Rabbitt; and in fact no such charge is made against her in the bill. What the bill charges is that the husband by this transaction intended to cheat and defraud his wife of her dower in this land, but the proof clearly shows that as between donor and donee the transaction was not colorable merely, nor a fiction, nor a sham, but a bona fide perfected and effectual gift.

The case then is one in which a husband has seen fit to make in his lifetime an absolute donation to another of his equitable interest in land. He had the legal right to do this, even if his purpose was to defeat his wife's claim to dower, and having done it, the claim is defeated, unless the long established construction of the Act of 1818, as well as settled rules and principles of evidence and law, is to be overturned and set at naught for the purpose of giving the widow relief in this case. But this it is not competent for the court to do, no matter what the apparent or supposed hardship of the particular case may be. It is for the Legislature, if it sees fit, to place equitable interests in land upon the same footing, as regards the right of dower therein, as legal interests; but this it has not yet done, and it is clear that the courts ought not to usurp legislative power. They can construe a statute, but having once clearly and definitely done so, and that construction having been acquiesced in and acted upon for more than forty years, it is for the Legislature to change the statute rather than for the courts now to change its construction, even if they should deem it erroneous. There can however be no reasonable doubt as to the correctness of the construction placed upon this Act by our predecessors.

These are the views I entertain both as to the law and the facts of this case; and in my opinion so much of the decree as directs the commissioners to lay off and assign dower to the complainant in this Locust Grove farm should be reversed, and in other respects affirmed.

In this result however a majority of my brothers who heard the case with me do not concur, and I am instructed by them to say that if it be conceded (without however so deciding) that it was necessary to prove that Mrs. Rabbitt participated in the fraudulent intent on the part of Mr. Gaither to defraud the appellee of her rights as his wife, they are of opinion that the evidence in the record shows that she had knowledge of such fraudulent intent at the time this farm was conveyed to her, and participated therein. They are therefore of opinion that the decree should be affirmed in its entirety, and it is accordingly so ordered.

Decree affirmed and cause remanded.

2. Where one of the joint owners of land obtains the signatures of the other owners to a deed thereof by fraud and deceit and misrepresentation as to the character of the paper, they not intending to sell it, and also by false statements induced the grantee to believe that he represented the other owners and was authorized to sell their interests and thereby obtained from the grantee payment of the purchase price, the deed will be set aside and declared void.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, in favor of complainants in an action to set aside a deed. Affirmed.

This was a bill in equity filed by Elizabeth Hubbard, George W. Hubbard and Mary J.

Hubbard, his wife, and Thomas J. Hubbard, an infant suing by his next friend, against William A. Dunnington, to set aside a deed which purported to convey to defendant certain real estate alleged to belong to complainants.

The bill charged that the signatures to said deed were forgeries, and averred a belief that they were affixed thereto by one John William Willson or by his procurement.

The bill further alleged that although complainants fully believed that the signatures to the deed are forgeries, yet if they are in the genuine handwriting of the grantors, that they were fixed to the paper upon the false and fraudulent representation of said Willson; that the paper was one which they had agreed to sign, for the purpose of authorizing the closing of an alley and for no other purpose; that they signed it in full reliance by them upon the truth of said Willson's assertion; that said Willson was acting as an agent of the defendant Dunnington, and that said Dunnington is responsible for his acts. But complainants do not mean to charge that Dunnington had any knowledge of the guilty conduct of Willson.

The answer of defendant denied the material allegations of the bill and averred that the deed was duly signed, sealed, acknowledged and delivered, and was in all respects a genuine and authentic instrument.

At the trial in the court below the evidence in regard to the genuineness of the signatures of the adult complainants was conflicting. It appeared that John William Willson was a part owner of the property in question; that the adult complainants never intended to convey away their property; that they never received any of the purchase money and that said Willson was not their agent; that they signed a paper which they thought was an agreement for closing an alley and were induced to sign it by the statements and representations of said Willson; that such was the character of the paper; that after the paper was signed it was taken possession of by Willson and a justice of the peace; that the deed, which purported to convey the property for $3,175, was dated August 20, 1880, and the certificate of the justice of the peace to its acknowledgement was of the same date; that September 9 thereafter it was executed by Thomas J. Hubbard, who was at that time under age, and acknowledged before another justice of the peace. Said Thomas J. executed it at the instance of Willson, and at the trial testified that he did not know the nature of the instrument at the time he signed it.

It further appears that Willson falsely stated to Dunnington, the grantee, that he was authorized to sell the interests of the other owners in the property, and had received from Dunnington the greater portion of the purchase price before the date of the deed, and September 11, 1880, delivered the deed with certificates of acknowledgement attached to the grantees' agent and received at that time the balance of the purchase price; that Willson retained the whole of this money to his own use; that he was not authorized to negotiate and sell by the other owners and none of them except Thomas J. knew that a sale was in contemplation; that they did not deal in any way with Dunnington, nor at any time authorize Willson or anyone else to deliver the deed in their behalf, nor did they know that it had been delivered.

Elizabeth Hubbard died during the pendency of the suit, and George W. Hubbard as her administrator was made a party complainant in her place.

The court below ordered a decree setting the deed aside: and defendant appealed to this court.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Robinson, Irving, Ritchie, and Bryan, JJ.

Mr. N. P. Bond, for appellant.

Mr. Bernard Carter, for appellees.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Some of the facts in this case are involved in considerable obscurity. But it is very certain that a gross fraud has been perpetrated by one John William Willson, an attorney at law. The details of the transaction were carried out with singular skill and audacity.

The deed in question was recorded in the manner required by law, and it must therefore be held valid, unless it is overthrown by competent proof. "Where an instrument of writing is required by law to be recorded, the enrollment of it is evidence of all circumstances necessary to give it validity. But this evidence is not conclusive; it is only prima facie, and like all prima facie evidence may be rebutted. To give it a conclusive effect might be ruinous to the community; an enrollment however obtained would exclude all inquiry; it would be a shield and protection to fraud, forgery and deceit." Crawford v. State, 6 Harr. & J. 234.

One of the supposed grantors is under the age of twenty-one years, and the instrument is, of course, void as to him. We are satisfied from the proof that the other supposed grantors never consciously signed the deed. If the signatures are in their genuine handwriting, they were obtained by fraud and deceit practiced by Willson, and under the belief on their part, that they were signing a totally different paper. They never received a cent for their property; they never intended to sell it; they never knowingly signed a deed of conveyance for it; and certainly nothing was further from their thoughts than to authorize the delivery of this deed by Willson, or by anyone else.

Under these circumstances, there was no delivery of the deed. Let us quote a passage from Sheppard's Touchstone: "The fifth thing required in every well made deed is that there be a delivery of it. * * * And though the party to whom it is made take it to himself, or happen to get it into his hands, yet will it do him no good, nor him that made it any hurt, until it be delivered. And a deed may be delivered by the party himself that doth make it, or by any other by his appointment or authority precedent, or assent or agreement subsequent, for Omnis ratihabitio mandato æquiparatur. And when it is delivered by another that hath a good authority and doth pursue it, it is as good a deed as if it were delivered by the party himself; but if he do not pursue his authority, then it is otherwise. And, therefore, if a deed, or the contents thereof, be read or declared to a man that is to seal it; and he (being illiterate) doth deliver it to a stranger, and bid him examine it; and if it be so as it was read to him, then to deliver it as his deed, otherwise to redeliver it to him again that made it; in this case if the deed be in truth otherwise than it was read, and yet, notwithstanding, he, to whom it was delivered, doth deliver it to him to whom it was made, this delivery shall not avail; neither is the deed by this delivery become a good deed." Chap. 4, p. 57.

There cannot be the slightest imputation against the grantee. He fairly paid his money, and honestly thought that he had purchased this property. Willson, being one of the owners, by false statements induced Dunnington, the grantee, to believe that he represented the other owners, and was authorized to sell their interests. After he had induced Dunnington to advance to him the greater portion of the purchase money, he delivered to him this fraudulent deed, which had every indication of a genuine instrument, and he received the remainder of the price of the property.

Dunnington became the victim of a man in whom he placed an unmerited confidence. The appellees, with the exception of the infant, had no agency in misleading him. Dunnington dealt exclusively with Willson, without any communication whatever with the other owners of the property, and without any knowledge on their part of his proceedings. He paid Willson nearly one half of the purchase money before the date of the deed, and by far the greater portion of it before he received it. The decree must be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

Mayor and City Council of BALTIMORE,
Appt.,
v.
Henry G. FLEDDERMAN.

1. The courts have jurisdiction to hear and decide an appeal from the decision of a register of voters, after the November election, when the appeal has been taken before such election.
2. The jurisdiction of the courts, having attached, will not be ousted by lapse of time, except by some express provision in the law or by the evident and unmistakable intent of the Act that it should not continue beyond the day of election.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court, in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover sheriff's fees for the service of writs in certain appeals by petition from the decision of a register of voters. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Irving, Bryan, Yellott and Stone, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Bernard Carter, for appellant:

By the express provision of section 22 of the Act of 1882, chap. 22, petitions of appeal from the registers of elections can only be filed "at any time before the time appointed by law for delivering the poll books or lists of qualified and registered voters, to the judges of election."

We submit, therefore, that the Legislature did not intend to confer and has not conferred upon the judge of the supreme bench any power to hear any petition after the time fixed by law for the delivery of said poll books to the judges of election; the time so fixed is the morning of election.

The logical result of the construction put upon this law by the judge of the supreme bench is that he is authorized to continue the hearing of petitions filed within the time above mentioned, until he has disposed of all of them, even though that might run up to, and indeed beyond, next September.

The agreed statement of facts shows that there are about a thousand of these petitions still unheard.

Against this construction, involving heavy costs to the taxpayers of Baltimore City, we respectfully contend:

1. The jurisdiction here conferred being a special statutory one, its existence must be affirmatively shown; and if the power claimed is not conferred, its acts and orders are absolutely void.

Cockney v. Cole, 28 Md. 283, 284; Oler v. R. R. Co. 41 Md. 590.

2. It is apparent, upon the whole Act of 1882, chap. 22, that the general duty of the proper registration of voters (inclusive and exclusive) is to be discharged by registers, appointed by the executive department of the State and not by the judicial department; and the interposition of the action of the courts is only exceptional.

3. If it was intended that the court should proceed to hear cases after the time fixed by law for the delivery of the poll books to the judges of election, what was the object in providing that the petitions must all be filed before that time? Is it not clear that the Legislature contemplated the correction of the lists, so far as the instrumentality of the courts is concerned, for the then approaching election alone?

Mr. Jos. S. Heuisler, for appellee.

The sole question presented on this appeal is whether the circuit courts for the counties, or any one of the courts of Baltimore City, has jurisdiction to hear and determine an appeal from the decision of a register of voters, after the November election, when the appeal has been taken before such election. The whole matter depends upon the Act of 1882, chap. 22, providing for the registration of voters. It has been supposed that the courts have no such jurisdiction to hear and decide such appeal after the regular election in November because the Act of 1882 provides that such appeal must be taken before such election is held.

But to this it may be answered that in this State, and we believe we may safely say in this country, whenever an appeal is allowed to a higher court, some time is always fixed within which such appeal must be taken.

If the appellant does not take his appeal within the prescribed time, it will be dismissed. But, if taken in time and once properly before the appellate court, it is heard and tried according to the law rules governing the trial of such cases in that court, and without any reference to the time within which the appeal was required to be taken. This is undoubtedly the general rule; and the fact that the appeal in this case was required to be taken before the election would not, of itself, imperatively require the appellate court to try the case before the election.

But the appellant contends that, taking the whole law, it was its purpose and intent that the registration should be perfected before the election, and that upon the delivery of the lists to the judges of election (which is done on the morning of the election) the power of the courts to make corrections is at an end, until after the next annual sitting of the registers. To determine this question some reference to the object of the law and its provisions is necessary.

The general object of the registration law is to secure to every qualified voter the right to vote in his proper district and to prevent disqualified voters from voting. The Act of 1882 (chap. 22), the existing registration law, remedies a defect that had existed in the previous law. This law permits the duly qualified voter to apply to the register to have stricken from the lists the names of all persons disqualified to vote in any particular precinct or district and to appeal to the courts, if his application is refused by the register. While the duly qualified voter's ballot may be deposited and counted, his right to vote, so highly prized by the citizen, may be rendered comparatively valueless to him if his vote can be nullified by fraudulent voting.

It was to prevent this that the Act of 1882 gave to any qualified voter not only the right to have himself registered but to see that the lists were kept clean. An appeal is allowed, provided it is taken within the prescribed time, in all cases where a name is improperly put on or kept off the lists.

The appeal is taken by a petition to the court or judge stating the facts, etc., and if the petition shows a prima facie cause of complaint the judge or court orders a summons and proceeds to try the case.

The jurisdiction of the court attaches as soon as such petition is filed, within the prescribed time, and showing a prima facie case. The jurisdiction of the courts having attached will not be ousted by lapse of time, except by some express provision in the law, or the evident and unmistakable intent of the Act that it should not continue beyond the day of election. There is no such express provison, nor can we gather from the law that such was the intent of its framers.

It is apparent that the Act contemplated that these cases should be disposed of as soon as they possibly could. This is evident from the fact that the twenty-second section requires the summons to be issued forthwith upon the filing the petition and more strongly still by the general purpose of the law that every election should be fairly conducted. But the interest of the voter in a correct list is not confined to the one election immediately following the filing his petition. There may be a special election held before the next annual correction of the list. These special elections are provided for by sections 23 and 26 of the Act of 1882.

These sections provide that at such special elections, the list made at the previous October sittings of the registers as corrected by the judges shall be the list of the qualified voters. If for want of sufficient time the courts are unable to complete the correction of the lists before the annual November election, there can exist no reason, either in the language or policy of the law, why it should not be completed afterwards to be used in the event of a special election.

But it has been argued that there is no practical use in correcting the list after the annual November election, because before the next regular election the registers would again sit, and they could make the corrections. If we throw out of view entirely the contingency of a special election, still there will exist no valid reason why the correction should not be made after the annual election.

The Act of 1882, by prescribing a punishment for it, very clearly recognizes the possibility of fraud being practiced by the registers. In the event of such fraud being practiced, it would be very Utopian to expect the fraud to be remedied by him who perpetrated it. He could hardly be expected to undo one fall what he had purposely done the fall before. The appeal was given as well to correct and prevent fraud as to rectify mistakes; one method of perpetrating a fraud is to place and keep on the list the name of a disqualified voter and known to be such by the register. The only way to get such names off is by appeal. If the argument of the appellant is correct, and the power of the courts over the list ends with the annual election, then if a large number of fraudulent names are on the list, it is difficult to see how the fraud is ever to be remedied, without at least a change of the registration officer. The agreed statement of facts in this case shows that there are one thousand cases still unacted upon by the courts.

This fact demonstrates the impossibility of trying all the cases in the very limited time between the October sitting and the November election. These thousand cases may or may not be cases involving fraud. If fraudulent, are they to remain there until the next election and be voted again, and again escape striking off for want of time? Or did the Legislature intend the whole list to be purified by the courts, if the registers failed in their duty? We think there can be but one answer to this question.

It has been argued that the jurisdiction of the courts in this matter being a special statutory one, its existence must be shown, and many cases have been cited to sustain this proposition. To this we assent. But the existence of the jurisdiction in this case is affirmatively shown by the filing of the petition. The question here is not when the jurisdiction attaches, but when it ends. No case has been shown, or can be shown, holding that a court having once properly obtained jurisdiction of a case can lose it before the trial, without some positive law to that effect.

Nor can we consider the question of costs, pressed in the argument, as having any influence in the decision of this question. If the petitioners fail in their cases, like any other plaintiffs they are taxed with all the costs. If it is shown that the registers have acted in bad faith they alone are responsible for the costs. It is only in the event that the registers are mistaken that the costs are taxed to the city.

While it would be desirable in every case that as few burdens as possible should be thrown on the city, still the successful operation of so important a law should not be impaired or hindered by the possible contingency of some costs falling upon the Corporation.

Judgment affirmed.

John GLENN, Trustee of the National Express & Transportation Co., Appt.,
v.
William H. CLABAUGH.

1. The insolvent laws of this State discharge from all debts and contracts made before the filing of the insolvent's petition, but can have effect only as between citizens or residents of this State.
2. The insolvent laws of one State cannot discharge the contracts of citizens of other States; they have no extraterritorial operation; and it makes no difference that the action to enforce the contract is brought in a court of the State where the debtor resides and under whose insolvent laws he obtained his discharge.*
3. A discharge under the insolvent laws of this State is no defense to an action for an assessment on the stock of a corporation of the State of Virginia. The contract of subscription is governed by the laws of that State, and is to be performed there.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, overruling a demurrer to a plea of insolvent's discharge in an action to recover an assessment on certain shares of stock in an insolvent corporation. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Stone, Miller, Robinson, Ritchie and Bryan, JJ.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John M. Glenn and Charles Marshall, for appellant.

Messrs. Sebastian Brown, Stewart Brown and J. Alexander Preston, for appellee.

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is in all respects similar to the cases of Glenn v. Howard, and Glenn v. Savage, 2 Cent. Rep. 648, except that instead of the defense of final discharge of the defendants under the Bankrupt Law of the United States, as in those cases, we have here the defense that the defendant had duly obtained a final discharge under the Insolvent Laws of this State, on the 15th of September, 1879, and that the alleged cause of action accrued before the filing of his petition. The plaintiff demurred to this plea, and the demurrer was overruled by the court below, and judgment was entered for the defendant.

The action being for a call upon stock, under the decree of the 14th of December, 1880, as set forth in the declaration, it would seem, upon reason and principle, that the same conclusion reached in the preceding cases should be maintained in this. But the Insolvent Law of this State, under which the defendant was discharged, makes no special provision for the character of debts to be proved, or as to the mode of proving debts or claims against the insolvent estate. Nor does it provide, as in the Bankrupt Law, that the discharge shall only operate upon such debts as were proved or were provable against the insolvent estate. But it provides in the most unqualified terms that the discharge shall be "from all debts and contracts made before the filing of his petition, and he shall be released from all such debts and contracts; and such discharge and release shall embrace all cases where he is indorser or surety," etc.

These terms are certainly very comprehensive, and anything that falls within the definition of debt or contract, would seem to be embraced by them; and in view of the decisions of the court in the cases of Berry v. McLean, 11 Md. 92; State v. Cutler, 18 Md. 419; and Reynolds v. Mut. Fire Ins. Co. 34 Md. 280, and especially the two latter cases, it would seem to be doubtful whether a contract of the nature sued on in this case is not embraced within the operation of a discharge under the Insolvent Law of the State.

But however this may be, it is very clear that the insolvent discharge can form no bar to the recovery in this case. Here the contract sued on was made with a corporation of the State of Virginia. That corporation derived all its powers of existence and its franchises from that State; and there it had its principal office and seat of its governing body. The contract of subscription to its capital stock was to be performed there, as and when required by the president and directors of the company. The law of the State, and of the creation of the corporation itself, fixed the terms of the contract of subscription; and the defendant is conclusively presumed to have contracted with reference to such law. He, therefore, impliedly subjected himself to such laws of that State as affected the powers and obligations of the corporation, and as prescribed the terms, and the manner of performance, of the contract made with such corporation. Canada Southern R. R. Co. v. Gebhard, 109 U. S. 527, 537-8 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 1020].

The plaintiff in this case was not a party to the contract, but is only an officer entrusted with executive powers under a decree of a competent court of Virginia, made to secure the performance of the obligations of the corporation, for which the defendant, as a stockholder, is in part bound; and it is not competent for him to invoke the Insolvent Laws of Maryland to discharge him from that obligation.

The Insolvent Laws of the State profess to operate upon all contracts, without regard to the residence of the creditors; but this general provision of the statute is necessarily qualified by the Constitution of the United States and by the decisions of the supreme court declaring the meaning and effect of that Constitution upon the legislation of the several States.

The State possesses the unquestioned power of passing insolvent laws, if not in conflict with the legislation of Congress upon the subject; but insolvent laws passed by a State can have operation and effect only as between the citizens or residents of that State; and they can have no effect whatever to discharge contracts made with citizens or persons of other States. In other words, the insolvent laws of one State cannot discharge the contracts of citizens of other States, because such laws have no extra-territorial operation. And such being the case, it makes no difference whatever that the action for the enforcement of the contract is brought in a court of the State where the debtor resides, and under whose insolvent laws he has obtained his discharge. The contract not being subject to the operation of those laws, the defendant's discharge can furnish him no defense, no matter in what court the suit may be brought.

This is the clear purport of the decisions of this court, as it is of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, made upon this subject; and it is therefore clear that the plea of the insolvent discharge forms no bar to this action, and the demurrer thereto should have been sustained. Frey v. Kirk, 4 Gill & J. 510; Poe v. Duck, 5 Md. 1; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 358 [25 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 656]; Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet. 348 [31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 423]; Baldwin v. Hale, and Baldwin v. Bank of Newbury, 1 Wall. 223, 234 [68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 531, 534].

It follows that the judgment of the Court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Jules A. RANDLE, Appt.,
v.
Adrian L. MELLEN.

1. The proceeding by way of attachment against a nonresident or absconding debtor is regulated entirely by statute, and compliance with the statute is essential to the validity of the proceeding.
2. If the summons be returned non est and the defendant does not appear to the short note to contest the claim, nor give bond to dissolve, then if the attachment be quashed on motion or petition for defects apparent upon the face of the proceeding, or in any other mode, or for any other reason, it seems that the whole statutory proceeding and every part of it, including the summons and short note, fall with it and are forever out of court, unless the quashing order be reversed on appeal.
3. Hence it seems that when an attachment has been so quashed the short note case connected therewith is at an end, and the subsequent return of non est to an alias summons will be of no avail for any purpose whatever.
4. When an attachment issued against a defendant as an absconding debtor has been quashed for errors in the proceedings or for other cause which the attaching creditor thinks can be corrected, he may begin de novo and obtain another, but he cannot go on and obtain successive attachments upon two returns of non est to writs of summons issued in the same attachment proceeding. (Code, art. 10, § 25, construed.)

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Robinson, Irving, Stone and Bryan, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward Otis Hinkley, Frederick W. Story and John Hinkley, for appellant:

The appellant contends that there was error in striking out the judgment for attachment after two returns of non est in the manner stated.

1. It was a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, which could not be stricken out in this way.

2. If there was error, it was the subject of an appeal from that judgment.

3. Code, art. 10, § 21, does not apply to judgments for attachment after two returns of non est.

Campbell v. Morris, 3 Harr. & Mc H. 558.

The evidence given at trial is not the subject of inquiry after judgment, except on motion for new trial, and this is not such a case. It is a judgment and must stand.

The Code, § 25, says: "Upon proof of his claim," the judge must have had proof and it must have been satisfactory.

If any inquiry could be made the proceeding would be found to be conformable to law.

Section 25, says: "Proof of his claim as herein before required." This refers back to section 4, "unless there be an affidavit."

In the original Act of 1715, chap. 40, §§ 2, 3, it stood—"and making such proof of his action as the said respective courts shall see fit."

See Hinkley & Mayer, Attachment, chap. XXVI, p. 120 et seq. and chap. II, p. 8 et seq.; Poe, Pr. § 471, p. 571; Evans, Pr. pp. 94, 119, 120; Burney v. Patterson, 6 Harr. & J. 200.

The short note or declaration of the plaintiff against the defendant in every attachment is a distinct case, and leads to a different issue and judgment from the attachment itself, which last, when laid in hands of a garnishee, is a case between defendant as if another plaintiff against the garnishee; or this last, if property be taken, is a proceeding in rem, as to which claimants may come in.

That there are two cases in every attachment has often been held.

Barr v. Perry, 3 Gill, 322, 326; Spear v. Griffin, 23 Md. 428, 429; Lambden v. Bowie, 2 Md. 339, 340; Hirsh v. Thurber, 54 Md. 211; Locke, Foreign Attachment (79 Law Lib. 56).

Code, art. 10, § 10, expressly provides that "There shall be issued with every attachment a writ of summons against the defendant, and a declaration or short note."

Hinkley & Mayer, Attachment, chap. VIII, p. 29.

The short note will serve as a declaration; and no other need be filed.

Barr v. Perry, 3 Gill, 322; Spear v. Griffin, 23 Md. 428.

The affidavit was rightly made at the commencement of the action, as well by the practice of common law as under the Act of 1886, chap. 184; and no new affidavit is necessary after the second non est.

In Locke on Foreign Attachment, 79 Law Lib. pp. 1, 2, the origin of foreign attachment at common law is given. On p. 6, it is said that the common-law practice was to file an affidavit at the beginning of the suit.

The last chapter in Locke on Attachment, pages 68 et seq., shows the practice in sequestration, as it is there called, being our present attachment in cases against absconding debtors.

See also Drake, Attachment, pp. 1, 2.

The common law is, by the Declaration of Rights, the law of Maryland, except so far as changed by statute.

Our attachment law is of common-law origin.

Barney v. Patterson, 6 Harr. & J. 200; Turner v. Lytle, 59 Md. 203.

It is true that it is said in several cases that the attachment law is of statutory origin, and must be construed strictly, because it is in derogation of the common law.

See Boarman v. Israel, 1 Gill, 381; Risewick v. Davis, and McPherson v. Snowden, 19 Md. 91, 233.

Mr. Theo. B. Horwitz, for appellee:

The obvious meaning of section 25, art. 10, Attachments, p. 50, Code, and the well established practice in all the law courts of the City of Baltimore, is that the affidavit required by section 4, page 45, must be made after the second summons has been returned non est against the absent defendant.

The order of July 12, 1886, is a printed order, and was signed by Judge Duffy without a moment's reflection, and, as he says, "as an order of course," and, therefore, improvidently.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is from an order quashing an attachment. The proceedings in the case must be stated with some particularity in order that it may be clearly seen how the questions to be disposed of arise.

It appears from the record that Randle procured an attachment or warrant to be issued out of the court of common pleas against Mellen as an absconding debtor. The evidence of debt produced before the magistrate was a draft for $1,219.50, drawn by Mellen at Monterey in Mexico, upon a New York firm, payable to the order of Randle and protested for nonpayment. The short note in the usual form declares upon this protested draft.

The writ of attachment and the usual summons, provided for in section 10, art. 10, of the Code, were issued on the 21st of May, 1886, returnable to the June rule day, which was the 14th of June. On the 11th of June, and before the return day, Mellen's son, in behalf of his father, filed a petition to the judge of the court, under section 21, art. 10, of the Code, praying that the writ of attachment be quashed and set aside. In this petition the son states, among other reasons why the writ should be quashed, that this draft was obtained from his father by Randle without any consideration and upon a threat. The judge thereupon, and on the same day (11th of June), and in compliance with the requirements of this section of the Code, ordered the sheriff to return the writ and the proceedings thereunder immediately before him, and set the petition down for hearing on the 19th of June. The sheriff then made his return in obedience to this order. The return to the summons was in the usual form "non est, and copy set up at the court house door," and to the attachment, "attached as per schedule," and laid in the hands of several garnishees.

The record then states that afterwards, on the 19th of June, "an alias writ of summons was issued in the usual form to the sheriff returnable to the July rule day" (which was the 12th of July) "and was by him duly returned non est." After this, on the 7th of July, a demurrer (as the record states) was made to the petition of Mellen's son, in open court; and the court overruled the same and quashed the attachment.

Notwithstanding the attachment was thus quashed on the 7th of July, Randle afterwards, on the 12th of the same month (the return day of the alias writ of summons) filed a petition in the case to the judge, setting forth that Mellen had been twice successively returned non est by the sheriff (the returns being these already mentioned), and praying judgment for the writ of attachment to issue against his lands, tenements, goods and chattels; and on the same day the judge ordered the writ to issue. This writ with the accompanying summons for Mellen was accordingly issued returnable to the August rule day, which was the 9th of that month.

On the 31st of July, and before the return day of this second writ Mellen's son in behalf of his father filed another petition (the averments of which it is not necessary to state) under the same section of the Code, praying that the order directing this attachment to issue be rescinded, and that this attachment be also quashed and set aside. The judge thereupon passed the son's order, and the same proceedings followed as in the case of the first attachment. Upon the first final hearing of this second petition which was, as the record states, after evidence had been taken for and against the same, the court, on the first of December, 1886, passed an order rescinding the order which had directed this second attachment to issue, and quashed the same and the proceedings thereunder. From this order Randle has taken the present appeal.

It is manifest that counsel for Randle, in conducting the case in the court of common pleas, proceeded upon the assumption that what is usually called the "Short Note Case," was not affected by the quashing of the attachment on the 7th of July. They also assumed that they had the right to order an alias summons on the 19th of June, after the one issued with the attachment had been returned non est, and to use these two returns in the short note case for the purpose of obtaining an attachment under section 25, article 10 of the Code.

But we do not so understand or interpret the attachment law. In our opinion neither of these assumptions is warranted by any provision of that law, nor by any established practice thereunder. The proceeding by way of attachment against a nonresident or absconding debtor is, in this State, regulated and governed entirely by statute. Although now in common and daily use it is still, nevertheless, regarded as an extraordinary proceeding, available only in those cases expressly provided for in the statutes authorizing it, and only then capable of being maintained by a substantial compliance with the statutory requirements apparent upon the face of the papers. The jurisdiction conferred upon the courts in such cases is uniformly held to be special and limited, distinct from and not embraced within their general jurisdiction, and cannot be legitimately exercised, unless the attaching creditor pursues the mode pointed out in the statute, and no intendment or presumption will be made in its support. 2 Poe, Pl. & Pr. § 502.

The mode of obtaining an attachment on warrant is familiar to the profession, and is clearly prescribed in the Code. One of these provisions is that "There shall be issued with every attachment a writ of summons against the defendant, and a declaration or short note expressing the plaintiff's cause of action shall be filed, and a copy thereof shall be sent with the writ to be set up at the court house door by the sheriff or other officer." Code, art. 10, § 10.

This is purely a statutory requirement, but compliance with it is essential to the validity of the attachment proceeding. If, however, it is complied with, the statute is gratified. If the summons is issued with the attachment, and the short note is filed, and a copy of it is sent with the writ, and this copy is set up at the court house door, nothing further is required to be done in order to give the defendant in the attachment notice of the proceeding. If the defendant be returned summoned, or if he voluntarily appears upon the return day of the writ and contests the claim of the attaching creditor, then it becomes a short note case which must be tried before that against the garnishee, or the property attached, for the simple reason that if in this trial the claim should be defeated there will no longer remain any ground upon which the attachment can rest, and quashing it will follow as a necessary consequence.

The defendant can also appear to the short note, and have the attachment dissolved by giving bond to satisfy any judgment that may be obtained against him in the case. Code, art. 10, § 20.

When this is done the short note case remains on the docket for trial, and the attachment is dissolved because the bond takes its place and secures to the plaintiff all he could obtain by its successful prosecution. But if the summons be returned non est, and the defendant does not appear to the short note to contest the claim, nor give bond to dissolve, then if the attachment be quashed on motion, or upon petition, as in this case, for defects apparent upon the face of the proceeding, or in any other mode or for any other reason, we think it quite clear that the whole statutory proceeding and every part of it, including the summons and the short note, fall with it, and are forever out of court unless the quashing order be reversed on appeal. When, therefore, this attachment was quashed, on the 7th of July, the short note case was at an end, and the subsequent return of non est to the alias summons was of no avail for any purpose whatever.

But, assuming that we are wrong in this: Do the two returns of non est to the two writs of summons issued in this attachment case, authorize another attachment to be issued under the twenty-fifth section of this 10th article of the Code? This question requires a construction of that section; and in this we discover no difficulty whatever. The previous sections point out the mode and prescribe the conditions, for obtaining an attachment on warrant. This section provides how an attachment which shall have the same effect may be obtained in a different mode, and without a warrant from a magistrate. It declares that "When two summons have been returned non est against the defendant, in any of the courts of law of this State, the plaintiff, upon proof of his claim as hereinbefore required, shall be entitled to an attachment; and the judge of the court where such action is pending shall order such attachment to issue, and the same proceedings shall be thereupon had as in attachments issued against absconding debtors."

The plain meaning of this is that when an action is pending in any court of law, which the court in the exercise of its general jurisdiction has the power to try and decide, provided jurisdiction over the person of the defendant be not obtained by service of the summons upon him, and in such a case there are two returns of non est to two successive writs of summons, then the judge is authorized to regard such returns as evidence that the defendant is a nonresident or absconding debtor; and if the plaintiff's cause of action be such as would entitle him to an attachment on warrant, the judge is authorized and directed to order the attachment to issue, provided the plaintiff produces before him the same proof of his claim that he would be required to produce before the magistrate in order to obtain his warrant to the clerk of the proper court to issue an attachment.

When the attachment is thus ordered by the judge it is subject to the same conditions, and the same proceedings must be had upon it as if it were an attachment on warrant, with the single exception that the order of the judge supersedes and takes the place of the warrant of the magistrate. But the court in executing this power can look only to the returns made to the writs of summons issued in the action then pending before it, which has been brought in the ordinary way, and which invokes the exercise of its general jurisdiction. It cannot look to returns made in an attachment proceeding under a special limited and statutory jurisdiction. This is not within the contemplation of this section of the Code nor within the plain meaning of the language used; and to allow it to be done would be to allow an unauthorized and oppressive use of the writ. If his first attachment be quashed for errors in the proceedings, or for any other cause which the attaching creditor thinks can be corrected, he may begin de novo and obtain another, but he cannot go on and obtain successive attachments upon two returns of non est to writs of summons issued in the same attachment proceeding.

In either view of the case, therefore, there was no error in the order appealed from and,

It must be affirmed.

v.
Augusta E. BLEAKLY et al., Exrs.

1. A sale of real estate, under a power created by a will, should not be set aside, if the trustee has exercised that care and caution which would be observed by a prudent owner in regard to a sale of his own property, and has obtained a good price.
2. Lands lying about ten miles from Baltimore and surrounded by other lands occupied and used for farming purposes may properly be sold as a farm by the trustee, although there is evidence from some of the witnesses that the land may, at some future day, become valuable for building purposes.

APPEAL from an order of the Orphan's Court for Baltimore County, overruling exceptions and ratifying and confirming an executor's sale of realty. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Stone, Robinson, Irving, Miller, Bryan and Yellott, JJ.

The facts appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Randolph Barton, John I. Yellott and Milton W. Offutt, for appellants.

Messrs. Wm. S. Bryan, Jr., Jno. F. Gontrum and E. Swinney, for appellees.

Yellott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 17th day of August, 1885, Samuel H. Bleakly executed his last will and testament, which was admitted to probate on the 21st of October in the same year. The appellees, his executors, in conformity with the power conferred on them by the sixth clause of said will, proceeded to sell his real estate in separate parcels, and reported the sales thus made to the Orphans' Court of Baltimore County.

"The Grove Farm," containing fifty-eight acres and a fraction of an acre, was sold at public auction; the purchaser bidding for it $180 per acre. Exceptions to this sale having been filed, testimony was taken; and, after argument by counsel, the orphans' court, on the 26th day of October, 1886, passed an order overruling the exceptions and ratifying and confirming the sale. From this order an appeal has been taken.

The evidence shows that this property lies in a neighborhood about ten miles from the limits of Baltimore City and is surrounded by other lands occupied and used for farming purposes. The house is old, the barn has been burned down, and the land is unproductive in its present condition. Several of the witnesses estimated the value of the property at a price much above that for which it was actually sold; but, when cross examined, these witnesses admit that their estimates are based upon the supposition that the land may, at some future day, become valuable for building purposes. Most of these witnesses seem to be wealthy gentlemen, owning land in the neighborhood, which they are not compelled to sell and which they may, therefore, retain in their possession, and indulge in the pleasing anticipation of an increase of value at some future period.

But there is no proof in this cause tending to show that this property, at quite a distance from the city and very near the center of Baltimore County, is, at this time, in demand for building purposes. It is the duty of the executors to sell it now; they are compelled to sell it now, and must therefore sell it in its present condition as a farm. They cannot be permitted to wait for years, indulging in expectations which may never be realized. They have, therefore, sold it as a farm; and all the testimony, when carefully weighed and considered, tends to show that they have sold it at a fair price, after advertising in Baltimore, Carroll and Frederick Counties, and in Baltimore City. Everyone who wished to purchase had an opportunity to attend the sale, and no unfairness in any of these proceedings is established by the proof.

There is, certainly, a recognized distinction between a sale made under a decree and one made in pursuance of a power created by a deed or will. But in either case, if the trustee has exercised that care and caution which would be observed by a prudent owner in regard to the sale of his own property, and has obtained a good price, the sale ought not to be set aside. Andrews v. Scotton, 2 Bland, 638; Gould v. Chappell, 42 Md. 468.

A careful examination of the evidence in the record leads to the conclusion that the executors have fully and faithfully performed their duty and have made a sale which ought not to be set aside. The order appealed from should, therefore, be affirmed.

It might be seriously doubted whether this appeal was taken in time under the provisions of article 5, section 40 of the Code. But it is not necessary to determine this question, as the ruling of the court below will be affirmed on the merits as disclosed by the proof.

Order affirmed.

APPEAL from an order of the Circuit Court of St. Mary's County, overruling a motion to dismiss an appeal to the Court in banc. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Robinson. Ritchie and Bryan, JJ.

This was an action of ejectment brought by the appellants against the appellee. At the trial in the court below, before a single judge, exceptions were taken to the ruling of the court on prayers offered for the instruction of the jury.

March 31, 1885, the jury rendered a verdict for plaintiffs. On April 2 following the defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled by the court, and defendant thereupon moved the court for an appeal to the court in banc, and on the same day filed a motion in arrest of judgment, which latter motion was that day overruled and an exception reserved by the defendant to the court in banc.

On the same day the defendant filed two bills of exception, in each of which it was stated that he appealed to the court in banc. Plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal to the court in banc; which motion the court overruled, and reversed the judgment for error in granting the plaintiff's prayer, and ruled that on other points the judgment would have been affirmed, and ordered the case to be remanded for a new trial; whereupon, plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Mr. Daniel R. Magruder, for appellants.

Messrs. Daniel C. Hammett and Benjamin G. Harris, for appellee.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The twenty-second section of the fourth article of the Constitution gave a new right of appeal.

When a trial is conducted by less than the whole number of the judges of a circuit court, it is competent for a party against whom a decision is made to have the point or question reserved for the consideration of the three judges in banc; and their decision is to be conclusive against him. This proceeding is in substitution of an appeal to the court of appeals, and makes a considerable alteration in the law on this subject.

The change is not to be extended by construction beyond the terms of the Constitution. It is provided that the motion for a reservation of the point or question decided shall be entered of record during the sitting at which the decisions may be made. The word "sitting" is not synonymous with "term" of the court. The exception to a ruling must properly be taken as soon as the ruling is made; but this provision of the Constitution intended to give the party taking an exception the entire sitting of the court (that is the whole time until the court adjourned for the day) to determine whether he would have his appeal to the court in banc, or to the court of appeals.

It would be a very improvident construction of this section to hold that a party might have the whole term of the court to make up his mind; and we think it is not warranted by the plain meaning of the words. As the motion was not entered of record during the sitting at which the ruling was made, the court in banc had no jurisdiction of the appeal. As the ruling of the court in banc was made exclusively on the bills of exception, our decision refers only to them.

Order reversed.

1. Where it is stipulated that an article to be furnished shall, unqualifiedly, be satisfactory to the party to whom it is to be supplied, the right to reject the article, as not being satisfactory, cannot be inquired into; but the party's own determination must be taken as final and conclusive.

(Decided June 24, 1886.)

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the following opinion:

When this case was decided, after full argument, I concurred with the other judges in the conclusion that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed. This was my conclusion upon full examination of the record; it appearing that the case had been carefully tried and fully submitted to the jury upon correct principles of law.

After the decision of the case in this court, there was a motion by the appellant for reargument; and, in support of that motion, quite an elaborate brief was filed, urging several matters and questions supposed to have been overlooked by the court, or not fully considered by it, in arriving at the conclusion announced in its opinion.

That motion has been considered and overruled by the court; and while I concur in overruling the motion for reargument, I deem it due to the reasons assigned in support of that motion, to state briefly the grounds of my judgment.

The contract, upon which the action was brought, contains the condition that the quantity of coal to be furnished, during the three years for which the contract was to run, was to be of such quality as should be satisfactory to the masters of transportation and of machinery, who were employees and agents of the appellant, and to be delivered into the tenders of the appellant's locomotive engines, at such times as the appellant might require, etc. The contract was dated the 17th of May, 1875, but was not to take effect until the 15th of July following. Coal had been delivered to the appellant by the appellee, from the same mine, from September, 1874, to the time when the contract went into operation, but only under special orders; and the appellant continued to receive coal from the appellee, from the same mine, and for the same purpose, that is, for generating steam for locomotive engines, until May the 6th, 1876, with occasional suspensions.

The appellee, in his declaration, assigned as breaches of the contract: 1, that the appellant improperly refused to receive the coal tendered by the appellee; and 2, that although the appellee was ready and willing to deliver to the appellant daily the stipulated quantity of coal, of such quality as was required by the contract, and which in fairness and truth was and should have been satisfactory to the masters of transportation and of machinery of the appellant, the latter falsely pretended that the coal thus offered to be delivered was not of the quality contemplated by the contract, and was not satisfactory to the masters of transportation and of machinery, and therefore refused to accept such coal of the appellee.

It was upon these alleged breaches of the contract that the issues were formed.

Such then being the issues for trial, one of the most prominent questions of fact presented for the determination of the jury was: At what particular time did the master of transportation and the master of machinery really determine to condemn the coal supplied under the contract, because it was not satisfactory to them?

On the part of the appellee it was contended, and sought to be maintained by his proof, that it was not until the 6th of May, 1876, that the appellant ceased accepting the coal under the contract, and that it was not then stopped because it was in truth unsatisfactory to the agents named, but because of the fall in price of a superior grade of coal, and because those agents were unduly influenced by, and yielded to, the dictation of their superior officers in the Corporation, in disapproving the coal, so that their determination, in condemning the coal, was not in fact fairly and bona fide made.

But while such was the contention on the part of the appellee, it was contended, and strongly supported by proof, on the part of the appellant, that the taking of the coal under the contract was stopped on the third of August, 1875, because it was in fact unsatisfactory to the agents designated by the contract to pass upon its quality; and that all the coal taken of the appellee after that date was taken, as had been all the coal furnished by the appellee prior to the 15th of July, 1875, only occasionally, under special and limited arrangements, and for purposes of making tests as to the feasibility of using the coal on the road. No coal was in fact taken after the 6th of May, 1876; and the appellee immediately thereafter ceased operation of his mine; but he says that was in consequence of the refusal of the appellant to proceed with the execution of the contract.

That term or condition of the contract which required the coal to be of a quality satisfactory to the agents designated, was certainly a leading and important one to the appellant, and was intended exclusively for its protection, and without which, we may suppose, the contract would never have been made. The appellant, therefore, had the right to insist that the condition should be allowed its full and complete effect, in determining the rights of the parties under the contract.

In cases where it is stipulated that an article to be furnished shall, unqualifiedly, be satisfactory to the party to whom it is to be supplied, the right to reject the article, as not being satisfactory, cannot be inquired into; but the party's own determination must be taken as final and conclusive. In such case it is supposed, and such is the construction, that the party has reserved to himself an unqualified option, and is not willing to leave his freedom of choice to any contention, or to be subject to any investigation whatever.

It is quite permissible to parties to enter into such contracts; and where the approval or satisfaction of the party is made a condition precedent to the right to receive compensation or the contract price for the article to be delivered, the court has no right or power to dispense with the condition, and say that the article was of a quality or character that ought in reason to have been accepted as satisfactory. If the plaintiff thinks proper to enter into such conditional contract, it is not for anyone else than the defendant himself to say that he ought to be satisfied; that is a matter expressly reserved to the defendant to decide for himself, and the reasons or motive for the decision, whether reasonable or unreasonable, good or bad, are placed by the contract beyond question or investigation. For instances of this class of contracts, and as illustrations of the application of the principle here stated, I may refer to the cases of Andrews v. Belfield, 2 C. B. N. S. 779; McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray, 139; Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 136; Zaleski v. Clark, 44 Conn. 218; Rossiter v. Cooper, 23 Vt. 522; Hart v. Hart, 22 Barb. 606; Gibson v. Cranage, 39 Mich. 49; Wood Reaping & M. Machine Co. v. Smith, 50 Mich 565; S. C. 45 Am. Rep. 57.

But this principle does not apply, in its unqualified form, in a case where the contracting parties have expressly stipulated that the article to be supplied shall be such, in respect to the quality or otherwise, as shall be approved by, or satisfactory to, some third person, though that third person may be an agent or an employee of one of the parties to the contract. In such case, though it be made a condition precedent that the article shall be approved by the party designated, yet if it can be shown that the approval has been withheld from motives of selfish interest, bias, partiality or corruption, the party prejudiced by such action may, notwithstanding the absence of such approval, recover on the contract for the nonacceptance of the article furnished. In such contracts it is an implied condition that the person designated to approve shall act with entire good faith to both of the contracting parties. Both parties have the right to insist upon such good faith, and the want of it will dispense with the condition requiring the approval.

The court will not allow a defendant to avail himself of the condition precedent to defeat the right of the plaintiff to recover for a violation of the contract, where there has been fraud or mala fides on the part of the person appointed to approve or disapprove. But, in the absence of fraud or bad faith in the conduct of such party, in respect to the fact of his approval or the withholding it, his judgment or determination is to be accepted as final and conclusive. No mere error or mistake of judgment will vitiate his determination. The very object of his appointment is to prevent and exclude contention and litigation; and hence, nothing short of fraud or mala fides in the exercise of his power to reject or approve the article contracted for, will dispense with the strict legal effect of the condition precedent. This is now the settled doctrine, in respect to this class of contracts, in the courts both of this country and of England. Wilson v. Y. & Md. Line R. R. Co. 11 Gill & J. 58; Lynn v. Balto. & Ohio R. R. Co. 60 Md. 404; Sweeney v. United States, 109 U. S. 618 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 1053]; Martinsburg & Potomac R. R. Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 255]; Sharpe v. San Paulo R. R. Co. L. R. 8 Ch. App. 597.

And this principle, with the proper conditions under which it was applicable, and could be applied in the consideration of this case, appears to have been fully and clearly set forth in the hypothetical instructions given by the court to the jury.

Such then being the settled law, as applicable to this case, the principal question presented for investigation, under the issues framed, was one of fact purely; and that question was whether the rejection or disapproval of the appellee's coal by the masters of transportation and of machinery was mala fide and fraudulent, or otherwise.

To entitle the appellee to recover, it was incumbent upon him to establish to the satisfaction of the jury that there was want of fairness and good faith on the part of those agents in the disapproval or rejection of the coal, or that the coal was rejected by the appellant, notwithstanding its quality was in fact satisfactory to those agents. It was to this question that the greater part of the large mass of conflicting testimony, contained in the record, was directed. The evidence produced on the part of the appellee was all of an inferential character, merely; and most of it had but a remote and indirect bearing upon the question at issue.

The coal contracted to be supplied was of a well known grade or quality in the coal region. It was mined or to be mined from what is known as "the six foot vein," and is of a comparatively inferior grade of coal to that mined from what is known as "the big or fourteen foot vein," in the same region. Its grade and general characteristics were well known to the appellant's officers and agents, before the contract was made, and it was in fact contracted for as an inferior grade of coal, the price being less than that paid for the standard grade of coal obtained from the fourteen foot vein. In judging of its quality, therefore, it should be judged according to its grade and class, and not as of a superior grade.

It could not have been the understanding or the expectation of the parties to the contract that the coal to be furnished should be tested by the standard of the big vein coal; for to suppose such to have been the intention would make the act of entering into the contract one of utter futility; as all knew that the coal contracted for could not bear that test. It would not, therefore, have been fair or within the meaning or spirit of the contract to require that the coal furnished should come up to the standard of the big vein coal; and this is what the appellee contended, and sought to establish by his proof, was the test applied to his coal, and by which it was rejected. If, therefore, the coal was rejected because it did not come up to the standard of the big vein coal, or because of the fall in the price of the big vein coal, as sought to be shown by the appellee, or because of the opposition of the superior officers of the appellant to its use, and not because the two agents named were in fact dissatisfied with the coal offered to be delivered under the contract, then the rejection of the coal was not bona fide, and the appellee had just grounds of complaint. But if the agents who were to be satisfied with the coal, once determined bona fide that the coal was not satisfactory, that terminated the contract, and no subsequent tender of coal by the appellee could revive the obligation of the appellant to accept it.

The appellant, by its first four prayers to the court, sought to have the case withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, upon the ground that there was no evidence legally sufficient from which they could conclude that there was fraud or want of good faith on the part of the agents or officers of the appellant, in the disapproval or rejection of the coal; or that its rejection was obtained by the fraudulent procurement of the appellant or its officers. These prayers the court rejected; and I do not see, upon the whole evidence before it, that the court could have done otherwise.

In passing upon these prayers, it was no part of the duty of the court below, indeed, it was not within its province, to examine and determine upon the comparative weight of the evidence. It was called upon simply to determine the preliminary question, whether there was evidence legally sufficient to be submitted to the jury. In deciding that question, the court was not required to decide as to the weight of the evidence; but taking all the evidence as true, whether by inference or otherwise, that tended to prove the issue in behalf of the party against whom the court was asked to decide, the sole question for the court was, whether a rational mind could fairly deduce the conclusion sought to be established by the evidence. If the court could see that there was such evidence, it became its imperative duty to submit the case to the jury. It was not a question of the decided preponderance of evidence; for it often occurs that the judge may think the case a very plain one, on the weight of evidence, in favor of the one side or the other, and yet be required to submit the case to the jury for their determination. If this were not so, the jury system might be justly regarded as an unnecessary and useless appendage to the court.

The court and the jury are both constitutional agencies for the administration of justice, each having its own separate and peculiar sphere of action and responsibility, and it is not within the power of the one to encroach upon or restrict the legitimate sphere of the other. The law has provided a means of redress against erroneous or unjust verdicts, by motion for new trial, addressed to the court that heard the case; but with that this court has nothing to do. This court, clearly, has no power, in a common-law action, to review the evidence, in order to determine whether the jury have made proper deductions from the evidence before them, although the question be raised as a preliminary one and before the case is submitted to the jury.

I shall not attempt any analysis of the testimony, as that would extend this opinion very much beyond the limits assigned to it. The testimony was very conflicting in many of its details; but it was of a character that required the case to be submitted to the jury. Many of the circumstances proved were susceptible of different inferences, and such being the case, the jury alone were capable of saying what inference was proper to be made. And so the jury were the exclusive judges of the credibility of witnesses, and the court could properly grant no instruction upon the assumption of the untruthfulness of any witness, or that would require the jury to discredit a witness against their own judgment. Morris v. Brickley & Caldwell, 1 Harr. & G. 108.

And not only were questions of the conflict of testimony and the credibility of witnesses to be considered, but all the facts and circumstances attending and surrounding the entire transaction under investigation, that could in any manner reflect upon the motives and purposes of the officers and agents of the appellant, and particularly the two agents to whom the coal was to be satisfactory, were brought under examination and scrutiny. In such case, the nature of the inquiry itself would seem to make it necessary that the case should go to the jury, although the evidence might appear but slight.

A question of motive and intent is always one of fact, and peculiarly within the province of the jury. As was said by this court in Turner v. Walker, 3 Gill & J. 387, "Whether a party acted with a fair bona fide intention, or by what motive he was really actuated, is always a question purely for the consideration of the jury." I am, therefore, very clearly of opinion that the court below committed no error in allowing the case to be considered by the jury.

It is objected that in the opinion of this court heretofore filed, certain testimony given by the appellee, but admitted by the court below for the special purpose only of impeaching or contradicting opposing witnesses, has been treated as testimony in the case in proof of the issues on the part of the appellee. This objection is, I think, well founded; for it does appear that testimony, in regard to certain declarations, admitted in rebuttal and restricted by the court below to the single purpose of impeachment, has been referred to and relied on in the opinion, as if such testimony had been admitted generally and without any restriction as to its use.

It is only necessary to refer to the eleventh prayer of the appellant, which was granted, to see how such testimony was restricted, and for what purpose it was allowed to be considered by the jury. Neither that prayer nor the evidence therein referred to was before this court; and consequently that evidence must have been inadvertently referred to in the opinion. But, while I think the text of the opinion ought to be modified so as to avoid making reference to evidence not before this court, I am of opinion that the general conclusion arrived at is in no manner dependent upon the consideration of that evidence, and that the result must be the same irrespective of the evidence improperly referred to in the opinion.

It is also urged, as a ground for reargument, that there was error in granting the third prayer of the appellee, in respect to the measure of damages, and that this court has failed in its opinion to advert to that instruction at all. It is said that the court ought to have directed the jury to deduct the amount of profit to the appellee, whatever it was, on the coal delivered to the appellant by the appellee, under the contract, and which had been paid for, so that such profit should not be included in the general estimate of the damages.

That such profit was not proper to be included in the verdict is certainly true; and there is nothing in the third prayer that justifies us in assuming that it was included. That instruction did not require the jury so to find and estimate the damages; but it only stated the rule or principle upon which the damages were to be ascertained. The court simply instructed the jury that the measure of damages was the profit which they should find the appellee would have made, if the contract had been fully performed.

That was the correct general rule, applicable to the case, according to the principle enunciated in Phila. etc. R. R. Co. v. Howard, 13 How. 307, 344 [54 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 157, 178]; and we are not to suppose or conjecture that the jury included profits that had been already received by the appellee. If the instruction, while stating a correct general rule, was supposed by the appellant not to be sufficiently explicit in reference to a matter of abatement, it should have asked an instruction by which its rights would have been more fully and clearly guarded. Failing to do this, I do not think it can now object to the court's instruction, which, as a general proposition, was clearly correct.

Then again; in the reasons assigned for reargument it is insisted that some, at least, of the numerous exceptions taken to the admissibility of evidence were well taken, and that they have not been fully considered in the opinion of this court. It is true, all that is said in the opinion, in respect to these exceptions, is that "After a careful examination of these exceptions we discover no error." It would certainly have been more satisfactory that some reasons, however brief, should have been assigned for this general conclusion. The important question, however, is: Was the court right in its conclusion in regard to these exceptions?

I shall not attempt a detailed consideration of these numerous exceptions to evidence. Many of them present the same class of facts or offers of facts, and substantially the same general question as to their admissibility. The first fifteen of these exceptions were taken to the overruling of objections to offers, and to the admission of evidence, consisting of acts and declarations (oral and written) of the officers and agents of the appellant, in the exercise of their employment, and of all the circumstances that preceded and led to the making of the contract of the 17th of May, 1875; and which were offered and admitted for the purpose of showing knowledge by those officers and agents, of the nature and qualities of the coal, and the inducements to the making of the contract, as those circumstances might reflect upon the bona fides of the two agents named, in the subsequent disapproval or rejection of the coal, as not being satisfactory to them.

The question, we must bear in mind, was not as to the interpretation of the terms of the contract, but as to the good faith of the agents of the appellant in repudiating the coal furnished under it; and, as bearing upon that question, any circumstance, though slight in itself, was admissible. It was material to the inquiry that the jury should be informed as to the extent of the knowledge and practical experience of the officers and agents of the appellant, in the use of the coal (and especially those agents intrusted with the power of rejection) prior to the date of the contract, and under what inducements the contract was made, as those circumstances might, to some extent, aid the jury in determining the question of good faith. I think, therefore, there was no error in the rulings upon these exceptions.

The sixteenth exception does not appear to be relied upon by the appellant, and clearly it is not tenable. The seventeenth and eighteenth exceptions were taken to the admission of evidence to prove the price of the big vein coal at the date of the contract, or the time when it went into operation, and the subsequent decline of that price. The object of this evidence was to show a motive in the appellant's officers and agents for rejecting the appellee's inferior grade of coal. This evidence would appear, clearly, to have been admissible, and the court, therefore, committed no error in allowing it to be given.

The nineteenth exception has not been pressed; but the twentieth, twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh exceptions have been strongly pressed upon the attention of the court, in the reasons assigned for reargument.

With respect to the twentieth exception, the question thereby presented is not, in my judgment, altogether free from doubt. I think, however, upon the best reflection that I have been able to give the matter, the ruling of the court below ought to be sustained.

The appellee's contention was that the contract was still existing and operative at the time of the conversation referred to, and therefore any act or admission of the appellant by those authorized to act for it, whereby the contract was recognized as still open and subsisting, would appear to be admissible, under the restrictions imposed by the court below. Such ruling would seem to be within the principle of the case of Chicago v. Greer, 9 Wall. 733 [76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 769].

Mr. Garrett was the president and chief executive officer of the appellant; and as such he was authorized to bind the corporation by dealing or contracting in reference to matters arising in the ordinary course of its business. It was competent to him, acting for the appellant, to direct the presumption of the receipt of coal under the contract, although it had been previously suspended by subordinate officers and agents of the company. It is true, he was to have been furnished with a statement from the appellee as to what had occurred in respect to the previous use and suspension of the use of the coal, by the officers of the appellant, which was never supplied; but still, his declaration as to what should be done in the matter was a circumstance to be considered by the jury, in connection with the other circumstances of the case.

In regard to the twenty-second exception, I do not think there is any good ground for reversal shown to exist there. When the witness stated that he had no knowledge whatever as to whether the Clearfield coal had ever been used in locomotive engines, his previous statement in regard to that coal became wholly immaterial, and it is not perceived how the appellant could have been injured by it. And in regard to the proof excepted to in the twenty-third exception, the fact sought to be excluded was afterwards, in the course of the trial, fully proved as part of the appellant's own evidence, in the examination of Mr. King, who had been the vice president of the appellant, and with whom the contract in question had been made.

With respect to the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh exceptions, I do not think they present any matter for reversal. The appellant had, by cross examination, and by examination in chief, sought to disparage, and to show the utter unfitness of the appellee's coal for the use contemplated by the contract, by showing that it contained red or rusty coal; and the testimony excepted to was offered to show that the appellant, in its subsequent purchases of coal supply for its engines, did not reject coal similarly affected.

It was certainly competent to the appellee, by way of answer to the objection taken to his coal, to show that the rust did not affect its steam generating power; and the object of the proof excepted to, as I understand it, was to show that fact, but in the indirect and inferential way stated in the exception.

Upon review of the whole case, as presented to this court, I do not find any sufficient ground for such doubt of the correctness of the conclusion heretofore announced, as to require a reargument; and I therefore concur with the other judges in overruling the motion for a reargument, made by the appellant.

Bryan, J., filed the following opinion, November 19, 1886:

In looking over the advance sheets of 65 Maryland Reports a few days ago, I saw the opinion of the Chief Justice on this motion. Ante, 397.

I had no knowledge of its existence before this time. Immediately after this motion was overruled, the court took a recess of some weeks. It is unusual to file opinions when such motions are disposed of, and none was filed at the time. This one embodying the individual views of the Chief Justice was filed sometime afterwards; it was never read to the court, and my attention was not called to it. The occasion requires that I should state my reasons for adhering in all respects to the opinion of the court originally delivered; and the circumstances which I have mentioned will account for my delay in doing so.

In this case there are thirty bills of exception, and the record comprises 397 large folio pages of printed matter. I made a careful, minute and laborious investigation of every question, and of every phase of every question presented in the case. The amount involved was very large, and the responsibility of the decision was felt to be very great. The labor of considering the immense mass of matter contained in the record was cheerfully performed, with an earnest and anxious desire to do equal and exact justice between the parties according to law; and when the learned counsel filed their able argument for a rehearing, it received from me the careful and respectful consideration which it merited. If there be errors in my opinion they are not the result of carelessness, or inadvertence or design; but are due to infirmity of judgment.

The great question in the case was whether the rejection of the coal by the master of transportation and master of machinery was made in good faith or in fraud. The object of the opinion which I delivered was to group together the facts and circumstances in evidence, which it was competent for the jury to consider in the determination of this question. It was not my purpose (neither was it my duty) to give a detail of the proceedings in the court below, and to show what portions of the testimony were offered in chief, and what other portions in rebuttal. I have always supposed that the jury were obliged to consider all competent testimony, whensoever and howsoever it might be offered. The experience of many practitioners will recall instances where the plaintiff's case has been established by testimony offered by the defendant.

It is the function of the court to instruct the jury as to the questions in the cause to which the evidence is to be applied; and this duty extends to all the evidence; as much to that offered in rebuttal as to any other, but no more. The testimony of the plaintiff mentioned in my opinion, as to the alleged conversations with Sharp and Davis, was offered to contradict their testimony, wherein they denied that such conversations had taken place. It is difficult to see how it could contradict them, except by proving that such conversations actually occurred. And if the jury believed that these men really made the statements attributed to them, confessing such unworthy motives in rejecting the coal, they were bound to give some effect to these facts. What inferences did they authorize the jury to draw? For what purposes was it competent to consider them? To give a satisfactory answer to these inquiries we must turn our attention to the incidents of the trial.

According to the contract, Brydon was bound to furnish coal of quality satisfactory to the masters of machinery and transportation every day for three years after the 15th day of July, 1875. In deciding upon the merits of the coal, they were bound to exercise an honest judgment. There is no obscurity about the terms of the contract. It was Brydon's right during the whole term of three years to furnish coal of the prescribed quality; and he could not be deprived of this right, except by his own default. During all this time (if not in default himself) he had a right to demand the judgment of these arbiters on the quality of his coal. If their judgment was fairly and honestly rendered, it was conclusive upon him; but if fraudulent, it was of no effect.

Now let us observe that it was alleged that these conversations occurred in August and September, 1875, within the period embraced by the contract, and of course, during the time when the arbiters were bound to exercise their functions as judges of the coal. Now it cannot be denied that these statements, if really made by Sharp and Davis, were the most overwhelming impeachment of their integrity in making the decision which rejected the coal. It is, of course, well settled that when a witness on cross examination denies having made a statement, proof from the adverse party that he did make it is not to be taken as evidence of the truth of the matters stated. But the question here is not whether matters alleged to have been stated by Sharp and Davis were true; but simply whether they actually made the statements. If they made the controverted statements, they acknowledged grievous misbehavior in their capacity as arbiters; and most certainly the jury had a right to take into consideration their own self-accusations.

It has, however, been supposed that the learned court below decided that these conversations were not evidence of fraud in the arbiters. Let us consider this question. There were two leading questions considered by the learned judge, when he granted the prayers of the respective parties. They were closely allied to each other; yet they were distinct propositions, and were so stated to the jury. One of these questions was whether the plaintiff's coal was satisfactory to the masters of machinery and transportation; and the other was whether the rejection of it was fraudulent.

By the plaintiff's first prayer the jury were required to find "That the plaintiff was ready and willing, and did offer to deliver during the period of time covered by said contract, coal, daily, in quantities and of the quality contemplated by the contract;" and further, that "The master of machinery and master of transportation of the defendant rejected said coal as not satisfactory to them, and that said rejection was not bona fide."

The defendant's prayers drew the distinction between these questions still more definitely. Let us look at its seventh prayer. It is in these words:

"The defendant prays the court to instruct the jury that, under the third count of the plaintiff's declaration, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to satisfy the jury;

"1. That the coal which the plaintiff tendered, and was ready and willing to deliver to the defendant, was of such quality as was satisfactory to both the masters of transportation and machinery of the defendant.

"2. That the defendant falsely pretended that said coal was not of the quality contemplated by the agreement between plaintiff and defendant, offered in evidence, and was not satisfactory to its masters of transportation and machinery, although in fairness and in truth the same was satisfactory both to its said master of transportation and its said master of machinery."

The eighth is as follows:

"That the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, to satisfy the jury by the evidence that the coal which he was ready and willing to furnish to the defendant, or which he tendered and offered to defendant, was of such a quality as was satisfactory to both the master of transportation and the master of machinery of the defendant; and if he fails so to satisfy the jury, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, unless he shall further prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the approval of the quality of his coal was withheld or refused by said officers, fraudulently or in bad faith, or by the fraudulent procurement of the defendant or its officers."

Now the eleventh prayer of the defendant instructed the jury that the testimony of Brydon, as to these conversations of Sharp and Davis, was not evidence of the existence of the facts stated in said alleged conversations, and that it was not to be regarded as proof that said coal was satisfactory to said Sharp, and to said Davis; but the court did not say that they were not to be considered by the jury in determining the question of fraud.

I have mentioned the ruling of the court in granting the eleventh prayer of the defendant, because it has been made the subject of considerable discussion; but it is by no means to be supposed that it is binding on us. The legitimate questions before us are those embraced by the defendant's exceptions. If we think the court below was right in its rulings on these questions, we are obliged to affirm; and we are not required to assume that the court was right in other rulings, favorable to the defendant, which are not brought before us by exception. We could not, for instance, reverse the judgment because the court refused to take the case from the jury, if we found that the evidence which had been admitted was sufficient for their consideration, even if the court had erroneously instructed the jury, at the instance of the defendant, to disregard essential and indispensable portions of the proof. It would be a great abuse of justice to reverse a correct ruling because a mistake had been made in the process by which the result was reached.

As a matter of course, I have confined this discussion to the questions of law arising on this record. It has been my duty to consider the purposes for which the jury were required to consider the evidence. The law does not permit me to express any opinion on the credibility of the witnesses, or on the correctness of the verdict.

My effort has been to perform the full measure of my duty, and to avoid transgressing its limits by a hair's breadth. There was other evidence on the part of the plaintiff which would have taken the case to the jury, and it may consequently be thought that this discussion of the competency of the alleged conversations was unnecessary. It is true that the result in this court is not affected by the decision of the question; it must, nevertheless, be admitted that it is very important that the judgments of the appellate court should not only be correct, but that they should also be grounded on sound principles.

The questions arising on many of the exceptions are settled by what was said in the opinion originally delivered. With respect to those not settled in this way, although they were fully considered, inasmuch as their importance was limited to this particular case, I did not think it necessary to insert a detailed discussion of them in the opinion.

Robert GARRETT, Appt.,
v.
Henry JANES.

1. The power to regulate porches, etc. in Mount Vernon Place, given to the mayor and city council of Baltimore by the Act of 1833, chap. 180, is not taken away by the Act of 1854, chap. 9, nor by ordinance No. 36 of 1874. The later Act was intended to apply to that portion of the city for which no such power had been given, and was not intended to embrace Mount Vernon Place.
2. If the Ordinance of 1858 forbidding any person to erect any portico, etc., in Mount Vernon Place a greater distance into the Place than nine feet, is repealed by the Ordinance of 1874, it is revived by re-enactment in the adoption of the City Code of 1879.
3. A municipal legislature may, by a single ordinance, declare any compilation of ordinances, or proposed ordinances, to be in force, unless prohibited by statute.
4. A later statute or ordinance of a general nature does not effect the repeal of a special one, unless direct reference is made to the latter with that intent, or in terms they are so irreconcilable that a repeal by implication is manifest.
5. The ordinance allowing steps, porticos or any other ornamental structure to extend nine feet into Mount Vernon Place is a valid and reasonable exercise of the power derived from the Act of 1854, even if that Act repealed that of 1833.
6. An ornamental inclosed porch, extending less than nine feet from the front of defendant's house in Mount Vernon Place, held, lawful and permissible under the ordinance, although it had other subsidiary uses.
7. Even if some measure of obstruction to plaintiff's light, or other injury, is consequent upon the erection of the porch, he is not entitled to relief; such damage is damnum absque injuria.
8. For mere interference with prospect, it not being an incident of the estate, no remedy lies apart from contract.

(Decided April 9, 1886.)

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, in favor of complainant in a bill in equity for an injunction to restrain the erection of a house alleged to be in violation of law. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Robinson, Ritchie and Bryan, JJ.

The bill alleged that the defendant was engaged in erecting his house on Mt. Vernon Place in violation of law, in that the entrance thereto extended on the pavement in front thereof beyond the distance prescribed by law. The answer alleged that the erection of the portico or ornamental structure in front of defendant's building was within the distance prescribed by the Ordinance of June 5, 1858, of the City of Baltimore, passed under special authority of the Act of 1833, chap. 180. Further allegations of the bill and answer appear from the opinion.

The case was heard in the court below before Duffy, J., who decreed that the entire structure complained of should be abated; and the defendant appealed to this court.

Messrs. E. J. D. Cross, and John K. Cowen, for appellant.

Messrs. J. Southgate Lemon, and John Henry Keene, Jr., for appellee.

Ritchie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controlling question in this case, and the only one, after full consideration, which we deem it necessary to dwell upon is whether the structure complained of is in respect of the distance it projects upon the sidewalk, and of its architectural character, authorized by an ordinance of Baltimore City.

The Act of 1833, chap. 180, empowered the mayor and city council to pass ordinances regulating the limits within which it should be lawful to erect steps, porticos or porches or other architectural ornaments to houses fronting on Mount Vernon or Washington Place.

The first ordinance passed in pursuance of this Act was No. 55, of 1850; and the same regulations contained therein were re-enacted in 1858, and numbered 59 in the volume of Revised Ordinances of that year; the difference between the latter and that of 1850 being merely in the preambles, but in which they both refer to the Act of 1833 as their authority. The enacting provision of the Ordinance of 1858 is:

"It shall not be lawful for any person to erect or set up any portico, steps or any other ornamental structure whatever on Mount Vernon Place a greater distance into the Place than nine feet, measuring from the building line thereof."

The width of Mount Vernon Place is 200 feet, and of its sidewalks, eighteen feet.

It is contended by the appellee that this municipal permission to encroach with any portico, steps or any other ornamental structure upon Mount Vernon Place nine feet, which is half the width of the pavement, has been repealed by the Act of 1854, chap. 9, and the Ordinance No. 36, of 1874, adopted thereafter.

This Act of 1854 conferred on the mayor and city council the power of regulating the limits within which it should be lawful to erect steps, porticos, bay windows or other architectural ornaments to houses fronting on any of the streets, lanes or alleys of the city. This Act is codified as section 864 of article 4, of Public Local Laws. The Ordinance of 1874 fixes the limit that any steps, porch or portico may encroach from the building line upon any of the streets or alleys at one third the width of the foot way; and repeals all "inconsistent ordinances."

The operation of the Act of 1854 did not, we think, take away the power conferred by the Act of 1833. It simply enlarged the power already bestowed as to a part of the city to embrace the whole of it. The power having already been given to regulate porches, etc., in Mount Vernon Place, a fair presumption is that this later Act was intended to apply to that portion of the city for which no such power had been given; and that hence, the use of the words "streets, lanes and alleys" was not meant to embrace the thoroughfares of Mount Vernon Place, already provided for. Indeed, the designation of Mount Vernon Place as a "place" tends to support this contradistinction. It is a locality of unusually spacious dimensions, and having special requirements as the site of the Washington Monument.

The same observations are equally applicable to the Ordinance of 1874, founded upon the statute.

But whatever might be the true construction of the Ordinance of 1874, if it were the last act of municipal legislation on the subject to which it relates, or even assuming that it operated a repeal of the Ordinance of 1858, this latter ordinance was revived by reënactment in the adoption of the City Code of 1879. Both these ordinances are embodied in this Code; and all the ordinances therein set out, were by a special and comprehensive ordinance enacted to be valid and operative as such.

That it is competent for a municipal Legislature by a single ordinance to declare any compilation of ordinances or proposed ordinances in force, in the absence of a statutory prohibition, we do not doubt. Such a power has been too generally exercised, with implied if not express recognition by the courts, to be now questioned.

The Baltimore City Code of 1879 has been recognized as the repository of the ordinances, valid at its adoption, in the subsequent city legislation, and has been cited by parties and relied on by this court in numerous cases as of undoubted authority. To deny the operative effect of a comprehensive ordinance of this kind, would practically be to deprive a city of the great utility of a Code.

That the Code of 1879 was duly adopted is apparent from the ordinances published with it. Section 48 of article 87, Public General Laws, provides that the ordinances and resolutions of the mayor and city council of Baltimore, may be read in evidence from the printed volumes published by the authority of said corporation. That the "printed volumes" are published by authority we think it competent to gather from the volumes as they appear in print; the object of the law being to remove the delay and expense incident to the production of manuscript originals, where the published volumes purport to be authoritative.

There is no specific reference to the ordinance allowing "any portico, steps, or any other ornamental structure whatever," to extend nine feet into Mount Vernon Place, in that clause of the Ordinance of 1874 which repeals "inconsistent ordinances;" and regarding the former as a special and the latter as a general ordinance, they should be considered as in pari materia. They are not inherently incompatible. The general rule in the construction of statutes (applicable alike to the Act of 1854 and the Ordinance of 1874) is that a later one of a general nature does not effect the repeal of a special one, unless direct reference is made to the latter with that intent, or in terms they are so irreconcilable that a repeal by implication is manifest.

Sedgwick, Stat. & Const. Law, 2d ed. p. 87, etc., thus states the rule:

"In regard to the mode in which laws may be repealed by subsequent legislation, it is laid down as a rule, that a general statute without negative words, will not repeal the particular provisions of a former one, unless the two acts are irreconcilably inconsistent, as for instance, the Statute 5 Elizabeth, chap. 4, that none shall use a trade without being an apprentice, did not take away the previous Statute 4 and 5 Philip and Mary, chap. 5, declaring that no weaver shall use, etc. The reason and philosophy of the rule is that when the mind of the legislator has been turned to the details of a subject, and he has acted upon it, a subsequent statute in general terms or treating the subject in a general manner, and not expressly contradicting the original Act, shall not be considered as intended to affect the more particular or positive previous provisions, unless it is absolutely necessary to give the latter Act such a construction in order that its words shall have any meaning at all. So when an Act of Parliament had authorized individuals to inclose and embank portions of the soil under the River Thames, and had declared that such land should be free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever, the Land Tax Act, subsequently passed, by general words embraced all the lands in the kingdom; and the question came before the King's Bench, whether the land mentioned in the former Act had been legally taxed, and it was held that the tax was illegal."

We see no difficulty in the standing together of a special ordinance adapted to a particular locality, such as Mount Vernon Place, and a general one applicable to the streets and alleys of the city at large. The need of such discrimination is apparent. The necessities of thoroughfares such as Baltimore or Pratt Street, for instance, or of those adjacent to markets or wharves devoted to business and thronged with pedestrians, and of streets and alleys as generally used, are not similar to those of places or squares set apart for ornament and relief from the crowds and activities of commerce. As to the former, facility of passage along the sidewalks is a paramount requirement; while as to the latter, it is in furtherance of the purpose to render them attractive, to give more freedom to the exercise of private taste for adornment in their vicinity.

In a city noted for its monuments, municipal legislation peculiar to their neighborhood would seem indispensable; and we regard the ordinance allowing steps, porticos or any other ornamental structure to extend nine feet into Mount Vernon Place a valid and reasonable exercise of statutory power, derivable from the Act of 1854, even if we assume it to have repealed that of 1833.

Regarding this ordinance of the City Code of 1879 as in force, the next inquiry is whether the structure in front of appellant's building line on Mount Vernon Place is within its terms.

This structure extends within a fraction of nine feet from the front or building line of appellant's house, is rectangular or nearly so in shape, has an elevation of about twenty-two feet from the ground, with a balustrade of two feet additional, the whole being about the height of the first story, with a length of some twenty-two feet, and ending on the side of plaintiff's house, nearly nine feet from the dividing line between him and defendant, and about eleven feet and a half from plaintiff's window.

The approach is by steps at the east end, and through it an entrance is gained to the main hall, with which it corresponds in width, through three arcades or doorways, set in the wall on the building line of the house, and susceptible of being left open or closed by doors or hangings. It is built of brownstone, as the house is, and inclosed, having two stained glass windows and an ornamental panel in front, and another stained glass window in the west end. While some other and more customary mode of entrance and one uninclosed, could have been selected, this is the main entrance way to defendant's house, adopted as such; and while, from being inclosed, the doorways or arches through which visitors or inmates pass from this entrance way into the hall or building proper may remain open, its primary use and purpose is a means of access to the building through the three doorways which are abreast of and command the hall; and thus is essentially an inclosed porch or portico for that purpose.

That the hall of a house should be constructed with three doorways, commanding its entire breadth, instead of one, is simply a matter of choice in the builder, and is not prohibited; and there is no requirement that they shall be exposed to view, nor is it forbidden that they may be protected by inclosing the platform or porch by which access to them is reached. That such a structure is permissible is clear from its not transcending the limit of nine feet from the building line, and falling within the terms of "portico, steps or any other ornamental structure." From the use of these words, no limitations seem to be imposed upon the preference or taste of the builder, except that in the mode of providing an entrance to his house he shall not erect what will offend the eye, but so construct it that it shall be architecturally an ornament, and thus contribute to enhance the beauty of the neighborhood and city. To impose no restrictions but the standard of adornment was a wise latitude, looking to the changes in tastes and architectural modes and styles that time might be expected to bring.

The testimony is conclusive as to the essential character of the structure being that of an entrance way, and as to its ornamental effect. A number of architects were examined on both sides, and the tenor of their opinions as experts was the same:

Wyatt, one of the witnesses, says: "The most accurate designation for it, I should consider, would be an inclosed porch or vestibule. I consider it highly ornamental."

Niernsee, another, says: "It would certainly come under the term ornamental structure."

Wilson says: "I should call it an inclosed porch. It harmonizes perfectly in detail and style."

Pennington says: "The projection I consider a feature, forming the main entrance way to the house, and would term it an inclosed porch, forming on the inside a vestibule to the main hall. I consider the design of the porch in harmony with the rest of the building."

Architects from New York testify to the same effect. Cady says: "The projection is designated in New York as a stoop, in some other places as a porch. The porch is to make an effective and ornamental entrance to the building and to protect the steps and entrance from the weather. It seems to harmonize perfectly with the design of the said building. I have seen many residences in New York with similar projections."

Haight says: "The projection appears to be an inclosed porch. The purpose is to give access to and adorn the building. It seems to be in harmony with the architecture of the building, and I know of residences in New York and elsewhere having similar projections."

Post says: "It is an inclosed porch, it is an entrance to the house and a protection to the doorway. It also emphasizes the main entrance of the house. I think it harmonizes thoroughly with the design, and is a very handsome feature."

Robertson says: "I should term the projection an inclosed porch. Its use is to give a covered entrance to the house, and its purpose is to serve as an ornamental structure. I should say that in the main it harmonizes with the design and is not out of proportion to the general mass of the front."

It is true that some of the plaintiff's witnesses called it a vestibule; but others term it an inclosed porch, while its ornamental character is generally conceded. We do not concur in the idea that the ordinance, from using the descriptive terms, "portico, steps," etc., and not mentioning porch, meant to forbid the erection of porches, or used "portico" in a technical sense, as distinguishing it from porch, piazza, verandah or any other equivalent mode of entrance, but in a generic sense and as synonymous. Besides, the words, or "any other ornamental structure," would include a porch, if handsome, whether inclosed or uninclosed, if not implied in the word portico.

Its primary character being an inclosed porch, we do not think its subsidiary uses can destroy its essential nature. The inclosing of a portico or porch is not forbidden. An inclosed one has advantages in respect of the weather and certain forms of embellishments, and admits of the doorways to the building proper being left open, and of freer access between the hall and the porch, than would be possible if the latter were left exposed to the weather. But being inclosed does not render it any less the main entrance way.

And so in regard to its projection; being lawful to extend it as the means of entrance nine feet into the sidewalk, its foundation is lawful to support it that distance from the building line; and when laid for that purpose, such purpose is not affected by the incident of the walls being either built entirely solid, or having windows cut in them to secure a subsidiary use inside. We do not think it would remain a porch if the foundation walls were left solid and become a bay window if light were let through apertures made therein; provided the harmonious character and use of the structure as a porch were not altered thereby. The subordinate uses which may be made of a structure will not supersede its essential character. The incidental or inferior features will not of necessity be inconsistent with the maintenance of its dominating and original impress.

This porch being, therefore, in its extent from the building line, and in its ornamental effect, a lawful structure, it follows that the plaintiff (even if some measure of obstruction to his light, or other injury, is consequent upon its erection) is not entitled to relief; such damage is damnum absque injuria. The inconvenience suffered is that incident to residing in a city, where houses are necessarily close together; and the legitimate use of his property by a neighbor will unavoidably often cause discomfort, and where he in turn will suffer inconvenience from the same cause.

It often occurs that it would be more agreeable if next door there were not a tree, or an awning or a signboard, to obstruct the light; but where such obstructions rightfully exist, they afford no ground for legal redress.

As to any interruption of the plaintiff's facilities of outlook in the sense of view merely, it has been long ago decided that for mere interference with prospect, it not being an incident of the estate, no remedy lies apart from contract. Aldred's Case, 5 Coke, pt. 9, p. 102; Butt v. Imperial Gas Co. 2. What will amount to delay within the rule must be determined by the character of each case as it arises. A delay of twenty-one days in a simple case where the petition could easily be prepared in less than an hour, held, an infraction of the rule, and the appeal dismissed.

MOTION to dismiss a writ of error, to review a judgment of the Circuit Court of Frederick County, sustaining a demurrer and quashing an indictment for violating an Act prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in a certain locality. Writ dismissed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Yellott, Stone, Miller, Robinson, Ritchie and Bryan, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank C. Norwood, State's Attorney for Frederick County, for the State.

Mr. Milton G. Urner, for defendant in error.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

George W. Bowers was indicted for violating the Act of 1864, chap. 184, a local law which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors within three miles of either of the churches in the Village of Myersville, in Frederick County. He demurred to the indictment and the court sustained his demurrer and quashed the indictment. This judgment was rendered on the 10th of March, 1886, and on the first of April following, the State sued out a writ of error to bring the case to this court for review. The defendant in error has now moved to dismiss the writ upon the ground that it was not taken "without delay," under Rule 28, Relating to Appeals.

The preceding Rule 27 requires appeals in civil cases to be taken within two months from the date of the judgment; but this Rule 28 provides that "The aforegoing rule shall not apply to criminal cases; but in all such cases the appeal or writ of error allowed by law shall be taken without delay, and the transcript of the record shall forthwith, or as soon as the same can be made out, be transmitted to the court of appeals."

It is very desirable, and for obvious reasons, that criminal cases should be disposed of as speedily as possible after trial, and that no unnecessary delays should be interposed by appeals or writs of error. Hence the Legislature (when by the Act of 1872, chap. 316, it allowed exceptions to the rulings of the court in criminal cases and an appeal as in civil cases) was careful to provide that such appeals "shall be heard by the court of appeals at the earliest convenient day after the same shall have been transmitted to said court."

It was to carry out this purpose of preventing delay that the rule in question was adopted. It prescribes no precise time within which an appeal or writ of error shall be taken after the ruling or judgment complained of is rendered, but requires it to be taken without delay and the record transmitted as soon as it can be made out, and makes no distinction between an appeal or writ of error taken by the State and one taken by the accused.

What will amount to delay within the rule must be determined by the character of each case as it arises. A longer time will be allowed where the exceptions are numerous, or where the case is such that time is required for preparing the petition for a writ of error. But in a simple case like this, where the petition could easily be prepared in less than an hour, a delay of twenty-one days is unquestionably an infraction of the rule and the motion to dismiss must prevail.

MOTION to dismiss a writ of error to the Circuit Court for Frederick County, sustaining a demurrer to an indictment for violating an Act prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in a certain locality. Writ dismissed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Yellott, Stone, Miller, Robinson, Irving, Ritchie and Bryan, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank C. Norwood, State's Attorney for Frederick County, for the State.

Mr. Milton G. Urner, for defendant in error.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion to dismiss made in this case must be sustained for the reasons stated in the case of State v. Bowers, just decided [Ante, 405].

The defendant in error was indicted under the Act of 1866, chap. 104, a local law which prohibits the sale of spirituous or fermented liquors within three miles of either of the churches in the Village of Wolfsville, in Frederick County. He demurred to the indictment and the court gave judgment sustaining the demurrer on the 10th of March, 1886, but the writ of error was not applied for until the 17th of April, following. A longer period of time intervened between the judgment and the application for the writ than occurred in the case of State v. Bowers, and all that was said in that case applies, therefore, a fortiori, to this.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, in favor of complainants in a bill in equity to enforce payment of a certain sum of money held by defendant as trustee. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Yellott, Robinson and Bryan, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte, for appellant:

The decree of December 9, 1882, is a final decree so far as the $4,000 was concerned. It directed the executor to pay that sum to the trustee; directed the trustee what to do with the income and the principal; determined who should share in the enjoyment of either, and left absolutely nothing undecided as to this subject matter. It referred to the auditor the questions only of what balance remained after such payment in the hands of the executor, and how that balance should be distributed among the various claimants.

This decree, if erroneous, was subject to appeal; if improvidently passed, it could be corrected during the term, upon petition. After the term it became enrolled and beyond the control of the court, except through a bill of review or original bill for fraud, or malpractice; and, until so corrected, it determined absolutely the rights of all the parties to the cause as to its subject matter.

Thruston v. Devecmon, 30 Md. 210, 217; Downes v. Friel, 57 Md. 531, 534, 535; Trayhern v. Mechanics Bank, 57 Md. 590, 598.

Such being the effect of the decree, the auditor's expression of opinion, made as to a matter not referred to him and after the term in which the decree was passed, could have no possible efficacy, either to determine its construction or to modify its effects. The auditor is a mere ministerial officer, without any judicial functions.

Dorsey v. Hammond, 1 Bland, 469; Field v. Holland, 6 Cranch, 21 (10 U. S. bk. 3, L. ed. 140).

Mr. George R. Gott, for appellee.

Yellott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree passed by the Circuit Court of Baltimore City. As disclosed by the record, one Fayette Plummer, by his last will and testament, did "give and devise" to his wife, Josephine Plummer, the income from $4,000 during her life, and after her death, the principal is to be divided among certain charitable institutions in said will designated. There are several legacies bequeathed to other parties, and then all the residue of the estate, real and personal, is given to the said Josephine. Of this will, George W. Lindsay was appointed executor, with power "to sell all and any" of said property.

The widow of the testator, being indebted to one Frank Welsh to the amount of $700, executed a mortgage of all her interest in the estate of the testator; and Welsh assigned this mortgage to Charles C. Rhodes. The validity of this mortgage being subsequently disputed, and there being other claims against the said Josephine, the executor filed his bill of complaint, alleging that the orphans' court had decided that it had no jurisdiction to determine the matters in controversy, and asking that the parties be decreed to interplead, so that their respective rights might be heard and determined.

The proper pleadings were then filed in regular procedure; and by a decree, passed on the 9th of December, 1882, the court appointed the appellant, Thomas Owings, Trustee, to receive from the said executor the sum of $4,000, with interest, to be securely invested in conformity with the provisions of the will. The decree also directed the executor to pay over the said sum of $4,000 with interest, to the Trustee thus appointed, and referred the claims of all the contesting parties to the auditor, with directions to state an account.

An account was stated by the auditor in accordance with these directions, and was on the 7th of March, 1883, finally ratified and confirmed. The auditor's account, which was thus finally ratified and confirmed, adjusted the matters in controversy between the litigating parties and allowed the claim of the appellee.

It is manifest that the decree passed on the 9th of December, 1882, was merely interlocutory. It must be borne in mind that the property was in the hands of an executor; that the orphans' court had determined that it had no jurisdiction; and that the interposition of a court of equity had been invoked so that it might be decreed that the parties to the controversy should interplead. The bill for an interpleader was filed on the 14th of January, 1882, and the parties defendant having subsequently answered, the court, on the 9th of December, in the same year, passed the decree in question.

This decree was necessarily interlocutory because, from the very nature of the procedure, there must be a preliminary decree so that the codefendants may have an opportunity to properly present their conflicting claims and support them by the introduction of evidence which may form the foundation for the final determination of the court in regard to their respective rights; this being the relief which the plaintiff, who has no pecuniary interest in the contest, asks for in his bill for an interpleader. To this relief he is clearly entitled; and, therefore, it becomes the duty of the court to pass a preliminary decree.

As was said by Lord Loughborough in Langston v. Boylston, 2 Ves. Jr. 108, 109: "A party claiming no right in the subject is doubly vexed by having two legal processes in the names of different persons going on against him at the same time. He comes upon the most obvious equity to insist that those persons claiming that to which he makes no claim should settle that contest among themselves, and not with him."

The court by its preliminary decree substituted its own trustee in the place of the executor, and thus assumed control by ordering a transfer of a portion of the property in dispute. It could not undertake to determine the validity of the claims in controversy before all the evidence in support of those claims had even been adduced and considered; and any construction of the peculiar phraseology of a portion of this decree which tends to give it a different effect and operation must be rejected.

The court referred the claims of the codefendants to the auditor, with directions to take testimony, and on the 23d of February, 1883, the auditor filed his report and account, in which, among other claims, he allowed that of the assignee of the mortgage. On the 7th of March, 1883, the court finally ratified and confirmed the report and account, and the order then passed was undoubtedly a decretal order and operated as a final adjudication, and a determination of the questions involved in the litigation then pending as, under the pleadings and issue, it was impossible for the parties interested to carry the controversy any farther in that court. Contee v. Dawson, 2 Bland, 264; Lee v. Admrs. of Boteler, 12 Gill & J. 323.

The passage of this order had the effect of a final decree, and determined the rights of the respective parties. But the appellant in the pending appeal was no party to that cause. The funds in dispute had been placed in his hands by the passage of the interlocutory decree. When the procedure is by interpleader, the person holding the property in controversy has been aptly compared to a stakeholder. He has not, and cannot properly have, any interest in the issue, whatever it may be, and having no interest cannot be affected by the final decree. Langston v. Boylston, 2 Ves. Jr. 109; Bedell v. Hoffman, 2 Paige, 199.

But when the rights of the parties to a suit which had its inception in a bill for an interpleader have been determined by a final decree, it may, at some period subsequent to the passage of the decree, become necessary to enforce the determination of the court; and this may be done by the institution of new proceedings growing out of the original suit which has been ended. And it is evident that the institution of these proceedings cannot be prevented by the enrollment of the decree in the original suit, as persons who were not parties to the former suit may be brought in and be affected by the new proceedings. It was said by Lord Cranworth in Lyne v. Pennell, 1 Simons, N. S. 113, that "As a defendant to an interpleading suit stood, after a decree, in the anomalous situation of plaintiff as well as defendant, he might file a supplemental bill for the purpose of bringing a new defendant before the court, without making the other parties to the original suit parties to it, as a plaintiff in an ordinary suit might do."

The right of the appellee to a certain sum of money had been determined by the court; but this money was not in the hands of any of his codefendants. It was in the hands of the appellant, who was no party to the proceedings which were terminated by the final decree. The appellee certainly had the right to institute proceedings to obtain the benefit of this decree. A course of procedure analogous to that indicated by the vice chancellor in Lyne v. Pennell, was, therefore, proper and expedient; and this course has been pursued by the appellee, and was the most effectual remedy which he could have invoked, as the stakeholder having the funds in his possession was the trustee of the court and subject to its supervision and control.

The appellee filed his petition on the 28th of October, 1884, and in it refers to the action of the court in ratifying the auditor's account, which allowed his claim as assignee of the mortgage, and avers that there is an unpaid balance which the appellant has refused to pay. This petition is answered by the appellant, who, in his answer, denies the right of the appellee to the sum claimed by him; and avers that he, the said appellant, has paid over the whole of the income, received by him, in manner and form as directed by the decree appointing him trustee. He avers and contends that the rights of all parties to the cause, and the duties and liabilities of the trustee, were finally fixed and determined, so far as the fund of $4,000 and the income and proceeds thereof are concerned, by the decree of the 9th day of December, 1882.

Now, as was decided by this court in Barth v. Rosenfeld, 36 Md. 604, "A decree passed upon the filing of a bill of interpleader, ordering the complainant to pay the money into court, and requiring the defendants to interplead and answer, is interlocutory, settling the rights of no party, and is at all times prior to a final decree, subject to revision and alteration, being merely auxiliary to further proceedings, and does not require a bill of review to vacate, amend or rescind the same."

The decree in question did not, as has already been intimated, determine any of the rights involved in litigation; and that portion of it which is supposed to be a clerical error is a mere copy or reproduction of the provisions of the will, and was inserted because the sum due the assignee of the mortgage was to be paid out of the income arising from the fund of $4,000 placed in the hands of the Trustee who was, after satisfaction of the mortgage, to pay the income to Josephine Plummer until her death, when he was to distribute the principal among the recipients of the testator's bounty, just as the executor had been required to do, and in whose place the Trustee had been substituted. But surely the trustee ought to have known that when the court had finally ratified and confirmed the auditor's report and account, which allowed the claim of the appellee, he was not authorized to pay the income to anyone else until that claim had been satisfied.

The rule is well settled, in this State and in England, that when there has been an unauthorized payment of funds held in a fiduciary capacity, the loss must fall on him who thus makes the payment, and not on an innocent party. Referring to such payments made by executors, Lord Redesdale said:

"I have no doubt the executors meant to act fairly and honestly, but they were misadvised; and the court must proceed, not upon the improper advice under which an executor has acted, but upon the acts he has done. If, under the best advice he could procure, he acts wrong, it is his misfortune; but public policy requires that he should be the person to suffer." Doyle v. Blake, 2 Schoales & L. 248.

This rule has received the sanction of the courts of equity in Maryland, and numbers of cases might be cited in which it has been rigidly enforced. Green v. Putney, 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 262; Murray v. Feinour, 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 418.

The decree of October 27, 1885, from which this appeal has been taken, adopted the former determination of the court; and it is manifest that the nature of the questions involved in this controversy constrained the learned judge who passed this decree to refer to the former adjudication. The Trustee, who was not a party interested in the former suit, but a mere stakeholder with respect to the funds, having refused to pay the money found to be due to the assignee of the mortgage, the subsequent proceedings were instituted to enforce payment. The court decreed that this money should be paid by the appellant to the appellee. There was no error in this determination.

The court also made an adjustment of the costs; and the appellant urges that there is error in imposing on himself certain costs growing out of these proceedings, and contends that this is also a good ground for a reversal of the decree. But it has been decided by this court that "Courts of equity in this State always exercise a discretionary power upon the subject of costs; and if the decree is, in other respects right, it will not be disturbed even if, in the judgment of this court, there was an improper direction as to the party or fund charged with their payment." Hamilton v. Schwehr, 34 Md. 117; Columbian Build. Asso. No. 4 v. Crump, 42 Md. 195.

From what has been said, it follows that the decree of the court below should not be disturbed.

Decree affirmed, with costs to the appellee.

James KENNEDY et al., Appts.,
v.
MAYOR and City Council OF CUMBERLAND.

1. The fact that an individual lays out a street through his land and dedicates it to the public use does not impose upon the county or municipality the duty of improving or keeping it in repair. There must be an acceptance of the dedication before this duty can arise.
2. An uninterrupted use of a street by the public for at least twenty years is necessary to establish a public highway by user. Such use for any less period will not suffice.
3. The fact that vacant land within the city limits laid out by the owner into lots and streets is assessed by the city as "Shriver's Addition," is of no weight in determining this question of acceptance; nor is any weight to be attached to the fact that the city had repaired other streets in this addition which were laid out and opened at the same time.
4. The acceptance by the City of Cumberland of its amended charter of 1848 did not operate as an acceptance or adoption of streets previously laid out within the city limits and dedicated to the public by the owners.

5. That about a month after the accident for which a recovery is sought in this action the city council appropriated a sum of money to the repair of and which was subsequently expended in repairing a street, is not sufficient to make the city liable for such injury occurring by the street being out of repair and unsafe.
6. The question whether the dedication of a street is complete, as against the owners of the soil, is one for the jury; but where the facts are undisputed, their sufficiency to warrant the conclusion that the street was adopted as a public highway is a question of law.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Allegany County, on a verdict for defendant in an action to recover for damages sustained from the falling of a defective foot bridge. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Yellott, Stone, Miller and Bryan, JJ.

The following prayers offered by plaintiffs at the trial were rejected by the court:

1. That if the jury find from the evidence that Shriver's addition to Cumberland was laid out by Henry Shriver in 1871, and that Lee Street (mentioned in the plaintiffs' declaration) was then laid out as one of the streets in said addition, and that in 1873 said street was opened for public travel, and ever since has been used by the public as a common highway, and that about the year 1873 several houses were built along said street, and that defendant assessed the lots in said addition, including those bounding on said Lee Street, and described them in its assessment books as lots in Shriver's addition, and that other streets in said addition laid out and opened at the same time have been repaired by the city from time to time for several years; and if they further find that said street was laid out and opened at and before the 5th day of April, 1878, and that the amended charter of said City, passed at the session of 1878 of the General Assembly of Maryland, was accepted by the defendant; and that said Lee Street was within the corporate limits of said city as established prior to said 5th of April, 1878; and that the City Council of Cumberland, at a meeting held the 5th of October, 1885, passed the order, offered in evidence, appropriating $75 for the repair of said street; and that said order was approved by the Mayor; and that in pursuance thereof said street was in October, 1885, repaired by the defendant at the place where the accident in this case is alleged to have occurred—then from said facts taken collectively, they are at liberty to find that Lee Street is one of the public streets or highways of said city, laid out and dedicated to public use and accepted by the city, and was such at the time of the accident in this case.

2. That if the jury find from the evidence in the case (under the preceding instruction of the court) that Lee Street, at the time of the alleged accident to the plaintiff, Mrs. Kennedy, was one of the public streets or highways of the City of Cumberland; and if they further find that on or about the 14th day of September last said plaintiff, Mrs. Kennedy, while passing over said street, fell and was injured, and that said accident was occasioned by the defective and dangerous condition of said street, and that at the time of said accident she was using due care on her part—then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, provided the jury find that the defendant or its proper agents, for the purpose of keeping its streets in repair, knew of such unsafe condition of said Lee Street (or might have known the same by the use of due diligence) for such length of time before said accident that the same might have been remedied before said accident occurred.

The following prayers of the defendant were granted by the court:

1. That if the jury find from the evidence that Lee Street (so-called) was laid out by one Shriver, in or about the year 1871, upon a piece of ground having a natural surface drain or water course, which crossed said so-called street, and which received and carried off the surface water from the adjoining property in rainy seasons, and that there had been no change in the condition of said so-called street and drain, and that the defendant had not, before or at the time of the happening of the accident complained of in this case, either actually or impliedly accepted or adopted said so-called street as one of the public streets or highways of the defendant, that is to say, by formal resolution, order or ordinance, or by any acts of repair or recognition of said street as a street in the appropriation of money for or expenditure of money thereon, or by any work or labor thereon of it or its agents or servants, with its approval or acquiescence, then the plaintiffs cannot recover under the pleadings in this case, although the jury may further find that said street so-called was used by persons passing on foot over it in going to or from their respective homes or places of business; and this although the jury may further find that one Chase, about seven years ago, voluntarily, for his own convenience but without authority from the defendant or its agents, placed a part of the deck of a canal boat across said drain, thereby making a temporary bridge across the same, and which was afterwards crossed by such persons as had occasion to use said street in crossing said drain, and that the plaintiff, Margaret Kennedy, while using due care and caution on her part in the act of crossing said temporary bridge, sustained the injuries complained of in this case.

2. That it is necessary for the plaintiffs to prove to the satisfaction of the jury in this case before they can find for them, that Lee Street was not only laid out as a public street, but also that said street was either actually or impliedly accepted and adopted by the defendant before the alleged injuries occurred to Margaret Kennedy; and although they may find that the order was presented to the City Council of the defendant, prior to the accident as offered in evidence, and also the other order presented to the said City Council after the accident and adopted by the defendant, and said street thereafter repaired and that the property in Shriver's addition and lots in said addition were assessed by the defendant as offered in evidence, and that other streets in said addition were repaired both before and after said accident, and that the several deeds offered in evidence from Shriver and Henderson were executed, and the plat of Shriver's addition made as offered in evidence, and that said Lee Street was used as a street, as offered in evidence, by the public from the time it was opened as such in the year 1873 or 1874 by the said Shriver—such facts do not amount to an acceptance or adoption of said street by the defendant.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Brace & Richmond, for appellants:

Acts of the city, subsequent to the accident, in repairing the defective bridge, are admissible on the question of adoption of the highway.

Manderschid v. Dubuque, 29 Iowa, 73; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 642, note 2; Sewell v. Cohoes, 11 Hun, 631; affd. 75 N. Y. 45; Folsom v. Town of Underhill, 36 Vt. 580.

The act of the city in accepting an amended charter including within the city limits "Shriver's addition" also show an adoption by the city.

Des Moines v. Hall, 24 Iowa, 242; Requa v. Rochester, 45 N. Y. 129.

The fact that "Shriver's addition," laid out in 1871, was immediately thrown open to the public, and Lee Street, together with the other streets, has been used ever since by the public generally, is sufficient to show an adoption by the city.

Rex v. Inhab. of Leeds, 4 Barn. & Ad. 248; Guthrie v. New Haven, 31 Conn. 308; 2 Thomp. Neg. 759–760.

Mr. William J. Read, for appellee:

As against the proprietor of land there may be a dedication binding him when there has not been a sufficient acceptance by the municipality to make it liable for injuries occasioned by defects in the highway.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 642; McCormick v. Baltimore, 45 Md. 524.

In Maryland, by analogy to the Statute of Limitations, the period fixed for the establishment of a public way by user by the public is twenty years.

Thomas v. Ford, 63 Md. 351; Day v. Allender, 22 Md. 511; Browne v. M. E. Church, 37 Md. 108.

The cases of Manderschid v. Dubuque, 29 Iowa, 73, and Sewell v. Cohoes, 75 N.Y. 45, only hold that repairs made upon a street after the happening of an accident are sufficient to establish the fact of an acceptance of the street prior to the accident, where accompanied by facts prior to the accident showing a prior acceptance.

In the case of Manderschid v. Dubuque there was a public user for more than ten years, which, under the decisions in Iowa, was a sufficient length of time to raise a presumption of dedication.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. Margaret Kennedy was injured on the 14th of September, 1885, by the falling of a bridge over which she was walking. This bridge was a portion of the deck of a canal boat thrown over a gully, which ran across an alleged street, in the City of Cumberland, called Lee Street. The accident was caused by the unsafe condition of the bridge, and she and her husband brought this suit against the city to recover damages for the injury.

The declaration alleges that this was a public street or highway, which it was the duty of the city to keep in repair; and the action was defended, upon the ground of a denial of this allegation. It is plain that to sustain the action it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to establish the fact that this street or bridge was, at the time of the accident, a highway or bridge, which the city was bound to repair; and the sole question in the case is, Has this been shown by any proof legally sufficient to support that conclusion?

The facts, all of which are undisputed, and which were received by the court, subject to exception, are substantially as follows:

In 1871 Henry Shriver, being the owner of vacant land within the city limits, laid it off into a number of town lots by a plat upon which three or four streets and lanes were designated, and one of them was called Lee Street, and the whole was called "Shriver's Addition to Cumberland." Between 1871 and 1873 he sold some of these lots, and the deeds called for these streets, including Lee Street. This street was opened up for public travel in 1873, by the owners of the adjacent lots, and was by them dedicated to the public, and has ever since been used by the public as a common highway, although the travel thereon was principally by foot passengers, because the gully above mentioned made it difficult for wagons to cross over. Several houses were built along this street in 1873, or prior thereto. The lots, including those on Lee Street, were assessed to their several owners in the assessment books of the city as lots in "Shriver's addition." Other streets in this addition, laid out and opened at the same time, were repaired from time to time by the city for several years past. At a meeting of the City Council held on the 7th of September, 1885, an order was offered by one of the members instructing the superintendent of streets to repair Lee Street at a cost not exceeding $75; but it was not passed because it did not receive the requisite number of votes. At the next meeting, which was held on the 5th of October following, the same order was again offered, and it was then passed, and was approved by the Mayor on the 10th of October, which was nearly a month after the accident. Very soon after this the street was repaired by the city, out of the money so appropriated; and these repairs included the removal of the bridge on which Mrs. Kennedy was hurt, and the building of a new one. The bridge on which the accident happened was placed over the gully by one Chase, a volunteer, for his own accommodation, about eight years ago, and was since used by the public as a footway over the gully when using the street. This gully was a natural water way or drain for surface water from adjacent lands and hills, and was about two or three feet wide and fourteen inches deep. Since the street was laid out and opened there had been no change in the condition of its surface, except that both sides of it had been fenced, one the whole length, and the other the greater part thereof. There was no evidence of any repairs by the city made on this street prior to the accident, nor of any formal resolution, order or ordinance accepting the same.

From these facts a dedication of the bed of this street to the public, by Shriver and his grantees, is no doubt established; but it requires something more to create the privileges and duties belonging to a public highway. Any individual may lay out a thoroughfare through his lands; but such dedication does not impose upon the county or municipality the duty of improving or keeping it in repair. There must be an acceptance of the dedication before this duty can arise. The law on this subject is thus stated by Judge Dillon:

"As against the proprietors a dedication of land for streets and highways may be complete without any act or acceptance on the part of the public; but in order to charge the municipality or local district with the duty to repair, or to make it liable for injuries for suffering the street or highway to be or remain defective, there must be an acceptance of the dedication, and this acceptance must be by the proper or authorized local public authorities. It may be express and appear of record, or it may be implied from repairs made and ordered, or knowingly paid for by the authority which has the legal power to adopt the street or highway, or from long user by the public." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 642.

The doctrine that such acceptance is necessary in such cases was recognized by this court in McCormick v. Mayor etc. of Baltimore, 45 Md. 524.

The question then is, Do the facts above stated show such an acceptance by the city authorities before the happening of the injury sued for, of the dedication by the proprietors of the bed of this street, or is there anything in them upon which a jury could be instructed or allowed to infer such acceptance?

The user by the public set out in this statement of facts is wholly insufficient to make this street a public highway; for it has been repeatedly decided by this court, as the law of this State, that where user or prescription is relied on to establish a public highway, there must be an uninterrupted user by the public for at least twenty years; and such user for any less period of time will not suffice. Day v. Allender, 22 Md. 511; Browne v. Trustees of M. E. Church, 37 Md. 108; Thomas v. Ford, 63 Md. 352.

The fact that the lots were assessed in the assessment books of the city as lots in "Shriver's addition," is, in our opinion, entitled to no weight whatever in determining this question of acceptance. This was simply the recording of the description of the lots for the purpose of taxation, as the owners themselves had chosen to describe them in their deeds, and in order to distinguish and identify the property assessed and taxed. Nor is any greater weight to be attached to the fact that the city had repaired other streets in this addition which were laid out and opened at the same time. It was perfectly competent for, and within the absolute discretion of, the city authorities to accept some of these streets and refuse to accept others; and the fact that they did repair others and did not repair this one tends rather to show that they had determined, and for good reasons, not to incur the expense of grading and repairing it, and not to accept its dedication.

The acceptance by the city of the Act of 1878, chap. 484, amending its charter, has also been relied on by counsel for the appellants. But this Act made no change in the city limits. The land embracing this so-called addition, and which was thus platted and laid out by Shriver into lots with intersecting streets and lanes, was within the original limits of the city. If the amended charter had, for the first time, brought the land so platted within the city limits, and it had been accepted by the city, a different question would have been presented. In that case there would have been some ground for contending that the acceptance of the amended charter operated an acceptance or adoption of the streets so laid out and dedicated to the public by the owners.

One of the sections of the amended charter requires the city authorities, as soon as practicable, to provide by ordinance for a survey and map of the city limits, and for the location upon the map "of the streets and alleys already laid out and opened," but no such ordinance has as yet been passed. Besides, this section makes no mention of the streets in question, nor of any particular street; and the terms "streets and alleys already laid out, and opened," in the connection in which they are used, evidently mean the streets and alleys which the city itself had laid out and opened, or which had then become public streets, and not those which had been simply dedicated to the public by private individuals.

This leaves for consideration the single fact that about a month after the accident the City Council appropriated a sum of money to the repair of this street, which was subsequently expended in repairing it. It has been earnestly argued by counsel for the appellants, that this fact should have been submitted to the jury upon the question of acceptance or adoption, not as of itself amounting to a recognition or adoption by a retrospective effect, but as an act tending to show that the city had previously recognized and adopted the street.

A decision to the effect that such evidence was admissible upon this ground was made by a majority of the court in the case of Manderschid v. City of Dubuque, 29 Iowa, 73; but, in the opinion of the judge who dissented, this point is met by the remark that such evidence might perhaps bind the city in the future, but to hold that it "would create a retrospective liability would be to hold that present acts of adoption tend to prove a prior adoption; and it is needless to combat such a proposition."

No doubt there are cases in which such evidence is properly admissible, as in Folsom v. Town of Underhill, 36 Vt. 580, where several years prior to the accident the selectmen of the town directed the highway surveyor to expend money on the road, and he did so, and where other surveyors had also previous to the accident worked out a portion of the highway taxes on the same road, but without any express direction from the selectmen on the subject. The court in that case held that the work first done under the direction of the selectmen was clearly an act tending to show a recognition or adoption of the road by them, and that the working out of taxes by other surveyors prior to the accident without instructions by the selectmen was proper to be considered in connection with any prior act of theirs recognizing the road as a public highway, or with any evidence that such work was known to and not disapproved by them. And in connection with these facts the court further held that the act of the selectmen in directing repairs immediately after the accident was also admissible as an act tending to show that they had previously recognized and adopted the road. There were therefore some acts of repair proved in that case, tending to establish the fact of adoption or acceptance of the road by the proper authorities prior to the accident, which the subsequent acts of repair could throw light upon, emphasize or explain; and a careful reading of the opinion shows, we think, that that was the ground upon which they were admitted in evidence. The subsequent repairs did not stand, as in the case before us, as the only, solitary and isolated acts of repair ever done upon the road.

The case of Sewell v. Cohoes, 11 Hun, 626, (affirmed in 75 N. Y. 45) has also been referred to by counsel for the appellants. In that case the accident was caused by the fact that a tramway or bridge over the street, which had been erected by the owners of a coal yard, was too low. There was evidence tending to show that the land upon which the street was located belonged to the State, and not to the city; and the latter sought to exempt itself from liability for the injury, upon the ground that it had no title to the street, and as a consequence had no right to remove the bridge built by others. The city, however, long prior to the accident, had appropriated the land, and had graded and paved the street, and put down a sidewalk upon it, and had thus by these acts held it out to the public as a public street, and had thereby invited the public to travel upon it, and use it as a public highway. After the accident the city council passed a resolution directing the removal of the tramway or bridge, and it was removed without complaint from any one. This resolution was offered in evidence, and the court held that as it had been thus successfully carried out, such exercise of control over the bridge, even though exercised after the injury, was some evidence of the "power and authority" of the city to remove it before the accident; and that the fact of such removal tended to repel the defense set up by the city that it should not be held negligent in a matter which it had no power to prevent. This is the effect of the decision in that case, and it is obvious that it has very little bearing upon the point presented in this. It is also to be observed that both the cases referred to, the one in Iowa and the other in New York, rest for authority upon the decision in Folsom v. Town of Underhill, which we have already explained.

In this case it is conceded that the city had never at any time prior to the accident made any repairs upon this street, or passed any resolution, order or ordinance accepting it as a public street. The surface of the ground had never been disturbed; the bridge over the gully or drain, the defective condition of which was the cause of the injury, was placed there by a volunteer and for his own accommodation as a footwalk; and the City Council had in fact done no act whatever which could by possibility be construed into an invitation by them to the public to travel upon it, or use it in any way as a public street.

To allow then this single act of subsequent repair to be used against the city for the purpose of making it liable for this injury (and it could be used for no other purpose) would be to give it the effect of creating a retrospective liability. Whatever effect, therefore, this act may have upon the liability of the city for future accidents and injuries, we entirely concur with the court below in refusing to admit it as evidence in this case.

The court below, in its rulings upon the prayers, instructed the jury as to what facts it was necessary for them to find in order to entitle the plaintiffs to recover. In other words, the court treated the question of acceptance of the street by the city as a question of law; and in this we find no error.

This point has not hitherto been directly presented to this court, but the ruling is sustained by our decisions in numerous analogous cases which it is unnecessary to cite. In the case however of Folsom v. Town of Underhill, so much relied on by appellants' counsel for another point, the question did arise, and while the court held that the question whether the dedication was complete as against the owners of the soil, was a conclusion of fact to be drawn by the jury from the circumstances of the particular case, they yet expressly decided that where the facts are undisputed, their sufficiency to warrant the conclusion that the road was adopted as a public highway, would be a question of law; and they answered the objection that the trial court had not, in that case, instructed the jury what facts would constitute such adoption, by construing the instruction as telling the jury in effect, that if they found that the town did the acts relied upon as proof of the adoption of the road with the intention to regard and treat it as an existing highway, then it thereby became a highway adopted by the town, which the town was liable to keep in repair.

This is quite in accord with the practice in this State, in similar cases where the facts are controverted or in dispute. The court in such cases leaves the finding of the facts to the jury, with appropriate instructions as to their legal effect, according as the jury may find them to be. And there is good reason why this rule should be applied in cases like the present, for if the question of acceptance or adoption vel non should be left broadly to the finding of the jury, it would follow that the liability of a county or municipality would be left in uncertainty, depending upon the varying verdicts of different juries upon the same state of facts, instead of being, as it should be, settled and fixed by the law as declared by the courts.

But the facts in this case, as we have said, are undisputed, and we have shown they are not legally sufficient to make the city liable for the injury sued for. It would, therefore, have been proper for the court to so instruct the jury in direct terms. This being so, it follows that there can be no error prejudicial to the appellants in the rulings upon the prayers, and,

The judgment must be affirmed.

Mary J. PFISTERER, Appt.,
v.
William PFISTERER.

1. In an action for divorce, adultery must ordinarily be established by circumstantial evidence, which must be affirmatively convincing to justify a court in dissolving the marriage tie.
2. Every such case must depend upon its own peculiar circumstances; and the same or similar facts will not always warrant the same conclusion.
3. Held, in this case, that the proof justified the decree dissolving the marriage bond.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, granting a divorce a vinculo to defendant in a cross bill to a bill for a divorce a mensa, for cruelty, etc. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Bryan, Yellott, Stone and Irving, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas Hughes, for appellant.

Messrs. J. H. Keene, Jr., and Leigh Bonsal, for appellee.

Irving, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant filed a bill in the Circuit Court for Baltimore City for divorce a mensa et thoro, and for alimony. The grounds alleged were neglect, desertion and cruelty.

The appellee answered, denying the plaintiff's allegations, and, making his answer a cross bill, asked for divorce a vinculo matrimonii. Issue was made on the several questions, and proof was taken, upon which the court dismissed appellant's bill, and passed a decree divorcing the parties a vinculo.

From that decree the appellant took her appeal; and upon it she only asks a review of the proof upon which the charge against her was sustained by the court below. The only question, therefore, before us is whether the proof justified the decree dissolving the marriage bond.

The offense of which the appellant has been found, by the circuit court, to be guilty is one of "darkness and secrecy." Parties are rarely surprised in it; and so it not only may, but ordinarily must, be established by circumstantial evidence. As nothing short of its actual consummation is sufficient to lay the foundation for absolute divorce, the evidence must be affirmatively convincing to justify a court in dissolving the marriage tie. Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 618.

Every case must depend upon its own peculiar circumstances, and the same or similar facts will not always warrant the same conclusion, for the modes of life, habits and rank of the parties, and of the community in which they live, may require more charitable views of freedom in conduct than would be accorded under different conditions. Id. § 631; Kremelberg's Case, 52 Md. 555.

Giving the parties implicated the full benefit of all the considerations suggested above, we are constrained to think that the circuit court was right in its finding on the facts. Acts of a criminal nature are charged to have been committed with two persons, but proof tending to sustain the charge has been offered as to one person only. Three offenses with one James Gaily are charged, but evidence as to two occasions only has been produced.

If the evidence respecting the Cambridge trip and the conduct of the parties then stood alone, we would not have felt justified in sustaining the charge. But those facts which are conceded about that trip reflect some light on the conduct of the parties implicated generally, and aid in reaching a conclusion upon the facts testified to by Caroline Lang and James Gaily touching the night of the 4th of July, 1876. Caroline Lang at that date was a domestic servant in the appellant's house. If her testimony is to be credited in all its particulars, the inference of guilt is very strong, notwithstanding Gaily's sworn denial. She has not been discredited in any way. The circumstances are such as to have naturally impressed themselves strongly on her mind.

It is true it is a long time to remember so circumstantially; but she seems to be very certain of the facts she details. Gaily, who is charged with the offense, admits that he was at the house and staid all night on the 4th of July, 1876. He admits the absence of the husband in Philadelphia. He says he staid because he was sick, but he denies absolutely having violated his friend's bed. That he would admit the act could hardly be expected of him, according to the usually but unjustifiably obtaining view among dissolute men, of the obligation of a man who has been admitted to such privileges. The denial, therefore, cannot go for much when the facts tend to show it is untrue.

His fondness for the appellant and his frequent attentions to her were the subject of comment, while her apparent pleasure in receiving such attentions was also the subject of remark and censure of neighbors or associates. The husband seemed to have confidence in his wife, and permitted her to be escorted about by other men, seeming to have felt it a relief to be excused from going, and under such circumstances, if it were possible to escape the inference of criminality, from the facts testified to by Caroline Lang, we should regard the appellant's conduct as only indiscreet and unbecoming, and nothing more.

On this 4th of July, 1876, however, we find a man, particularly fond of a woman, availing himself of the absence of her husband to spend the night in her house. During the night, about 2 o'clock, the witness Lang supposed she heard a noise, which induced her to get up and go to Mrs. Pfisterer's door. Supposing the voice she heard was that of Mr. Pfisterer talking to his wife, and that he had returned in the night from Philadelphia, she returned to her bed and there remained until morning. At an early hour of the morning, Mrs. Pfisterer awoke the witness and sent her to market a long distance away for some lemons. When she returned she found that Mrs. Pfisterer, contrary to her habit, had prepared breakfast herself, and the table had been set for two persons and breakfast was over. The appellant told witness that a young man had taken breakfast with her. The witness did not know that Gaily had staid there all night. She knew that Gaily and another man were there when she retired, but did not know that he remained. Subsequently, during the day, while the appellant was away, a man called at the door and inquired if Gaily had staid all night at the house, saying he would give her as much money as she wanted if she would tell him. She replied she did not know; for she adds she could not say, as she had not seen him. When the appellant came home she told her of the man's inquiry.

That night Mr. Pfisterer came home. The next morning he brought her a message that his wife wanted her upstairs. She went, and Mrs. Pfisterer asked her not to tell her husband what the man had asked her; and when she got up for breakfast, she told her a woman, whom she did not know, had told her on the street that witness had criminally known her father. She thought she told her that to alarm her, and to make her keep silent and tell nothing. As we have already said, assuming the truth of these statements, but one inference can be drawn, and that is of guilt.

It is true that Gaily says he told Mr. Pfisterer of his having staid at his house on the night of the 4th of July, 1876; but the way in which he says it shows that he thought it needed explanation. He says he made it his business to see him and tell him and explain the reasons for so doing. He knew that it needed explanation, and he said that Mr. Pfisterer accepted it as satisfactory. He says he was sick, yet the servant was not called to go for a doctor. There was another man there whom he overstayed, and then left in the morning after the servant had gone away on a concocted errand. He was sick enough to stay, yet he says he left without eating a mouthful of breakfast next morning. His statements are unlikely and we must credit Caroline Lang, who seems to have no motive for prevarications.

The decree must be affirmed.

The Act of 1872, chap. 329, which provides that if any collector shall willfully detain in his possession taxes collected by him for six months, etc., he shall be deemed a defaulter, and upon conviction shall be imprisoned, etc., is not in conflict with the Constitution of this State which abolishes imprisonment for debt.
2. Nor is it any objection to the statute that it provides, upon the payment of the money for which he is in default, either before or after conviction, that such collector shall be discharged.
3. The court will presume in favor of the pleader every proposition which by reasonable intendment is impliedly included in the pleading, although not expressed.
4. It is not necessary to aver in the indictment that the money is still detained. If the money has been paid, that is matter of defense.
5. It is not necessary to charge in the indictment that defendant was duly appointed collector, nor that the taxes were duly levied, nor that they were placed in his hands for collection. It is sufficient if it avers that he was collector of the state and county taxes for the county and, as such, collected the taxes for the year.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Charles County, to review a judgment in favor of defendant on demurrer to an indictment under the Act of 1872, chap. 329, for not paying over to the State taxes collected. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Irving, Bryan, Yellott and Robinson, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Atty-Gen. Roberts, L. A. Wilmer and John H. Mitchell, for the State, plaintiff in error.

Messrs. R. H. Edelan, Sidney E. Mudd and D. R. Magruder, for defendant in error.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The traverser, collector of state and county taxes for Charles County, was indicted under the Act of 1872, chap. 329, which provides that if any collector shall willfully detain in his possession taxes collected by him, and neglect to pay the same into the treasury of the State, for more than sixty days after the day upon which it is made his duty to pay the same (or, if no particular day be appointed, shall neglect to pay the same for the space of six months), he shall be deemed to be a defaulter, and upon conviction shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary etc., "unless the amount for which he is a defaulter be sooner paid."

In support of the demurrer it is argued in the first place that the Act is in conflict with the Constitution of this State, which abolishes imprisonment for debt. There is, however, a broad distinction between imprisonment for debt, within the meaning of the Constitution, and imprisonment for a breach of duty on the part of a public officer, although such breach of duty may be the neglect or refusal on his part to pay money received by him for the use of the State.

Public officers were by the common law indictable for malfeasance or misfeasance in office; and although the Constitution abolishes imprisonment for debt, this in no manner interferes with the power of the Legislature to punish such offenses by imprisonment or otherwise, as the public interests may require. A collector of taxes is a public officer, whose duty it is to collect the taxes and pay the same into the treasury of the State or to the parties entitled, and if he neglects to discharge this duty and appropriates to his own use the money thus received by him as collector, the Legislature has the power to declare such acts of commission or omission to be an offense punishable in such manner as it may deem proper. Any other construction would deprive the Legislature of all power to punish defaulting officials for the appropriation by them of money received and held in trust for the State.

Nor is it any objection to the statute that it provides, upon the payment of the money for which he is in default, either before or after conviction, that such collector shall be discharged, for the reason that the Legislature has the right to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which the punishment shall be imposed.

Passing then from these objections to the statute, we come to the indictment; and this is said to be fatally defective, because it does not charge that the traverser detained the money six months after the same was collected by him. According to our rendering of the indictment this is charged in plain and explicit terms. It avers that on the second of April, 1884, the traverser, as collector, received the sum of $1,400 on account of taxes due the State, and that he did then and there unlawfully and willfully detained the said sum in his possession, etc., and unlawfully, etc., did neglect to pay said sum into the treasury of the State, for the space of "six months after he, the said Thomas F. Nicholson, had so as aforesaid collected and received the said amount," etc.

Here is an express averment that the traverser did detain, in his possession, the money so collected by him for six months after it had been so collected. Now certainty to a certain intent in general is all that is required in indictments; that is to say, the court will presume in favor of the pleader every proposition which by reasonable intendment is impliedly included in the pleading though not expressed. Archbold, Crim. Pl. § 44.

Then again; it is said that there is no averment that the money is still detained. This it was unnecessary to charge, for the reason that if the money had been paid before or after the finding of the indictment this was matter to be set up by way of defense.

"It is a good general rule," says Hawkins, Pleas, Vol. 2, part 2, chap. 25, § 112, p. 355, "that every indictment must bring the defendant within all the descriptions mentioned in the body of the Act, except they are such as carry with them the bare denial of a matter, the affirmation whereof is a proper and natural plea for the defendant, as where it is enacted 'That all persons having no reasonable excuse to be absent, shall go to their parish church,' etc., in which case it is said that it is not necessary to show that the defendant had no reasonable excuse, for this will come most properly in question from the plea of the defendant."

The rule thus laid down is fully sustained in Rex v. Baxter, 5 Term Rep. 83; Rex v. Pollard, 2 L. Raym. 1370; 2 Leonard, 5.

So here, if the traverser had paid the money, and it was no longer detained by him, this was matter of defense, and not necessary therefore to be set forth in the indictment.

The further objection that it does not aver that the traverser was duly appointed collector is equally untenable. It does charge in express terms that he was collector of state and county taxes for Charles County, and as such did collect the sum of $1,400 on account of taxes due the State. This is all that is necessary.

In Rex v. Holland, 5 Term Rep. 607, where the defendant was tried for malfeasance in office, as one of the counselors of the East India Company, the information charged that the defendant was one of said counselors, and acted as such. On demurrer it was argued in that case, as this, that the information ought to have averred that the defendant was duly appointed counselor, but Lord Kenyon held that it was sufficient to state generally that he was counselor, and the objection was overruled.

For the same reason it was quite unnecessary to charge that the taxes were levied by the county commissioners, or that the taxes were placed in the hands of the traverser for collection. The averment that he was collector of taxes, and as collector collected the taxes for the year 1883, fairly implies that the taxes were duly levied and placed in his hands for collection.

For these reasons the pro forma judgment on the demurrer will be reversed and cause remanded.

STATE of Maryland. *

1. Where a prisoner in custody was several times pressed by the magistrate to make a confession and each time denied his guilt, but, when told by the magistrate that it would be better for him to tell the truth and have no more trouble about it, confessed, held, that the confession, thus obtained, was inadmissible in evidence against him, although he was told at the same time that the magistrate could make no promises.
2. Where the prisoner before the confession is received, offers to prove that prior to the interview at which the confession was made the magistrate held out inducements to him to confess, the court should permit him to do so; for the confession, once in, may, although subsequently stricken out, influence the jury.
3. The preliminary question as to the admissibility of a confession should in all cases be decided by the court, before it is permitted to go to the jury.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Charles County, on conviction of defendant on trial for murder. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Bryan, Irving, and Robinson, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. D. R. Magruder and B. H. Camalier, for appellants.

Messrs. Atty-Gen. Roberts, L. A. Wilmer, and D. C. Hammett, for the State.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

---

* See People v. Mondon (N. Y.), 4 Cent. Rep. 357; People v. McCallam (N. Y.), 5 Cent. Rep. 511.

The confession made by the prisoner to Morgan, the committing magistrate, was not a free and voluntary confession, and it ought not therefore to have been permitted to go to the jury. The confession was made under the following circumstances:

The prisoner was committed to jail for the murder of Captain Dixin, and the magistrate seemed to think it was his duty to get from the prisoner an admission or confession of some kind as to his guilt. For this purpose he went to see the prisoner no less than five times, and at each of these interviews the prisoner denied that he had anything to do with the killing of the deceased. Finally, at the fifth interview, Morgan said that he had read a statement in a newspaper "that a Captain Evans had seen the deceased on his vessel on the trip on which he was killed, and that there was only one other man on board." Upon making this statement the prisoner seemed to hesitate, and Morgan then said to him "that it would be better for him to tell the truth and have no more trouble about it," and thereupon the prisoner made the confession which was offered in evidence. Mr. Morgan further says that in all these interviews, he told the prisoner he could make him no promises.

Now all agree that a confession is not admissible in evidence against the prisoner, unless it was freely and voluntarily made. There is no difficulty in regard to the rule itself, the trouble is in the application of the rule to the facts of each particular case, that is, whether it was a free and voluntary confession, or whether it was procured by the influence of another under a hope of favor or advantage if made, or fear of harm or disadvantage of some kind if withheld. It is not of course an easy matter to measure in all cases the force of the influence used, or to decide as to its precise effect upon the mind of the prisoner. Much, very much, we may add depends upon the age, the experience, the intelligence and character of the prisoner. And it may be that courts, leaning to the side of mercy, have in some cases excluded confessions, when it is difficult to see how the alleged inducement had any influence on the mind of the prisoner.

As was said by Baron Parke in Reg. v. Baldry, 2 Denison, C. C. 430; "The rule has been extended quite too far, and justice and common sense have too frequently been sacrificed at the shrine of mercy."

We have no disposition to extend the rule beyond the sound and well established principles on which it is founded; and, tested by these principles, the confession in this case is we think clearly inadmissible. The prisoner was in the custody of the law, and although pressed time and again to make a confession, and pressed too by one in authority, he persisted in denying his guilt; and it was not until he was told that it would be better for him to tell the truth and have no more trouble about it, that the confession was made. Here then was an inducement, and one too of the strongest kind, held out to him. The witness it is true says he told the prisoner he could make no promises; but what does this amount to, when, in the next breath, we find him saying to the prisoner that it would be better for him to tell the truth, and thereby have no more trouble about the matter? It was in fact saying to the prisoner: If you will tell me the truth it will not only be better for you, but you shall have no more trouble about the matter.

In Reg. v. Garner, 2 Carr. & K. 920, the witness told the prisoner that it would be better for her to tell the truth. Patteson, J., before whom the case was tried, after conferring with Lord Denman, C. J., held the confession to be admissible, and upon the conviction of the prisoner the question was reserved for the consideration of all the judges. After full argument of the case, Pollock, C. B., said "When a prisoner has been told that he had better tell the truth, and these expressions are used by or in the presence of a person in authority, I always reject the evidence."

Maule, J.: "That the expression 'You had better tell the truth,' coming from a person in competent authority, excludes what is said by the prisoner afterwards, has been decided in more than a hundred instances." Erle, J., was of the same opinion, and Patteson, J., before whom the case had been tried, was of opinion that he had erred in admitting the confession, and as there was no other evidence he said he "ought to have directed an acquittal."

In Rex v. Kingston, 4 Carr. & P. 387, the prisoner was indicted for administering arsenic to one Eliza Bates with intent to murder. The surgeon who was called in saw the prisoner and said to him: "You are under suspicion of this, and you had better tell all you know." Mr. Justice Parke, having conferred with Mr. Justice Littledale, held the confession made by the prisoner to be inadmissible.

So again in Rex v. Partridge, 7 Carr & P. 551, the prisoner being in the custody of a constable, the latter said to Mr. Marling, the prosecutor, "you must not use any threat or promise to the prisoner;" and immediately afterwards Marling said to the prisoner: "I should be obliged to you, if you would tell us what you know about it. If you will not, we of course can do nothing. I shall be glad if you will." Mr. Justice Patteson held this to be a promise. "What could the prosecutor mean" says the court, "by saying that if the prisoner would not tell they could do nothing, but that if the prisoner would tell they would do something for him?"

The whole question was fully considered in the latter case of Reg. v. Baldry, 2 Denison, C. C. 430, by Lord Campbell, C. J., Pollock, C. B., Parke, B., and Erle and Williams, JJ.

Pollock, C. B., said: "A simple caution to the accused to tell the truth, if he says anything," the statement may be given in evidence; "but where the admonition to speak the truth has been coupled with any expression importing that it would be better for him to do so, it has been held that the confession was not receivable, the objectionable words being that it would be better to speak the truth, because they import that it would be better for him to say something."

Now Morgan, the magistrate, having told the prisoner that it would be better for him to tell the truth, and have no more trouble about it, the confession thereupon made by the prisoner is, according to all the decisions, inadmissible, and the court ought to have excluded it from the jury.

The prisoner also offered to prove by other witnesses that prior to the interview at which the confession was made, Morgán had held out inducements to the prisoner to confess, and also what was said by Morgan at the time. This offer the court refused, saying at the time that if it should appear in the subsequent progress of the trial that inducements were in fact held out to the prisoner, and that the confession was made in consequence of such inducements, the court would direct the confession to be stricken out. This was not we think the proper practice. Before permitting the witness to testify in regard to the confession, the court ought to have ascertained: first, whether any inducements at the time or prior thereto had been held out to the prisoner, and in the next place, whether he was influenced by such inducements in making the confession. The court may, it is true, rule out a confession, even after it has been admitted in evidence, if satisfied in the subsequent progress of the case that it was not a free and voluntary confession, and may instruct the jury that it is not to be considered by them in determining the question as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner; but once in, it may have an influence more or less prejudicial against the prisoner. The preliminary question, therefore, as to its admissibility, is one which ought in all cases to be decided by the court, before it is permitted to go before the jury. Nicholson v. State, 38 Md. 140.

For these reasons the rulings below must be reversed, and a new trial awarded.

John C. SHIPLEY et al., Exrs., Appts.,
v.
William SHILLING.

1. When the new promise relied upon to remove the bar of the Statute of Limitations is sought to be deduced from a general indefinite acknowledgment of indebtedness, within the period of limitation, it is for the jury to determine whether or not such acknowledgment applies to the original demand sued on.
2. The jury must find to what debt or claim such general acknowledgment referred; and if the plaintiff shows but a single indebtedness, it may apply to that, or, if the demand sued for be an account of several items, it may apply to any part thereof, according to the evidence and the finding of the jury; and in such case, if the debtor alleges that there was a different account or demand to which the acknowledgment referred, the onus of proving that fact rests upon him, as matter of defense.
3. In an action against executors to recover for goods, etc., furnished to their testator, held, that a too general instruction, to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to recover if the jury should find the account to be established, and admitted by the testator within three years before suit brought, was cured by a subsequent instruction to the effect that the plaintiff could not recover unless the jury should also find that such admission applied to the account in suit.
4. A prayer to instruct the jury "that on the pleadings and all the evidence in the cause their verdict ought to be for the defendants," is too general and should be rejected.

(Decided February 11, 1887.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Carroll County, in favor of plaintiff in an action of assumpsit to recover for work and labor, articles furnished and money paid for defendant's testator. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Ritchie, Stone and Bryan, JJ.

The court rejected the following prayer offered by defendants:

"1. The defendants, by their counsel, pray the court to instruct the jury that on the pleadings and all the evidence in the cause, their verdict ought to be for the defendants."

The other prayers and facts material to the questions decided appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Chas. T. Reifsnider, Chas. E. Fink and James A. C. Bond, for appellants:

An acknowledgment may be indefinite in respect to the intended application of it to a particular debt; and it ought clearly to appear in all cases that it relates to the identical debt which is sought to be recovered upon the strength of it. In such cases it should be left to the jury to decide as to the intention.

2 Greenl. Ev. § 440; Angell, Limitations, § 238.

According to Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 351 (26 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 174), it is indispensable for the plaintiff to establish by independent evidence the extent of the balance due him, before there can arise any promise to pay it as a subsisting debt.

An admission that something is due or some balance accruing cannot be justly construed into a promise to pay any debt or balance which the party may assert or prove before a jury.

Bell v. Morrison, supra; Angell, Limitations, § 239.

Messrs. William L. Seabrook and Charles B. Roberts, for appellee:

The acknowledgment of a debt, of unascertained amount, entitles a plaintiff to recover so much as he can satisfy a jury is really due him.

Peterson v. Ellicott, 9 Md. 62; Quynn v. Carroll, 10 Md. 208.

The plea of limitations is not a plea to the merits: Kunkel v. Spooner, 9 Md. 472; Lamott v. McLaughlin, 3 Harr. & McH. 324; and is not favored in the law; Farmers Bank v. Sprigg, 11 Md. 398; and it has been uniformly held by this court that any acknowledgment of a present subsisting debt or liability will remove the bar of the statute.

Sprogle v. Allen, 38 Md. 336; Oliver v. Gray, 1 Harr. & G. 204; Beltzhoover v. Yewell, 11 Gill & J. 212; Buffington v. Davis, 33 Md. 511; Knight v. House, 29 Md. 200.

It is for the court to determine what kind of promise or acknowledgment is sufficient to remove the bar of the Statute of Limitations; and the evidence offered to prove such promise or acknowledgment is proper to be submitted to the jury as in other cases under the direction of the court.

Oliver v. Gray, supra.

The jury must find to what debt the acknowledgment related; and if only one indebtedness was shown, the subsequent acknowledgment could apply to none other than that, unless the defendants could show by independent testimony on their part not only some other indebtedness to which the acknowledgment might apply; but if they allege that there was a different indebtedness to which it might apply, the onus of proving that it did apply to the other indebtedness rests with them.

Guy v. Tams, Peterson v. Ellicott, and Quynn v. Carroll, supra; Whitney v. Bigelow, 4 Pick. 110; Stafford v. *Bryan, 3 Wend. 582, cited in 21 Pick. 323.

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of assumpsit brought by the appellee against the appellants as executors of Elias Brothers, deceased. The claim sued on was for work and labor performed, articles furnished, and money paid for the appellants' testator in his lifetime. Among other defenses made to the action, the Statute of Limitations was pleaded; and it is under that plea that the questions arise that are presented on this appeal.

At the trial in the court below the appellee offered evidence in support of his claim sued for, and also evidence of certain statements or acknowledgments of the appellants' testator, made within three years of the bringing of the action, whereby, as it is contended by the appellee, the bar of the Statute of Limitations was removed. Both parties offered prayers for instructions to the jury; and it is from the ruling of the court upon those prayers that this appeal is taken. By the exception taken two questions are presented: first, whether the evidence offered to remove the bar of the Statute of Limitations was legally sufficient for that purpose, if believed by the jury; and second, whether the instructions given were sufficiently definite, in requiring the jury to find that the acknowledgments testified to, if found to have been made by the testator, were made with reference to the claim sued for, and none other.

1. With respect to the first question, we are of opinion that the admissions or acknowledgments of the testator, as testified to by the witnesses Benson and Hull, if believed by the jury, were legally sufficient to remove the bar of the statute; and therefore the court below was right in rejecting the third prayer of the appellants.

The testimony of Benson is explicit to the fact that the testator admitted that the appellee had an account against him, the testator; and Hull testifies that he heard the testator say that he owed the appellee an account; although on neither occasion of making these admissions was there any account exhibited, or specially mentioned. Such statements, it is true, are very indefinite in their nature, and do not prove or tend to prove the items charged in any particular account. But after the correctness of the account sued on is otherwise proved, according to the requirements of the law, such general acknowledgments, if it be found that they were intended to apply to the account so proved, will be deemed sufficient to remove the bar of the statute; for the principle is now well settled, in this State at least, that where a debt is admitted to be due, the law raises by implication a promise to pay it; and it is therefore immaterial whether the promise be made in express terms, or be deduced from an acknowledgment as a legal implication; as, in either case, the effect is the removal of the bar of the statute, and the restoration of the remedy upon the original demand. Ellicott v. Nichols, 7 Gill, 96.

But when the new promise is sought to be deduced from a general indefinite acknowledgment, such as is relied on in this case, the question is one for the jury to determine, whether the acknowledgment of the debtor, within the period of limitation, applies to the original demand sued on or not. The jury must find to what debt or claim the admission or general acknowledgment referred; and if the plaintiff shows but a single indebtedness, it may apply to that; or if the demand sued for be an account of several items, it may apply to any part thereof, according to the evidence and the finding of the jury. And in such case, if the debtor alleges that there was a different account or demand to which the general acknowledgment referred, the onus of proving that fact rests upon him, as matter of defense. This is the settled doctrine in this State and. as it would appear from an approved text writer, is the settled doctrine in many of the other States of the Union. Guy v. Tams, 6 Gill, 82; Coates v. Sangston, 5 Md. 132; Peterson v. Ellicott, 9 Md. 63; Quynn v. Carroll, 10 Md. 208; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 441 and cases there cited.

2. As to the second question; that depends upon the construction of the prayers granted by the court. By the first prayer of the appellee the jury were instructed that if they found the account to be established by the proof before them, and further, that the testator of the appellants, within three years before suit brought, admitted that he was indebted to the appellee on account, then the appellee was entitled to recover the value of the work and labor, and goods and materials, which the jury might find the appellee had performed for and furnished to the said testator, in his lifetime.

This instruction, as it will be perceived, omitted to require the jury to find that the general acknowledgments testified to by the witnesses did in fact refer to the account sued on, and none other; and in this respect it would seem to be defective. Nor was the defect cured by the appellee's second prayer, which was also granted by the court. But, by the second prayer of the appellants, which was granted, the jury were fully and correctly instructed as to the whole inquiry before them. By that instruction, the jury were directed that although they might find that the appellee rendered the services, furnished the materials, and laid out and expended the money, for the appellants' testator in his lifetime, as testified to by the witnesses, still the appellee was not entitled to recover for the same, if they should find that such services were rendered, materials furnished, and money expended, more than three years before action brought, unless they should further find from the evidence an assumption or promise by the appellants' testator, within three years of the time of bringing the suit, to pay for the same.

*See note to this case. Lawyers' edition. [Ed.]

This instruction embraced the whole inquiry, and precluded the right to recover, except upon the condition that the admissions or general acknowledgments, stated in the evidence, were found to have been made within three years of the time of suit brought, and that they applied to the account for which the appellee had sued. And having obtained this instruction, the appellants were fully protected against the possible misleading effect of the appellee's prayers; and therefore they have no good ground of objection to the rulings of the court on the prayers, when those prayers are read together and taken as an entire instruction upon the questions presented.

The first prayer of the appellants, as settled by repeated decisions of this court since the Act of 1825, chap. 117, was entirely too general, and was therefore properly rejected by the court below. And, as we have already stated, the appellants' third prayer was properly rejected, because, if the general admissions or acknowledgments therein referred to were found by the jury, they were sufficient to remove the bar of the statute.

Finding no such error in the rulings of the court below as to require the reversal of the judgment appealed from, that judgment must be affirmed.

FOUR appeals in one record from the Circuit Court for Anne Arundel County, in equity. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Robinson, Stone, Bryan and Irving, JJ.

The nature of the cases and facts and questions raised appear from the opinion.

Messrs. James Mackubin and Frank H. Stockett, for appellants.

Messrs. James Revell, Michael Bannon and J. J. Alexander, for appellees.

Irving, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are four appeals in this record which will be disposed of in one opinion. They are so inseparably connected by the facts upon which each depends that we shall consider them together. The cases are singularly complicated by an unusual combination of circumstances; and the real questions presented for decision cannot be understood without a clear statement of the facts which have given rise to the controversies now before us for final adjudication.

By the will of Wm. Jenkins, who died in August, 1866, all his estate, real and personal, except a few pecuniary legacies, was devised to his wife, Anne Jenkins, for life, with remainder to his son, Daniel A. Jenkins, whom he left executor. Mrs. Anne Jenkins owned in her own right a tract of land called Griffith's lot, containing about 175 acres, which was devised to her by her father. The land of Wm. Jenkins which was devised to his wife Anne Jenkins for life, and then to his son Daniel A. Jenkins, contained about 160 acres, and is described by the names "Pinkstone's Fancy" and "Trusty Friend."

On the 10th of November, 1866, Anne Jenkins and her son, Daniel A. Jenkins, and wife, executed a mortgage to Nathan Pumphrey for $5,000, evidenced by their notes aggregating that sum, and all to be paid three years after date, with interest payable annually; and notes therefor for $300 for each of said three years were given and recited in the mortgage as thereby secured, as well as the principal sum of $5,000. The mortgage was upon Griffith's lot which belonged to Mrs. Jenkins absolutely, and also upon "Pinkstone's Fancy" and "Trusty Friend" which the mortgagors acquired by the will of William Jenkins. In the event of default in paying the principal sum when due on the promissory notes for the interest, the mortgagee "Pumphrey, his heirs, assigns etc.," were clothed with power "to sell the said mortgaged premises at public sale, at such time and place as he or they may think fit, agreeably to the provisions of article 64 of the Maryland Code of Public General Laws," "the purchase money to be paid in cash, having given at least twenty days public notice by advertisement in some newspaper published in Baltimore City, and such other notice as may be deemed necessary, of the time, place, manner and terms of sale; and in the event of a sale under the power hereby granted, the proceeds shall be applied to the payment of all claims of the said mortgagee, his representatives or assigns under this mortgage, whether the same have matured or not." Until default the mortgagors are to remain in possession and receive the rents and profits and pay taxes, including tax on the mortgage debt. This mortgage was duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded.

On the 11th day of March, 1867, Anne Jenkins and Daniel A. Jenkins executed a mortgage to Thomas Cottingham upon the same property included in Pumphrey's mortgage, to secure a note of Daniel A. Jenkins for $1,200, with interest from date, and dated same day as the mortgage. A power of sale in the event of default was also given to the mortgagee and there was a covenant to keep the property's improvements insured for the benefit and aditional security of the mortgage. This deed was also duly acknowledged and recorded, and an affidavit of consideration was appended to this and the Pumphrey mortgage.

On the 7th of May 1868, Daniel Jenkins and wife mortgaged the same property, which was conveyed by the previous mortgages, to Samuel S. Linthicum to secure $2,000 and interest thereon in one year from date, with like power of sale as in the former mortgages. This mortgage was duly executed and affidavit of consideration was duly made; but the mortgage does not appear to have been recorded until the 28th day of May; and in the meantime, on the 9th day of May, 1868, Daniel A. Jenkins and wife executed another mortgage upon the same property to Thomas Cottingham, Nathan Pumphrey, and Christian F. Rappanier to secure to each of those persons the sum of $1,000, with interest annually, two years from date; a note for $1,000 being executed to each of said persons and recited in the mortgage. In this mortgage the property is divided up into eight lots described by courses and distances, the number of acres included in each being mentioned. A like power of sale to that in the others was put into this; and the mortgage was duly executed and recorded on the 13th of May, 1868.

On the first day of August, 1868, another mortgage, and the last one involved in this suit, was executed by the same grantors as in the last two mortgages to Horatio G. Laurence, to secure $3,000 two years after date, with interest notes, four in number of $90 each, falling due in six, twelve, eighteen and twenty-four months after date. This mortgage not only included the property described in the first preceding mortgage to Thomas Cottingham, but also all the grantors' right to a farm called the "Chaney farm," and further described in the mortgage.

There was a power of sale in the event of default, and a covenant to keep buildings insured for mortgagor's further protection. This mortgage was also duly executed, with affidavit of consideration appended, and was recorded within two days after execution. Some time in 1867 Anne Jenkins, the widow of William Jenkins and life tenant of his real estate under his will, died intestate, leaving Daniel A. Jenkins, her son, and three grandsons, John T. Jenkins, William Jenkins and James Mordecai Jenkins, the children of a deceased son, her only heirs at law, so that on her death Daniel A. Jenkins became one half owner of "Griffith's lot," and his nephews above mentioned owned the other half, by descent from Anne Jenkins.

After all these mortgages had been executed it transpired that William Jenkins died indebted to one Hercules R. W. Andrews in a large sum of money, being the balance due upon a promissory note for $15,000, dated the first day of April, 1864, payable to the order of Jenkins & Williams three years after date, with legal interest from date, which was by the firm of Jenkins & Williams indorsed in the lifetime of William Jenkins to Hercules R. W. Andrews. On the 21st day of April, 1869, Andrews, by Thales A. Linthicum and J. I. Alexander, his solicitors, filed his bill in equity in the Circuit Court for Anne Arundel County, as a creditor of William Jenkins, against the heirs at law of William Jenkins, asking for sale of the real estate of William Jenkins for the payment of his debt, and that of any other creditor who would come in and contribute to the payment of the costs of suit, the personal estate being alleged to be exhausted.

This bill set out the several mortgages executed by D. A. Jenkins and his mother after the death of William Jenkins, and made the several mortgagees hereinbefore named parties defendant to his suit. The bill also averred the balance due on the note upon the 19th of August, 1868, to be $7,196.97 after deducting credits, with interest from that day. Upon the same day that the bill was filed Michael Bannon filed a written order in the case directing his name to be entered as solicitor for all the defendants except Daniel A. Jenkins and wife, which appearance was accordingly entered without subpena actually issuing for them. Subpena did go for D. A. Jenkins and wife and was returned summoned, and Judge Tuck afterwards appeared as their solicitor. Beyond the simple filing of his bill the complainant took no further proceeding in his suit by way of pressing the same.

On the second day of October, 1869, an agreement was filed in the cause by which it appeared that the complainant's claim was provided for satisfactorily to him and the suit was no longer to be continued. The agreement is dated the 19th day of August, 1869, and is signed by Thales A. Linthicum as solicitor for complainant and by Michael Bannon as solicitor for all the "defendants, including Daniel A. Jenkins and wife." That agreement recites in substance that whereas, the complainant Andrews had filed his bill against Daniel A. Jenkins, sole devisee of William Jenkins, the heirs at law of William Jenkins and the incumbrancers of the property, for the sale of the real estate of William Jenkins for the payment of complainant's claim against William Jenkins, for which the land of William Jenkins was liable to him in priority of the defendants' incumbrancers; that whereas, on the 22d day of June, 1869, Daniel A. Jenkins and wife, William A. Jenkins, John T. Jenkins and James Mordecai Jenkins had sold and conveyed to a certain Helena Hoover, wife of George W. Hoover, for the sum of $11,000, a part of the real estate of William Jenkins, deceased, and a part of the real estate of Anne Jenkins, deceased, devised to her by her father, and to which the grantors were entitled as her heirs at law, that for the purpose of paying the claim of said Andrews it was agreed:

1. That we and each of us shall and do hereby release and waive every and all of our liens and incumbrances and claims upon the parcels of said property hereinbefore mentioned as granted and conveyed to said Helena Hoover by the said Daniel A. Jenkins and others, to the intent and purpose and upon the express understanding and agreement that the purchase money to be paid by the said Helena Hoover for the lands so as aforesaid sold and conveyed to her shall, in the first place, be applied or secured to be applied to payment of the said debt of the complainant, and that the residue of said purchase money after the said claim of the complainant has been fully paid as aforesaid shall be paid to such one of us as shall hereafter be agreed upon by us, or in case of our failure to agrée as to the disposition of such surplus or residue then amongst those of us who are incumbrancers, according to our priorities by law.

2. It is further agreed that the terms upon which the said property was sold by the grantors in said deed to the —— Helena Hoover are hereby approved and ratified, namely: that so much of the purchase money therefor as shall be equal to the debt or claim of the complainant shall be secured to be paid to the said Daniel A. Jenkins and others, grantors in said deed by the sealed bill of the said George W. Hoover and Helena Hoover, and a mortgage on the property so conveyed to the said Helena Hoover, in which her husband shall unite for more effectually assuring the same within a term of six years from the delivery of the possession of said property to said Helena Hoover, interest thereon to be paid semi-annually, accounting from said day.

3. It is further agreed, however, that the said sealed bill and mortgage so to — made by the said Helena Hoover and George W. Hoover as aforesaid to the said Daniel A. Jenkins and others, grantors in said deed, shall be made directly to the said Hercules R. W. Andrews, instead of the said Daniel A. Jenkins and others as aforesaid, for the account of his claim appearing to be due as of this day, and costs amounting as per computation to the sum of $7,675.22, the said sum of money due said Andrews as aforesaid, and to be secured by said mortgage and sealed bill, to remain upon a credit of six years from the delivery of the possession of said property to the said Helena Hoover; which said date of the delivery of said possession is fixed as of the day of the date of this agreement, interest thereon to be paid to the said Hercules R. W. Andrews, or his assigns, semi-annually, accounting from said day.

The fourth clause provided for the insertion in the mortgage of a covenant to pay the debt and for a power of sale by the mortgagee, Andrews, in the event of default. The fifth clause of the agreement is as follows:

"And it is further agreed that so soon as the aforesaid mortgage shall have been made, executed and delivered unto the said Hercules R. W. Andrews and the residue of said purchase money over and above the amount so as aforesaid due to the said complainant shall have been paid or secured to be paid unto such one of us as shall be agreed upon as aforesaid, or shall have been paid to us according to our respective priorities as aforesaid, in case of our failure to agree upon one of us to receive the same, she, the said Helena Hoover, shall hold the said property free, clear and discharged of all claims, liens or incumbrances thereon, of us or any of us, or any person or persons claiming under us or any of us."

The sixth clause of the agreement provided that Andrews, upon having his claim secured by the mortgage and sealed bill provided for in the agreement, so that he should be secured in his claim against all other liens as before stated, thereby waived his claim against any other part of William Jenkins' real estate.

The seventh and last clause provided for the execution of any further instrument that might be necessary to carry into full effect the agreement thus made.

Upon the 5th of October, 1869, George W. Hoover and Helena Hoover, his wife, executed a mortgage to Hercules R. W. Andrews in pursuance of the agreement hereinbefore recited, in which the terms of said agreement were recited, and the execution of the mortgage stated to be in accordance with it. The mortgage was properly acknowledged, the affidavit of consideration by mortgagee, Andrews, was appended and was recorded on the 8th day of October.

The claim of the complainant, Andrews, in the equity suit mentioned, being thus secured, and he having agreed to waive claim on any other lands, on the 8th day of October, 1869, Daniel A. Jenkins, the executor of his father, William Jenkins, filed a petition in the equity suit instituted by Andrews, setting out that he was executor of his father, and that by an agreement filed in the cause the suit had been discontinued, and asking leave of the court to withdraw the cause of action, "for the purpose of obtaining reimbursement from other parties liable to him in respect thereof."

The prayer of the petitioner was assented to in writing, by Andrews' solicitor and the court passed an order for the surrender to the petitioner, Daniel A. Jenkins, "of the original promissory note upon which the suit was brought, upon leaving with the clerk a true copy thereof to be placed among the proceedings." Thereupon, the note was withdrawn and a statement and calculation thereon, showing the balance due on the 19th of August, 1868, was left in its stead.

On the same day that Hoover and wife executed the mortgage to Andrews for the amount of his claim against William Jenkins, they executed to Michael Bannon a mortgage for $3,324.78, payable in three years from date, with the interest payable annually. This mortgage, although executed on the day of its date before a justice, was not recorded until the 15th of August, 1871. The amount secured to Bannon by this mortgage was the precise balance of the purchase money of the land sold to Mrs. Hoover for $11,000, after deducting the Andrews claim.

The next thing to be mentioned in chronological order is that on the 13th of November, 1869, according to the docket entries in No. 107 of the chancery docket of the Circuit Court, for Anne Arundel County, Nathan Pumphrey filed his mortgage and a bond for the purpose of making sale under the power in his mortgage herein before set out; and on the 23d day of October, 1869, he advertised in The Baltimore American the sale of the property mentioned in his mortgage to be sold on the 15th of November, 1869.

The same docket entries show that a sale was reported the 16th of January, 1871, and an order nisi was passed the same day; that on the 14th of March, 1871, a certificate of the publication of the order nisi was filed, and that the sale was finally ratified on the 21st of April, 1871. All the papers in this case are said to be lost; but the proof in the cause shows that Pumphrey purchased at his own sale for $9,000, and afterwards sold and conveyed the property to Bannon for the sum of $9,000, this deed being dated the third day of November, 1873.

We now come to the judicial proceedings to which these transactions already recited gave rise, and in which the action of the circuit court was taken which has induced these appeals. On the 11th of December, 1884, Christian F. Rappanier filed his petition in No. 107 of the equity docket of Anne Arundel Circuit Court, alleging that Michael Bannon had instituted proceedings for the sale by Nathan Pumphrey, under the power of sale contained in his mortgage from Daniel A. Jenkins and wife, and that a sale was reported which was ratified on the 21st of April, 1871; that in the summer of 1882 these facts were disclosed to the petitioner by the docket entries, and he had never heard or known of any such proceedings before; that he had caused diligent search for the original papers, but they could not be found; that the most diligent search had disclosed only two mortgages from Jenkins and wife to Pumphrey, one dated November 10, 1866, in which Anne Jenkins unites, for $5,000; and the other to Nathan Pumphrey, Thomas Cottingham and the petitioner, dated the 9th of May, 1868, to secure to each of the mortgagees $1,000 each with interest thereon. It then charges that the land sold was that thereby mortgaged, less 125 acres previously sold to Mrs. Helena Hoover, wife of George W. Hoover "under an agreement filed in cause No. 60, equity, in this court, in which Hercules R. W. Andrews was complainant and Daniel A. Jenkins and S. Caroline Jenkins, Nathan Pumphrey and others were defendants; and that the said Nathan Pumphrey was himself the purchaser at his said sale, but that he has never accounted therefor," and that petitioner was "entitled to have him account for the same under the direction of the court and according to its usual practice."

The petition further averred that the full amount due the petitioner under the last mentioned mortgage was still due and unpaid, with interest on the same, except $20 paid on the first year's interest, and that, until about the first of November preceding, he did not know what it was Pumphrey sold, or to whom or at what price; and to rebut the influence of laches from lapse of time, he refers to his petition filed in cause No. 60 of same docket in the same court. The petition asked for an account, and for an order requiring Pumphrey to answer by a certain day. The court passed such an order, and Pumphrey answered. The answer admits the sale as charged in the petition, and avers that over twenty days' notice thereof was given by newspaper advertisement, extensively circulated hand bills in Anne Arundel, Howard and Baltimore Counties. He admits the purchase by himself of the property for $9,000. He admits that he had only the two mortgages mentioned, the first of which he avers on the day of sale amounted to $6,260; but he avers that between that mortgage and the other mortgage, there was a mortgage to Thomas Cottingham, which with interest on the day of sale amounted to $1,477, which two sums overdue taxes and expenses of sale, were paid out of the purchase money, and a small balance was applied to the overdue mortgage of respondent and Thomas Cottingham; the petitioner having agreed to take the Chaney farm situated in the fourth district of Anne Arundel County, in payment in full of his mortgage debt and interest, at the time of the Andrews settlement; in consideration of which agreement on his part the respondent with Cottingham and Linthicum agreed to waive their claims on the part sold to Mrs. Helena Hoover.

Respondent denies that he never accounted for the purchase money, but avers that he did do so, and subsequently sold the property to Michael Bannon for the same price as he gave. He denies that the petitioner is entitled to any part thereof, because he took the Chaney farm instead. He denies that petitioner did not know of the sale and to whom it was sold, averring that it was matter of public notoriety. He also pleads limitations to the petitioner's claim. General replication was filed.

Simultaneously with these proceedings in 107, the same petitioner filed a petition against Michael Bannon in No. 60. That petition, in substance, sets out the filing of the bill in the cause for the sale of William Jenkins' real estate in aid of the personalty for the payment of his debts; it sets out the several mortgages upon the real estate which came to the mortgagors from Wm. Jenkins by his will, and upon the real estate of Anne Jenkins in her own right; it avers the death of Anne Jenkins, and that upon her death intestate her real estate descended to Daniel A. Jenkins, her son, and her three grandsons parties to the bill; that is to say one half to Daniel A. Jenkins and the other half to the grandsons. It also avers that by the bill the sale of Anne Jenkins' land was also asked for as necessary to the full adjustment of the rights of all said parties; it also states the order for and appearance of Michael Bannon for all the defendants except Daniel A. Jenkins and wife, for whom the late Wm. H. Tuck appeared, and that no subpena was ever issued for petitioner or any of the mortgagees. It then charges that by the account filed in the cause on the second day of October, 1869, and signed by Michael Bannon for all the defendants, 125 acres of the land was to be sold to Mrs. Hoover, wife of George W. Hoover, for $11,000, out of which the complainant was to be paid in full by a first mortgage on the land sold, and the residue was to be paid in cash and applied to the payment of such of the parties interested as they might all agree upon, and in default of such agreement then according to their priorities by law.

The petition then alleges the delivery of the deed to Mrs. Helena Hoover in execution of the terms of the agreement, averring the deed in fact to have been executed on the 22d day of June, 1869, and held as an escrow to await the consummation of the agreement then pending; and that simultaneously with the delivery of the deed to Mrs. Hoover, she and her husband executed a mortgage to Andrews of said land, for $7,675.22, and one to Bannon for $3,324.78, the residue of the $11,000 purchase money; that the Andrews mortgage was recorded promptly, but Bannon's was not recorded until the 15th of August, 1871.

The petition then charges as follows: "That said $3,324.78 passed into the hands of the said Bannon, as a self constituted trustee in this case, on the 5th of October, 1869, to be applied as set forth in said paper filed of the second of that month; that it has never been so applied, but has been retained and used by him all the while for his own individual gain; that your petitioner never knew anything of this suit until the summer of 1882, or of the matters disclosed, except as will be hereinafter set forth; that he never authorized said Bannon nor anyone else, to appear thereto for him, or to enter into any agreement growing out of it, and especially that he never assented to or agreed or authorized any one else to assent to or agree for him to any application of the fund or any part thereof arising from said sale to Mrs. Hoover; that while willing to abide by said sale and the concession so made of the complainant's entire demand your petitioner claims and insists that the said sum of $3,324.78 with interest thereon from said 5th day of October, 1869, the time when it was so received by the said Bannon, be applied under the direction of the court to the payment of the several parties who may appear to be entitled thereto according to their respective legal priorities in equity, and to that end that said Bannon should be required to bring the same into this court forthwith to be so applied; that although your petitioner was informed in the summer of 1882 of this suit, he did not know until near the first of November of this year, that said sum of $3,324.78 had never been applied by said Bannon in fulfillment of the trusts on which he received it; and further to exclude any inference, from the lapse of time, of laches on the part of your petitioner in filing this his petition, further represents, that for the last twenty years or more said Bannon has been engaged in the business of a lawyer and real estate agent combined, and for several years before May, 1868, had charge of several similar business matters for your petitioner, and had then several in charge, and so possessed the entire trust and confidence of your petitioner that, at the instance of said Bannon about the first of May, 1868, your petitioner intrusted to him the sum of $1,000 for investment, upon his representation that it was to be a part of $3,000, whereof the remainder would be supplied by two others of $1,000 each and loaned to Daniel A. Jenkins upon his promissory note to each of them, further secured by a first mortgage on said unincumbered real estate belonging to said Jenkins situated in Anne Arundel County, near the residence of said Bannon, in the neighborhood of Jessup's Cut, containing more than 300 acres of land, and then worth $15,000; that your petitioner received from said Bannon the promissory note of said Jenkins for the $1,000, bearing interest payable annually, and was informed that the mortgage had been sent to Annapolis for record."

The petitioner then proceeds to charge that two years or more afterwards, not receiving his interest as it was due, he directed Bannon to foreclose, and was informed by him that the mortgaged property had been consumed by a claim upon a note for $15,000, which had come to light after the mortgage had been taken, being a note of the father of David A. Jenkins, (from whom David A. Jenkins had acquired the land), of which there was no record, and which could only be known to the holder of it; that he thus persuaded the petitioner that he was blameless, and he retained his confidence; but that his whole claim except $20 on the first year's interest was still due, and unpaid.

Subsequently, it is averred, circumstances transpired which aroused suspicion, and he caused investigation and learned of the sale by Pumphrey under the power in his mortgage, and his reputed sale, the loss or disappearance of the papers in the case from the court; that Daniel A. Jenkins had passed no administration account; that the Linthicum mortgage was entered of record as assigned to Bannon on the 11th of November, 1868, for full face value; that the mortgage debts to Cottingham, who was then dead, had been presumably satisfied, although no release was entered record; and that all of the mortgaged property had passed into the possession and apparent ownership of Bannon, but no record could be found of the conveyance thereof to him.

The petitioner further states that promptly upon such disclosure he sued Bannon for negligence and failure to exercise proper skill in the attention to the business intrusted to him, and was met with a plea of not guilty and limitations; that replication was made to the plea of limitations that he had fraudulently concealed from your petitioner his right of action until within three years before suit was entered, and that your petitioner could not by the exercise of the usual and ordinary diligence have sooner discovered it; that issue was joined, and trial finally procured before the court without the intervention of a jury, and resulted in a verdict for Bannon on the issue made on the plea of limitations, that the petitioner could have discovered the fraud by proper diligence, but the court expressed no opinion on the other questions involved.

The petitioner further charges that at the trial he first learned from the testimony of Bannon that the $3,324.78 had not been applied by him as required by the trusts under which he received the same, and that at the sale made by Nathan Pumphrey all the property save the property sold to Mrs. Hoover was sold; that Pumphrey was the purchaser, at $9,000, and that both Pumphrey and Cottingham had been satisfied, and that all the papers were lost or could not be found.

The petition then prays that Bannon might be required to bring the $3,324.78, into court with interest thereon "to be applied under the direction of this court, according to the terms of the said agreement, filed in this cause, and under which he received the same" and for such other relief as equity would allow. The petition asked that Bannon be required to answer. An order was passed so requiring him by a certain day.

On the 19th of January, 1885, Bannon answered in substance as follows: he admits the filing of Andrews' bill for the sale of the real estate of William Jenkins and his appearance for all the defendants, including petitioner Rappanier, except Jenkins and wife. He denies that authority was not given him by petitioner to appear for him but avers that he was fully authorized; he admits that no subpenas were issued for respondents; he admits Anne Jenkins' death in 1867, and the incumbering of the property by mortgages by her and her son Daniel in her lifetime, and by Daniel A. Jenkins after her death as alleged; he admits signing the agreement filed in the cause, as solicitor for all the defendants, and denies that petitioner gave him no authority to do so for him, but avers that he signed the same by his full authority and assent for him; he denies that petitioner was ignorant of the writ, the agreement and its provisions; he admits the sale to Mrs. Hoover of part of the land for $11,000, and that Andrews was to be paid in full from the purchase money, in priority of all others, and that the residue of the purchase money was to be applied to the payment of such parties as might be agreed on, or in case of no agreement then according to their priorities; he avers there was no cash payment made and that it was agreed between all parties that when the same was paid it should be applied to the payment of Horatio Laurence's mortgage for $3,000, and interest, and that petitioner was a party to that agreement and was fully aware thereof; he avers that Mrs. Hoover put securities in his hands for collection, and when collected to be applied to the Laurence mortgage, and as by the agreement she was bound to pay the Laurence mortgage out of the balance of purchase money, that she executed the mortgage to him for that balance, and avers that all these transactions were fully known and assented to by the petitioner; he denies that the sum of $3,324.78, ever passed into his hands as a self constituted trustee in this case and to be applied by him as set forth in the agreement, or that that sum or any sum has been retained by him for his own gain; he denies that petitioner intrusted $1,000 to him to loan to Jenkins as a part of $3,000, the other $2,000 to be furnished by other persons and the whole to be secured by a mortgage on unincumbered real estate; denies that he got the note from him, but avers he got it from Jenkins and fully knew Jenkins' responsibility and value of his lands; he denies that he was required to foreclose the mortgage securing this $1,000; he admits that he informed Rappanier of the $15,000 note of William Jenkins, but not when and as charged, but that he did so as soon as discovered and explained the whole thing to him; but denies that the information was imparted to persuade the petitioner that he, Bannon, was entirely blameless; he avers that petitioner knew then and knows now that he was blameless, and avers that it was not from additional knowledge which the defendant acquired that he changed his mind, for he had known all about it for years that he knows now; he denies that any circumstances transpired in 1882 to lead the petitioner to think there was anything wrong; and he denies that petitioner had never been paid more than $20 on his note, and denies that petitioner had been put off from time to time about his money, as he alleges, by the respondent; he admits the sale by Pumphrey under his mortgage and the purchase thereof by Pumphrey at $9,000; he admits the payment of Pumphrey and Cottingham from the proceeds of sale, and that the Linthicum mortgage has been assigned to the respondent, and that all the property has passed into the hands of respondent except the Andrews mortgage which was assigned by Andrews in his lifetime to Mrs. Bannon; he admits that the papers in the Pumphrey trust sale are lost or mislaid, and that respondent had caused diligent search for them without avail.

He cannot admit or deny whether petitioner caused a letter to be written to the respondent, but avers that no answer was ever sent, and that there was nothing for adjustment between the respondent and petitioner, except what was due the respondent for unpaid professional service rendered the petitioner.

He admits the suit at law by the petitioner against the respondent and its result, as charged by the petitioner; and he pleads that finding and result, and the judgment thereon, as a bar to the present claim of the petitioner.

He admits the sale by Pumphrey to him of the property he bought at his own sale for $9,000—and that respondent gave the same amount for it, and that it was applied to paying Pumphrey and Cottingham their prior mortgages and the residue on Pumphrey and Cottingham's other mortgage claim; he denies there are any moneys in his hands which he ought to bring into court. He also pleads the Statute of Limitations against the petitioner's demand, and prays that his petition may be dismissed.

To this answer a general replication was filed on the 30th of February, 1885. On the 4th of February, 1885, upon the application of Rappanier, stating that there was in fact but one matter of controversy involved in the petition filed in No. 60 and that filed in No. 107, and asking for their consolidation, the court passed an order consolidating them and directing that thereafter they proceed as one case. A mass of testimony was taken and the case finally came to a hearing, at which the respondent Bannon excepted to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the petition of Rappanier in No. 60.

The circuit court in an elaborate opinion decided that the petition of Rappanier should be dismissed; and that Pumphrey should be held to an account as to the proceeds of his sale under his mortgage; and accordingly so decreed, and referred the case to the auditor to state an account on the pleadings and proofs already before the court, or which might be produced before him. From so much of this order as dismissed Rappanier's petition in No. 60 he at once appealed, and we will dispose of the question raised on this appeal, before stating the grounds of the subsequent appeals which were taken after the decision of the court on the exceptions to the auditor's report made in the cause, pursuant to the court's order.

In the view we entertain, the petition of Rappanier was so clearly unmaintainable in the cause in which it was filed, for reasons other than those assigned by the circuit court, that we rest our decision in affirming the court's order dismissing the petition solely on the reasons now assigned.

The bill was filed by a creditor of William Jenkins, for the sale of his real estate in aid of the personalty, for the payment of the complainant's claim against him. It was a creditor's bill; and although it does not appear that he owed anybody else, it was filed for other creditors (if there were such) who would come in and contribute to the payment of the costs of the suit. The incumbrancers, who were made defendants, were not his creditors. They were creditors of Anne Jenkins and Daniel A. Jenkins, his devisees, who had mortgaged the land to them for their debts (and not the debt of William Jenkins) after William Jenkins' death. The bill was not filed to sell Anne Jenkins' real estate also, as stated in the petition. No such application is found in the bill; and the plaintiff had no right to claim a sale of her land. He had no possible claim on that, or the mortgages because of it. Had the case proceeded to a decree for the sale of William Jenkins' land, and it had been sold, the petitioner, as a mortgagee of the devisees thereof, and a defendant, might have had standing in court to see that the fund was not appropriated in prejudice of his rights. Beyond that he would seem to have no interest.

After the institution of the suit by Andrews, arrangements were made by the devisees of the land of William Jenkins, and other persons in interest, for the full extinguishment of his claim against William Jenkins. A part of the land of William Jenkins devised to Anne Jenkins and Daniel Jenkins, and a part of Anne Jenkins' land, inherited by Daniel Jenkins and his nephews from her, was by them sold and conveyed to Mrs. Helena Hoover for $11,000, and by agreement entirely satisfactory to Andrews his claim was secured by a first mortgage from Mrs. Hoover. This he accepted in full payment of his claim, and he waived his claim on all the residue of the land of William Jenkins.

There was an entire novation, and, as against William Jenkins' heirs at law and devisees, and the land of William Jenkins which had been bound for it, he no longer had any claim; and his suit, based on it, was at an end. He could no longer maintain it, and no decree could ever be obtained upon his bill of complaint. An agreement so settling was filed.

After the agreement was filed in the cause, and after the execution of the mortgage to the complainant therein, which the agreement provided for, Daniel A. Jenkins filed his petition setting forth the fact that the suit was instituted to secure the payment of the debt of William Jenkins to the complainant, and that by the agreement filed in the case the suit had been discontinued; and that he, executor of his father, the debtor, needed the note for the purpose of obtaining reimbursement from other parties in respect thereto, and asking to withdraw the cause of action the complainant had filed with his bill; and by order of court the same was delivered up to him. Thus, the executor of the debtor who was, as such, first liable for its payment, and one of the heirs at law, and defendants in the suit upon it, was allowed possession of the note because it had been paid.

The suit had thus come to an end fifteen years before Rappanier's petition was filed. He was not a creditor of William Jenkins so as to be entitled to come in as a complainant, at any time, and continue the issue. He does not profess to do that, however, but files a petition in it against Michael Bannon, who is not a party to the suit either as plaintiff or defendant; and who has not been appointed trustee in the cause by the court for any purpose; and who clearly has no court funds in his hands. It charges him to be a self constituted trustee of certain funds alleged to be in his hands. But the funds alleged to have passed into his hands are not the proceeds of any of William Jenkins' real estate sold by the court order, or over which it has acquired control. The agreement referred to, in the execution of which they have arisen, did not design them to be accounted for in court in that case. It was designed to put an end to that suit by paying the debt, which it was brought to recover.

The agreement provides, in express terms, that the balance of the purchase money, after paying Andrews, should be paid by her (Mrs. Hoover) to the person who should be agreed on to receive it, or to incumbrancers, according to priorities. To that extent, therefore, she would be regarded in the light of a trustee; but even she would not be answerable in this proceeding, if she had been made a party to it by Rappanier's petition, as she was not. It is averred that Bannon has received that money from her and that he is answerable, in this case, as a "self constituted trustee" of the funds. The fund arose in part from Anne Jenkins' real estate sold to Mrs. Hoover; such part of the same as represented her estate, could, certainly, under no theory be answerable for William Jenkins' debt, or be brought under the court's control in that case, for that purpose. It was therefore an application on the part of the petitioner to bring Michael Bannon to account, in equity, for alleged rights and demands which the petitioner had against him, for his misdoings in regard to certain trust moneys to the petitioner's injury, in a case where suit had been instituted, for an entirely different purpose, more than fifteen years before, and which had been ended for that period. It was certainly interjecting into that case a controversy entirely foreign to it, and sanctioned by no practice that has ever obtained the approval of this court. The cases relied upon and cited as recognizing the practice of entertaining interlocutory petitions in cases for the distribution of funds, or the sales of property, have no analogy to this case, and do not afford the slightest support to this application.

The case of Griffith v. Parks, 32 Md. 1, upon which the petitioner relies as supporting his right to intervene in this way, does not bear the slightest resemblance to the case under consideration. There the court had a fund before it for distribution, and all the parties interested in it were parties and before the court, and the court sustained an interlocutory application with reference to it. In this case there is no fund in court, or which was designed to be brought into court, for the purposes of that suit. But the effort is to get the court to bring a fund into the court, for distribution, in a case where the only creditor is paid and his suit ended. The fund has not arisen out of any action or order giving the court control over it. The court is asked to treat it as if proceeds of a sale ordered by it when the court could not have passed such order on that bill.

As to the merits of the petitioner's claim against Mr. Bannon, we are called on to express no opinion, in the view we take of the case. There can be no doubt that a man may so conduct himself with reference to property or money as to bind himself in equity as a trustee. Diffenderffer v. Winder, 3 Gill & J. 311, cited by the appellant, fully establishes that proposition; but because Bannon may have so conducted himself as to become answerable as a trustee (which we do not decide), it does not follow that he may be pursued, by the petitioner, in the method adopted, and in this case. It was certainly interjecting, into an ended case, something entirely foreign to its object and subject matter.

Assuming that the petitioner has good ground of complaint against the respondent, a new and independent proceeding was necessary; and it would be setting an unwarranted and pernicious precedent to sustain that petition. We find no occasion to consider the question raised by the defense of res judicata in the proceeding at law against Bannon. There was abundant justification for dismissing the petition in No. 60, and we fully approve the court's action in that regard.

Under the order of the court referring the case of Pumphrey to an auditor, and ordering an account between Pumphrey and the proceeds of the sale he made under his mortgage, the auditor took much testimony, and stated accounts upon it which came up for ratification; and the court on exceptions rejected all the accounts and ordered a new account in conformity with its views; which account being made the court overruled the exceptions thereto and ratified the same; and thereupon several appeals were taken to the order rejecting the first audits, and ordering a new one, and to the final order of ratification of the audit made in conformity with the court's last opinion and order.

Upon the proofs before him the auditor stated these accounts (a b and c) in all of which he allowed Pumphrey commissions for making the sale, expenses and cost of suit in No. 107 up to the ratification of the sale. Accounts a and b deduct a bonus of 4 per cent from all claimants, including Pumphrey. Account c deducts a bonus from no claimant but Rappanier, and allows certain taxes for 1868 and 1869, claimed to have been paid by Pumphrey.

Rappanier excepted to accounts a and b, 1, because Pumphrey is only charged simple interest to sale; whereas, it ought to have been brought to sale and compounded on annual rests; 2, because commissions and costs are allowed; 3, because Pumphrey's whole claim is allowed, whereas, the first two interest notes are not produced, and 4, because Cottingham's claim is allowed without production of the note.

Account c is excepted to: 1, because commissions, costs and expenses are allowed; 2, because taxes of 1868 without voucher have been allowed; 3, because taxes of 1869 without voucher therefor has been allowed; 4, because Pumphrey is not charged with usury, and the first two interest notes are not credited, and he is not charged with the cash payment from Hoover; 5, because Cottingham's claim is allowed and also because it is not charged with usury.

Pumphrey also excepted because Rappanier was allowed any part of the fund, and because he was not allowed for taxes he claimed to have paid. These audits allowed him commissions and costs, and he had no occasion then to except, as he did afterwards, to the final audit which allowed commissions, nor to the taxes for 1868 and 1869, which he claimed to have paid. He also excepted to the accounts which charged him with a bonus.

We agree so fully with the manner in which the circuit court dealt with the questions thus raised on the distribution of the fund in Pumphrey's hands, and to account for which he was so properly required, that we shall quote largely from the court's opinion, as strongly presenting our view of the case and upon which we cannot improve.

It is urged on the part of Pumphrey that the petitioner Rappanier has no claim at all as against the fund in court, because of what is spoken of in the testimony as his agreement to take the Chaney farm as consideration for and satisfaction of the mortgage debt which he is now seeking to have paid. In determining this question it will not be necessary to attempt to reconcile the conflict of evidence in regard thereto. The result will be the same whether we accept as true the testimony on the one side or the other. We will, therefore, deal only with the proof adduced by the respondent Pumphrey. According to this, an agreement was entered into between the petitioner Rappanier on the one side, and Daniel A. Jenkins, the mortgagor in the mortgage under which Pumphrey made the sale reported in No. 107, on the other, the effect of which was that Jenkins was to sell the farm spoken of as the Chaney farm to Rappanier, and that Rappanier was to purchase the same, and in consideration thereof was to give up and release the mortgage debt which he now claims to have paid out of this fund; that this agreement was reduced to writing, and signed by the parties, Rappanier and Jenkins; that this written agreement was passed into the possession of Rappanier (who does not produce it upon notice requiring him to do so, and who denies that it ever existed); that before this agreement was actually consummated by the transfer of the property purchased by the one party, and the release of the mortgages by the other, Rappanier refused to carry out the agreement; that Jenkins never executed any deed of the Chaney farm, nor tendered any deed of the same; but on the contrary, after this refusal by Rappanier, exercised the usual rights and assumed the usual obligations of the owner of property, paying the taxes thereon for the two years immediately succeeding the making of the agreement, and the refusal of performance by Rappanier; and later still making the effort to sell the farm to other parties, one of whom prosecuted his inquiries concerning the state of the title to the point of being informed that it was complicated by a claim of the petitioner (Rappanier) and to a refusal by Rappanier to enter into any negotiation in regard to it when he dropped the further pursuit of the matter.

Allowing the fullest effect to this proof, it shows an agreement between Rappanier and Jenkins, to which Pumphrey was in nowise a party; that the agreement was never consummated, but on the contrary there was a distinct refusal on the one side to perform it, and an apparent acquiescence on the other in its nonperformance; and that this had been the condition and relation of the parties to the agreement for over fifteen years. To give the agreement the effect that the respondent claims for it here in the distribution of this fund, the court would be virtually decreeing specific execution of an unperfected agreement, in favor of one who was no party to it, in the face of the denial of its existence, by one of the alleged contracting parties, and in the absence of any proof that the other of said contracting parties asserts any rights under it.

In this very strong answer to this allegation on the part of Pumphrey we may add it would not only be enforcing in effect a specific performance against Rappanier when Jenkins is not asking it, but when he says in his testimony he does not even remember making the contract. It has been so long he has forgotten it, if in fact it was made. It would therefore be in effect enforcing it in favor of one not a party to it, against the wishes of both the supposed parties to it.

But it is further insisted by Pumphrey that in consequence of his agreement to take the Chaney farm in satisfaction of his mortgage, he (Pumphrey) agreed to waive his lien against the land bought by Mrs. Hoover. He so testified. To this contention of exceptant Pumphrey, the court below gives a most conclusive answer:

"If it is meant that an agreement arose out of this by which Rappanier ought to be held bound to release his mortgage claim here in question, the respondent has, by his own proof, disentitled himself to claim the benefit of the agreement, because in order to do this he must show that his part of the agreement has been performed, or that he is willing and ready to perform it; but contrary to this the proof is that in making the sale from which the fund in court, and now in controversy, was produced, he sold the whole property covered by his mortgage, which embraced the part sold to Mrs. Hoover; and so there was a failure on his part to observe his own agreement as to a waiver of the lien." We may add that not only did he enforce it, but his proof shows that he enforced it because Rappanier had backed out. He accepted Rappanier's refusal, and acted accordingly in selling the whole property covered by his mortgage. It is manifest, therefore, that Rappanier cannot be excluded from sharing in the surplus, after payment of prior liens, as one of the mortgagees in the mortgage known as the "Pumphrey, Cottingham and Rappanier" mortgage. As the other objections of Pumphrey are again raised by his exceptions to the final audit in the case we will not discuss them now.

In respect to Rappanier's exceptions to the allowance of Pumphrey's mortgage from the fund, with interest to the day of sale, and the failure to deduct anything therefrom for usury, we think there was no error. The burden of proving usury is always on the party asserting it to have been charged. He must show by proof the amount of excessive interest or bonus which was taken, else the court cannot ascertain with certainty the amount actually due a claimant. Williams v. Banks, 11 Md. 235.

The burden being on the exceptant in this matter the preponderance of proof should be with him. He called Jenkins to prove that usury was taken in the inception of the transaction when the money was loaned. Jenkins does testify that 4 per cent was taken off and he gave his note at 6 per cent from date, for the whole $5,000. Pumphrey was recalled and legitimately and properly in rebuttal, and the objection to his testimony was properly overruled, and he expressly denies it; and then Bannon testifies that he was present at the loan and no bonus was deducted then. The preponderance therefore is with Pumphrey that it was not taken then, and Pumphrey says that it was not taken at all.

Jenkins' recollection of many things after such a lapse of years seems often imperfect and confused in his testimony and we think the court was right in not charging Pumphrey with usury. Jenkins said in his testimony he had no recollection of ever paying anything on the Pumphrey claim. The two interest notes which were not produced, and to the allowance of which exception was made, Pumphrey says he gave to his solicitor, who confirms this statement and says they were lost or mislaid. There was therefore no error in allowing them.

The proof showed conclusively that Pumphrey had paid the Cottingham mortgage for $1,200. He ought therefore to be substituted to Cottingham's rights; and the same was properly allowed, with interest to the day of sale. There was no admissible proof of usury in this claim. Jenkins was a party to the original contract, and Cottingham was dead; therefore Jenkins' testimony must be excluded, and the court was right in disregarding it. The bonus in Rappanier's claim was clearly established by the proof and was properly charged against him, and deducted from the principal in the start.

The circuit court was also clearly right in charging Pumphrey with interest to date in favor of Rappanier. By his own confession he had not paid Rappanier, but had used the money as his own. The fact that he regarded Rappanier as not entitled because of what he understood was his agreement to take the Chaney farm instead of his claim, and in payment of it, is no answer or excuse to his delay in rendering his account to the court as was his duty. He ought to have come to the court with the fund and asked its direction respecting it. Numerous authorities could be cited for charging a trustee with interest under such circumstances. It is the settled law of this State. Glenn v. Cockey, 16 Md. 446; Gwynn v. Dorsey, 4 Gill & J. 453, Brantley's ed. 312.

To the final audit, which was stated in conformity with the circuit court's second opinion and order thereon, Rappanier again excepted. Because Pumphrey and Cottingham's claims were not credited with the bonus he claimed they received, and because they were not credited with the money on the Hoover purchase which was applied to the Laurence claim under their agreement.

As to the contention about the bonus alleged to have been received on those claims respectively that has already been fully disposed of and needs no further notice. The question as to application of the surplus of the Hoover purchase money was raised by audit "A" of those stated by the auditor to meet the contentions of the parties respectively before him. The court rejected that with the others, and ordered a new audit, and in rejecting audit "A" assigned no reasons especially applicable to it; but we think it was properly rejected.

The dismissal of Rappanier's petition in No. 60 left the questions arising on that entirely out of the case made on the petition filed against Pumphrey. Pumphrey had nothing to do with the money arising on the Hoover purchase, and was not chargeable with it. The Cottingham claim and Pumphrey's in fact received no part of it. If there was a misapplication of the money arising on the Hoover land sale by anybody, it is not cognizable in this accounting, under the pleadings and proofs there.

In rejecting the audits first made, in all of which commissions were allowed to Pumphrey for making the sale, and in one of which, audit "C," certain taxes claimed to have been paid by Pumphrey for the years 1868 and 1869 were allowed, the court expressly directed the new audit not to include either commissions, or the taxes allowed in account "C," the final audit conformed to that order, and by it no commissions are allowed and the taxes are disallowed.

Pumphrey appealed from the order so directing, and from the order ratifying the audit finally disposing of the fund without such allowances. We think the reasons assigned by the court below for the disallowance of both commissions and the taxes claimed are sound. The burden of proof, says that court, is on the mortgagee to establish the propriety of the allowances he claims.

No vouchers were produced for the taxes claimed to have been paid for 1868. Jenkins (whose duty it was to pay the taxes, according to the express terms of the mortgage) testifies that he paid the taxes for that year, but produces no voucher. Mr. Bannon says he paid them, but produces no receipt. If both paid them the collector was twice paid, and one was erroneously collected. We do not know who paid them improperly if they were demanded twice, nor which was mistaken in recollection if only paid once. There was no preponderance of proof, and those taxes were properly disallowed. The taxes for 1869, claimed to have been paid by Mr. Bannon for Mr. Pumphrey, were properly refused allowance under the case of Wheeler v. Addison, 54 Md. 41.

Under the general law those taxes were not due when the sale was made, and would not become due until the first day of January following; and unless the property was sold clear of taxes for 1869, by express notification, the purchaser took subject to what afterwards fell due. That such notice was given we have no proof; and as there is no contention or proof of a local law making the taxes due at a different period, the general law must control, and the taxes for 1869 were properly excluded.

Appellant Pumphrey complains that he was not allowed commissions, but the court was clearly right in not allowing him any. When the court appoints a trustee provision is made in the decree for the allowance of such commissions as the court may think the trustee entitled to according to "the skill, attention and fidelity wherewith he appears to have discharged his trust." It is not a matter of absolute right, and the rules of court generally prescribe a scale of allowance. This deed contains the agreement between the parties, and there is no provision in it giving the mortgagee a right to be allowed commissions, nor any language which seems to leave that question with the court. If it had been the purpose of the contracting parties that the mortgagee should be paid the usual trustee's commissions in the discretion of the court, it was very easy to have so said, provided there is no evidence of any rule of the court by which such trustees are allowed commissions; and the court below expressly says that it is the practice of that court not to make any such allowance, in the absence of provision, express or implied, in the instrument.

As to the expenses which are allowed and to which allowance Rappanier excepted, there can be no doubt of the correctness of their allowance. The law requires publication of notice and all proceedings which are practiced in ordinary trustee sales under decree, and evidently contemplates the ordinary costs resulting therefrom. The deed in this instance provides for notice and by implication contemplates the payment of its costs. The ordinary costs attending the sale and its ratification in view of the law must have been in the contemplation of the parties; and uniform practice, as we understand it, throughout the State, allows such expenses, as unavoidable.

John and Mordecai Jenkins have appealed from the court's order dated July 31, 1886, and the audit filed on August 2, 1886, and ratified on the 7th of August, "because by said orders and audits the proceeds of the sale of their property are taken to pay others' debts." This appeal is the first intimation in the record that these appellants set up any claim adverse to the mortgagees of the property. They have filed no exceptions to the auditor's reports, so as to bring the matter to the attention of the court. The court has decided no point in the case adverse to any contention or claim set up by them; so that we have nothing before us really to review as to them; but in fact this sale was made under conveyance made by their grandmother in her lifetime; and they, with their uncle, only became entitled to the equity of redemption of it by descent from her afterwards. They could in any event only have been entitled to share in the surplus after paying the mortgage of Pumphrey and Cottingham executed by their grandmother, with D. A. Jenkins, in her lifetime, and what proportion the Anne Jenkins property bore to that of D. A. Jenkins might be very hard to determine; and certainly no suggestion was at any time made that the court below might consider the feasibility of such an inquiry in this proceeding. Besides, in the face of their having executed the deed to Mrs. Hoover, in apparent execution of the agreement signed by counsel on their behalf, and of their repudiation of which no hint has ever been given the court below, we cannot see the slightest ground for their appeal.

In the course of what we have said we have sufficiently indicated our opinion as to any exception to evidence which it was necessary to consider; and we need say nothing specially on that subject.

The result we reach in this opinion is that in each and every of the appeals in this record the decrees and orders of the circuit court should be affirmed. Rappanier should pay the costs of his appeal against Bannon, including the costs of the record first sent to this court; Pumphrey should pay the costs of his appeal, including the costs of the second record, which has been consolidated with the first. Rappanier must pay his own costs of his second appeal, exclusive of record; and John and Mordecai Jenkins should pay the costs of their appeals, exclusive of the record.

Affirmed.

William J. ADAMS, Appt
v.
Frank W. BEALL, an Infant, by His Next Friend, William Colton.

1. Where money is paid by a minor in consideration of being admitted as a partner in the business of an adult, and he does become and remain a partner for a given time, he cannot on voluntarily withdrawing from the partnership, recover back the money thus paid, unless he was induced to enter into the partnership by the fraudulent representations of the adult.
2. It seems that where the contract entered into by a minor is of a personal nature or relates to personal property, it may be avoided by him either before or after his majority.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court, in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover back money paid by an infant. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Irving, Bryan, Stone and Robinson, J. J.

The facts appear from the opinion.

At the trial the court, at the request of plaintiff, instructed the jury: 1, that if the money was paid in pursuance of trade the plaintiff was entitled to recover; and 2, that if the money was paid not for necessaries, but in pursuance of trade, and as a consideration of an agreement of partnership, and that the payment was not for the benefit of plaintiff, and the plaintiff had avoided the agreement of partnership, then he was entitled to recover.

Messrs. Albert Ritchie and Marshall & Hall, for appellant:

An infant may trade; his payments made in pursuance of trade are not absolutely void; an agreement of partnership by an infant is not void, it is only voidable; he may stand by it, or, when he becomes of age, disaffirm it.

Bush v. Linthicum, 59 Md. 344–349, 356; Dunton v. Brown, 31 Mich. 182; Kerr v. Bell, 44 Mo. 120; Osburn v. Farr, 42 Mich. 134; Penn v. Whitehead, 17 Gratt. 503; Wald's Pollock, Contracts, § 56.

An infant cannot disaffirm an executed contract of partnership, and recover back the advances which were the consideration to the other party.

Wald's Pollock, Cont. § 60; Ex parte Taylor, 8 De G. M. & G. 254; Bush v. Linthicum and Dunton v. Brown, supra; Armitage v. Widge, 36 Mich. 124–130.

If the infant has paid the money, and the contract is thus executed on his part, he cannot disaffirm the contract and recover his advances, after having enjoyed the benefits of the contract. His privilege is not to enable him to perpetrate a fraud; it is "to be used as a shield, and not as a sword."

Brawner v. Franklin, 4 Gill, 463, 471; Monumental Building Asso. v. Herman, 33 Md. 128, 133; Bush v. Linthicum, 59 Md. 356; 2 Kent, Com. § 240; Medbury v. *Watrous, 7 Hill, 110, 114 and authorities there cited; Holmes v. Blogg, 8 Taunt. 508; Bartholomew v. Finnemore, 17 Barb. 430; Locke v. Smith, 41 N. H. 346–353; Taft v. Pike, 14 Vt. 405; Kerr v. Bell, 44 Mo. 120–125; Roof v. Stafford, 7 Cow. 179–182; Womack v. Womack, 8 Texas, 397–417; Farr v. Sumner, 12 Vt. 28, 32.

If he could disaffirm and recover back, he cannot do so until after he becomes of age.

Bush v. Linthicum, Monumental Building Asso. v. Herman, Roof v. Stafford. Farr v. Sumner and Medbury v. Watrous, supra; Levering v. Heighe, 2 Md. Ch. 81–87–88.

His interest is not even subjected to his proportion of expenses, liabilities and losses.

While it is true that no personal liability could be enforced against the infant for the debts of the partnership, nor indeed under any executory contract, unless for necessaries, yet in case of a dissolution, equity would apply the entire assets of the firm to the payment of liabilities, and the infant would be entitled to only such of his proportion of any capital contributed by him as might remain.

Bush v. Linthicum, 59 Md. 356.

The infant partner is bound by the partnership accounts as between himself and his partners.

Wald's Pollock, Cont. § 56.

In the event of diminished capital, on dissolution, the infant is compelled to bear his proportion of the loss.

Moley v. Brine, 120 Mass. 324.

It is for the court to say whether any contract by an infant is to his prejudice or not, whether it is void or voidable.

Ridgeley v. Crandall, 4 Md. 435–441; Monumental Building Asso. v. Herman and Levering v. Heighe, supra.

The court determines that question by the character and subject matter of the contract, not by what may be the ultimate consequences of the contract.

Mr. William Colton, for appellee.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee while a minor paid to the appellant $2,900, as a consideration for being admitted as a partner in the appellant's business. The partnership continued for more than a year, and finding it unprofitable the appellee, without formally dissolving the partnership, withdrew from the business.

The question in the case is whether the appellee is entitled to recover of the appellant the money thus paid? His right to disaffirm the partnership contract and to avoid all liabilities under it, including the partnership debts, is not denied. Being an infant when the contract was made, this is a privilege to which, for his protection, he is entitled. But when he seeks to recover money paid for a consideration which he has enjoyed, or has had the benefit of, this presents quite another question. The $2,900, was paid to the appellant in consideration of being admitted as a partner in his business. He was admitted as a partner, and continued to be a member of the firm for at least a year. The business was not, it is true, a successful one; but this, in the absence of fraudulent representations on the part of the appellant, cannot affect the question. We are dealing with a contract between an infant and an adult, executed on both sides, and upon the faith of which money was paid by the infant for a consideration which he has enjoyed.

The privilege of infancy, says Lord Mansfield, in Zouch v. Parsons, 3 Burr. 1804, was intended as a shield or protection to the infant, and not to be used as the instrument of fraud and injustice to others; and to hold that an infant has the right not only to withdraw from a partnership at his own pleasure, and to subject the adult partner to the payment of all the partnership debts, but has the right also to recover money paid by him as a consideration for being admitted into the partnership would be, it seems to us, to extend the privilege beyond any just principles upon which it is founded.

So long ago as Brawner v. Franklin, 4 Gill, 463, it was held that where an infant advances money upon a contract, he cannot disaffirm the contract and recover the money advanced, if he has enjoyed the consideration for which the money was paid.

Holmes v. Blogg, 8 Taunt. 508, is to the same effect. There the infant paid a sum of money as his share of the consideration for a lease of premises in which he and his partner carried on the business of shoemaking. They occupied the premises from March until June, when the infant dissolved the partnership, and brought an action to recover back the money he had paid the lessor for his lease. Gibbs, C. J., said: "He may, it is true, avoid the lease; he may escape the burthen of the rent, and avoid the covenants, but that is all he can do. He cannot, by putting an end to the lease, recover back any consideration which he has paid for it; the law does not enable him to do that."

It is a mistake to suppose that the principle on which this case was decided was either overruled or even questioned in Corpe v. Overton, 10 Bing. 252. In the latter case, the plaintiff while an infant signed an agreement to enter into partnership with the defendant, and to pay him £1,000 for a share in the business; and to execute on the first day of January a partnership deed with the usual covenant. He also paid £100 as a deposit for the fulfillment of his part of the contract. The plaintiff afterwards disaffirmed the partnership contract, and never did in fact become a partner. The suit was brought to recover of the defendant the £100 paid by the infant as a deposit.

Tindal, C. J., said the case was distinguishable from Holmes v. Blogg; in that case the plaintiff and partner occupied the premises from March until June, and the money was paid for something available, that is, for three months' enjoyment of the premises. In the present case the plaintiff paid to Overton £100 for which he has not received the slightest consideration. The money was paid either with a view to a present or a future partnership. I understand it as having been paid with a view to a future partnership. Now the partnership was not to be entered into till January, 1833, and in the meanwhile the infant has derived no advantage whatever from the contract."

Bosanquet, J., "We are far from impeaching the judgment of the court in Holmes v. Blogg, as applicable to the facts of that case. * * * Here the infant has derived no benefit whatever from the contract, the consideration of which has wholly failed. * * * The £100 paid here was in the nature of a deposit; money paid on a deposit may generally be recovered back where the contract goes off, and here the contract was defeated before the infant derived any benefit from it."

Alderson and Gaselee, JJ., were of the same opinion.

The plaintiff was allowed to recover the deposit money paid by him while an infant, because the partnership contract was disaffirmed by Corpe before the time agreed upon for it to begin. As was said by Alderson, J., "Before the contract is performed, one of the parties revokes it, and remits the other to the same situation as if the contract had never been made."

The distinction between Holmes v. Blogg, and Corpe v. Overton is this: in the former the plaintiff was not allowed to recover the money paid by him while an infant, because it was paid on a consideration which he had in part enjoyed; while in the latter, the plaintiff was allowed to recover as upon an entire failure of consideration.

Passing then from these cases we come to Ex parte Taylor, 8 De G. M. & G. 254, which is a case directly in point. There an infant paid a premium on entering into a partnership, and before he came of age disaffirmed the contract, and upon the bankruptcy of the firm attempted to prove for the premium thus paid. Lord Justice Knight Bruce said "In my opinion a case of fraud has not been established. That being so, the matter remains one of a contract fairly made or as fairly made as a contract with an infant could be made—a contract upon which the infant acted during his minority and which during the minority has been in part performed on each side. In such a state of things I conceive that if the bankrupts had continued solvent, and an action had been brought against them by the minor, either before or after majority, for the purpose of recovering the money in question, or any part of it, there must have been either a nonsuit or a verdict against him."

Lord Justice Turner said: "It is clear that an infant cannot be absolutely bound by a contract entered into during his minority. He must have a right upon his attaining his majority to elect whether he will adopt the contract or not. It is, however, a different question whether, if an infant pays money on the footing of a contract, he can afterwards recover it back. If an infant buys an article which is not a necessary, he cannot be compelled to pay for it; but if he does pay for it during his minority, he cannot on attaining his majority recover the money back."

We have quoted at length from the preceding cases, because the question at issue is an important one, and comes before us for the first time for decision. And while fully recognizing the privilege which the law accords to minors in regard to contracts made during their minority, yet in a case like the present, where money is paid by a minor in consideration of being admitted as a partner in the business of the appellant, and he does become and remain a partner for a given time, he ought not to be allowed to recover back the money thus paid, unless he was induced to enter into the partnership by the fraudulent representations of the appellant.

Whether an infant can avoid a contract and sue thereon during his minority, or must wait until he arrives at age is a question about which the decisions are conflicting. To hold that he cannot disaffirm a voidable contract until he attains his majority would in many cases work the greatest injustice to an infant; and where the contract is of a personal nature, or relating to personal property, we see no good reason why such a contract may not be avoided either before or after his majority. Stafford v. Root, 9 Cow. 626; Shipman v. Horton, 17 Conn. 481; Willis v. Twambly, 13 Mass. 204.

The court having erred in granting the plaintiff's first and second prayers the judgment must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, and new trial awarded.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Carroll County, in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover for work done, materials furnished, etc. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Robinson, Stone and Bryan, JJ.

The facts appear from the opinion.

Exhibit No. 1 referred to in defendant's second prayer is as follows:

Office of Hoopes Stone, Cement & Paint Co.
Hollins and Paysons Streets, Baltimore, Md.
Baltimore, June 15, 1882.

Mr. C. F. Manning,

Dear Sir: Yours of the 13th to hand, with inclosed sketch. We will cover the walls with Hoopes Artificial Stone, at 12c per square foot and allow the openings. Our usual price is 12c without deducting the openings. We will warrant it to stand the weather and fire better than all natural sand stones. If you should build with the intention of coating with our stone, you must allow ¾ inch for our material —that is, if you want the sills to project one inch from the face of the wall, you must put them out 1¾ inches from bricks.

We would prefer the walls made as rough as possible. The rougher the brick and no pointing upon the outside suits our work, as we take the mortar out from the face of wall if we can.

By using cheap, hard bricks for face, you would save considerable. I inclose you full size drawing of sectional view of door frame; if there is any alterations you wish to make, mark them and return it; if not, keep it, as we have duplicate. Would be pleased to have your further orders.

Respt.,
Geo. Paist, Secy.

Plaintiff offered the following prayer:

1. If the jury believe that the defendant employed the plaintiff to cover the walls of its parsonage with its artificial stone, and if they find that the work was done as agreed, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case such sum of money as the jury shall find from the evidence the defendant was benefited, if any, by such work, with interest on such sum as they shall find, if any, at their discretion. Granted.

Defendant offered the following prayers:

1. The defendant prays the court to instruct the jury that, under the pleadings and all the evidence in the cause, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant. Rejected.

2. That if the jury shall find from the evidence that the plaintiff, by its officers, caused to be written the letter dated the 15th of June, 1882, marked Exhibit No. 1, offered in evidence in this cause, and sent the same to C. F. Manning, the agent of the defendant, if the jury so find, and that the defendant, through its said agent, received said letter and accepted the terms contained therein, and shall further find that the work mentioned in said letter and in the testimony in this cause has not been performed in accordance with the terms of the contract between the plaintiff and defendant for the doing of said work, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this cause, and the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant. Modified.

3. That if the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff and defendant, on or about the 15th day of June, 1882, agreed that the plaintiff should cover the walls of the parsonage, to be built at Hagerstown by the defendant, with a gray stone veneering, at the rate of 12 cents per square foot, and that all the openings in the walls of said parsonage should be deducted; and shall further find that the plaintiff so performed said work of putting on said veneering; that after the same was placed upon said parsonage building, the defendant's officers refused to accept the same; and shall further find that the plaintiff did not put said veneering on said building as it had contracted to do the same; and shall further find that the secretary of the plaintiff stated to the officers of the defendant that the work had not been performed in compliance with the contract for the same, and that the said secretary did not consider that the plaintiff was entitled to be paid for the same, then the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant. Modified.

4. That if the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff contracted with the defendant to cover the parsonage, to be built at Hagerstown by defendant, with gray stone veneering; and shall further find that plaintiff furnished defendant with a sample stone of the color which said veneering would be when put upon said parsonage building to be erected; and shall further find that said sample stone has been shown in evidence to the jury; and shall further find that said veneering, when placed upon said parsonage building was not of the color of said sample stone, and was streaked and spotted; if they so find, and shall further find that the defendant has not accepted, but has refused to pay for the same, then the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant. Rejected.

The court granted the plaintiff's first prayer and rejected the defendant's first and fourth prayers and modified defendant's second prayer by inserting in place of the words italicized therein the following:

"And that said contract has not been executed and completed by the plaintiff, that under the pleadings in this cause, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover."

The court also modified defendant's third prayer by striking out the words in italics and inserting in place thereof the following: "And that the defendant received no benefit from said work."

Defendant's second and third prayers as modified were granted.

Messrs. William L. Seabrook and Charles B. Roberts, for appellant:

The appellee ought to have been required to bring its suit on the special contract, and not on the common counts in assumpsit.

Stirling v. Garritee, 18 Md. 474–5.

The appellant's fourth prayer was erroneously rejected. The settled rule in Maryland is that where there is a special contract, the plaintiff cannot recover under the common count for work and labor, unless the work under the contract was fully performed by the plaintiff and accepted by the defendant, or the contract was abandoned by mutual consent, or the fulfillment of it prevented by some act of the defendant.

Denmead v. Coburn, 15 Md. 29; Jenkins v. Long, 8 Md. 138.

So long as there is a special agreement, not violated by the defendant, or rescinded or abandoned by consent of the parties after a partial performance by the plaintiff, and he seeks to recover for such partial performance, the recovery must be had exclusively upon the special contract.

Jenkins v. Long, 8 Md. 133.

Messrs. J. A. C. Bond and Randolph Barton, for appellee:

Admitting the special contract, yet if the same was completed and closed, and nothing remained to be done but the payment of the money thereon, it was competent for appellee either to declare specially on the contract or to maintain general assumpsit.

Ridgeley v. Crandall, 4 Md. 441; Jenkins v. Long, 8 Md. 143; Appleman v. Michael, 43 Md. 282; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 136 and notes; 2 Smith, L. Cas. 14, 15; 1 Poe, Pl. & Pr. p. 56.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Hoopes Artificial Stone, Cement & Paint Company made a contract with the Presbyterian Church at Hagerstown by which it agreed to cover the walls of the latter's parsonage with artificial stone. The evidence tended to show that some of the terms of the contract were verbal, and that others were contained in written correspondence between the parties. This suit was brought by the Hoopes Company to recover an amount alleged to be due for the work done on the parsonage. There was evidence that it was agreed that the walls were to be covered with artificial stone of a gray color, which was warranted to endure exposure to the weather and not to peel off; and also that the work was imperfectly done and not in the manner required by the contract; and especially that the stone covering was streaked, speckled, spotted and of a variegated and unsightly appearance. It was the function of the jury to pass upon the weight and value of this testimony; and it is our duty to state the propositions of law applicable to it.

If the plaintiff completed the work according to the terms of the agreement, it was entitled to recover the contract price. If, however, it was done imperfectly or in any manner variant from the stipulations of the contract, and was accepted by the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to recover what it was reasonably worth. There can be no question on this point since the decision of this court in Watchman v. Crook, 5 Gill & J. 239.

We take the principle to be that a person entering into a contract has a right to insist on the performance of it in all particulars, according to its meaning and spirit, but that if he chooses to waive any of the terms introduced for his own benefit he has the power to do so. If he contracts for an article of a particular quality or style of workmanship, and he elects to accept in lieu of it one of another kind, he discharges the other party from the obligation of furnishing an article which complies with the specifications of the contract, and he becomes bound by a new implied contract to pay for the article which he has accepted what it is reasonably worth. And so where there is a contract for work of a particular description, and he accepts work of another kind. But he is not obliged to accept anything else in place of that which he has contracted for; and if he does not waive his right the other party to the contract cannot recover against him without performing all the stipulations on his part.

The question then in the present case, supposing that the work has not been done according to the contract, is whether the defendant has accepted it. The law on the subject of accepting work done on land' or property of another has sometimes been declared with great severity against parties doing such work in a manner not conformable to the contracts which they have made. But these harsh judgments go beyond the requirements of justice, and are much modified by the benign and equitable construction of contracts which prevails in this State.

It is true that when work is done on a man's house it is in a measure fastened upon him and he cannot very conveniently relieve himself from it, even if it is not such as he has contracted for and as he desires to have. If it is covered with a roof, for instance, it may be different in its style and workmanship and materials from that which his contract required, and he may have a right to reject it and demand its removal. But if he permits it to remain and enjoys the benefit of it, such as it is, he is certainly appropriating the labor and property of another man and of right ought to make compensation.

There is, however, a peculiar feature in this case; the evidence shows that the contract required the artificial stone covering to be of a gray color, it being the object to have the defendant's parsonage and the church of the same color and appearance. Now if the color of the coating is of the unsightly character described in the evidence, the purpose of the defendant in contracting for it is entirely defeated; and it cannot be considered as appropriating the labor and materials of the other party because something has been placed on its building which it does not wish to have there and which in no respect whatever fulfills any of its purposes or bestows any comfort or gratification on it. On the supposition which we have made no acceptance of the work could be implied in law; and all the evidence goes to show that acceptance was refused in point of fact.

It will be seen that we think that on the facts stated in the plaintiff's first prayer it was entitled to recover the contract price, and that the defendant's fourth prayer ought to have been granted. The defendant's first prayer was properly rejected. It was objectionable on account of its generality; but apart from this objection it was erroneous. An action could be maintained on the common counts by the plaintiff if it had entirely performed its part of the contract and nothing remained to be done to entitle it to the payment of the contract price; and also it might be maintained if the work, although imperfectly performed, had been accepted by the defendant. This prayer would have improperly withdrawn these questions from the jury.

The defendant sustained no injury by the modification of its second and third prayers by the court. They ought not to have been granted in the form in which they were presented. The second prayer makes no reference to the question of acceptance of the work by the defendant, which we have seen would have made it liable to a recovery, even although the work had been done in a manner variant from the contract. The third prayer does not mention in terms the alleged failure to conform to the contract color of the stone covering, which is the vital fact in repelling the inference of acceptance and might probably have misled the jury. The statement attributed to the plaintiff's secretary ought not to have been inserted in the prayer. There is no evidence in the record to show that the plaintiff was bound by his opinions or judgments. Even if the statement might be regarded as surplusage, it was well calculated to mislead the jury.

For error in the rejection of the defendant's fourth prayer, the judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered.

1. In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit it is not necessary in order to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict that he should give affirmative proof that he has sustained any particular amount of damages. Every unauthorized entry upon the land of another is a trespass; and whether the owner suffer substantial injury or not, he at least sustains a legal injury, which entitles him to a verdict for some damages, although they may be only nominal.

CROSS appeals from judgments of the Baltimore City Court, in favor of plaintiffs in actions for trespass on land by a railroad company. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Irving, Stone and Bryan, JJ.

Three actions of trespass quare clausum fregit brought by Robert E. Boyd and others, heirs of Clarissa Boyd, against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. The first action was brought June 5, 1883, the second November 14, 1883, and the third June 3, 1885.

The declaration in the first suit avers that "The defendant, on various days and times, and frequently, within three years next before the institution of this suit, broke and entered a certain close of the plaintiffs, situated within the City of Baltimore, and ran and drove large cars, drawn by locomotives upon and over the same close against the will of the plaintiffs and to their great damage."

The second declaration avers like acts of the defendant, subsequent to the bringing of the first suit, up to the institution of the second.

The third declaration avers like acts, subsequent to the second suit, up to the date of the third.

On a former appeal in the first action, in which a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiffs was reversed and a new trial granted (see 63 Md. 325) the facts were stated by the court as follows:

In February, 1851, Mrs. Clarissa Boyd became the owner in fee of a long narrow lot of ground in the City of Baltimore, fronting about eighteen feet on the southwest side of Fort Avenue and running back about 1,200 feet to the water. Mrs. Boyd died in May, 1871, intestate, leaving her husband surviving her, who consequently became entitled to a life estate in this lot. The husband died in July, 1881, and this suit was brought by the four children and heirs at law of Mrs. Boyd.

On the 17th of July, 1869, the Mayor and City Council of Baltimore passed an ordinance providing for the condemnation and opening of certain streets between Fort Avenue and the water, and the line of condemnation crossed this Boyd lot. The ordinance recites that application for its passage was made by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad; and one of its conditions was that it was to be inoperative, unless and until the said Company shall enter into an agreement with the city to pay all damages that may be awarded to owners of property, over and above the benefits assessed. On the same day another ordinance was passed, by which the city granted permission to the Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad from its Locust Point line, along the beds of the streets so to be condemned and opened, so as to make a connection by water with the Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore Railroad. Proceedings for condemnation were duly had under the first of the above ordinances; and in June, 1871, the Company duly paid to the city collector the excess of damages, over benefits awarded, amounting to $6,611.98.

In 1872 and 1873 the Company constructed its branch road, with two tracks in the beds of these streets, and in 1877 laid the third track. Since their construction these tracks have been used by the Company as part of its main line, and at least a dozen trains pass over them daily. The plaintiffs' lot lies in an open meadow, without buildings or inclosures; and but for the construction of the railroad across it, it is in the same condition now as at the time of the condemnation. The tracks of the road are laid at the grade of the street, but the street is graded only to the width of the tracks, about thirty-six feet, so that the space occupied by the road, as it passes through this lot, is eighteen feet and one inch by thirty-six feet.

Under the said condemnation proceedings the sum of $110 was assessed as damages for that portion of the plaintiffs' lot taken for the bed of this street and $1 each as benefits to the portions on either side of the street. The balance of $108 damages was included in the amount paid by the Railroad Company to the city, but the city never paid or tendered the same to the owners of the lot; nor was it invested in city stock, as provided by the Act of 1878, chap. 143, until December 14, 1883, after the commencement of the second suit.

Immediately after the filing of the opinion in 63 Md., reversing the judgment and ordering a new trial in the first action the Railroad Company proceeded to condemn the land of the plaintiffs, occupied by its tracks, and damages thereunder were assessed at $350, which was at once paid.

After the decision of the court in the first action the three actions were tried together and separate verdicts were obtained for $1,306.32, $312.62 and $1,081.06, respectively. Motions for new trials were overruled, and appeals were taken by the defendant. The plaintiffs also took an appeal from the judgment of $316.62 in their favor.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Messrs. John K. Cowen, W. Irvine Cross and Hugh L. Bond, Jr., for Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co.:

This court decided on the former appeal that these were not cases for punitive damages.

63 Md. 336.

Without proof of substantial damage, no more than nominal damages can be recovered. This proposition is necessarily implied in the rule that "Every violation of a right imports some damage."

Wood's Mayne, Damages, §§ 5, 6; Lewin v. Simpson, 38 Md. 468; Little Rock etc. R. R. Co. v. Dyer, 35 Ark. 360; S. C. 10 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 33; Rusch v. Milwaukee etc. Co. 54 Wis. 136.

Even though the trespasses proved might be presumed to cause substantial damage to the freehold, yet the onus is upon the plaintiff to prove facts from which the jury may estimate the amount of damage; and in the absence of such proof only nominal damages can be given.

The refusal of the trial judge to confine the remarks of counsel within their proper bounds was prejudicial to the defendant, and is ground for reversal.

Scripps v. Reilly, 35 Mich. 371; 24 Am. Rep. 575; Union Cent. Life Ins. Co. v. Cheever, 36 Ohio, 201; 38 Am. Rep. 573; Cleveland Paper Co. v. Banks, 15 Neb. 20; 48 Am. Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte, for Robert E. Boyd et al.:

Unless it appears that the defendant has been damnified by the court's action no error, however gross, will justify a reversal.

Conser v. Snowden, 54 Md. 176, 186.

On the former appeal the defendant was held by this court to have acted under an honest mistake as to the law (63 Md. 336) in using the plaintiffs' land, independently of the consideration that even in a criminal prosecution, where mens rea is always indispensable, ignorance of the law is no excuse to its violator; Grumbine v. State, 60 Md. 355; and that "The defendant upon which corporate franchises had been conferred * * * could not well claim to be excused for hasty and illegal conduct."

Baltimore and Yorktown Turnpike Co. v. Boone, 45 Md. 344.

There is sufficient evidence in this record for the jury to find that no mistake of law was in fact committed, but that the Company took its action knowing it to be illegal.

Oursler v. Balt. & O. R. R. Co. 60 Md. 37.

There is no doubt that express malice may be imputed to a corporation.

Carter v. Howe Machine Co. 51 Md. 290; Cooke v. Cooke, 43 Md. 532, 533.

The plaintiffs' rights as land owners had been repeatedly invaded under a pretended claim of adverse title, which turned out to be wholly untenable. This, of itself, was an injury to their rights, rendering them less valuable.

Parker v. Griswold, 17 Conn. 288, 303, 304, 307.

Plaintiffs suffered considerable annoyance and anxiety of mind from the defendant's persistency in impugning their title; and, indeed, such sentiments on their part might have been fairly presumed, even had there been no direct proof.

Phila. W. & Balt. R. R. Co. v. Rice, 64 Md. 63; 1 Gill, 497; Chicago etc. R. R. Co. v. Flagg, 43 Ill. 364; Owings v. Ulory, 3 A. K. Marsh. 454.

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record now before us contains four appeals, three by the defendant from three several judgments against it, and one by the plaintiffs from one of those judgments.

There were three several actions of trespass quare clausum fregit brought by the plaintiffs below against the defendant, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company; and by agreement, the three actions were tried together, but a separate verdict was rendered in each case, and consequently separate judgments were entered.

The first of these cases was here on a former appeal, and is reported in 63 Md. 325. The facts of that case are substantially the facts of all the present cases, so far as the main question on these appeals is concerned; the only material difference being that the last two cases were brought to cover two successive periods of time. The locus in quo in all three of these actions is the same as that described in 63 Md. 330; and the circumstances of the entry upon and user thereof by the defendant are there fully stated. In that case the court having determined that as the defendant's entry upon and user of that portion of the lot of vacant and unimproved ground in the City of Baltimore belonging to the plaintiffs, occupied as a bed for the tracks of its railroad, was unauthorized and therefore a wrong, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover therefor. But in view of the facts then disclosed, this court held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover exemplary damages, there being no element of fraud or malice, or evil intent, on the part of the defendant, in entering upon and using the ground as it did.

In the trial of the present cases the main subject of contest was as to the proper measure of damages to be awarded to the plaintiffs. At the request of the plaintiffs, the court granted three prayers as instructions to the jury, as to what damages should be allowed; and at the instance of the defendant two other prayers were granted upon the same subject; but the first prayer offered by the defendant was refused by the court.

The plaintiffs excepted to the instructions given on the request of the defendant, and the latter excepted to the instructions given at the instance of the plaintiffs, and also to the refusal to grant its first prayer.

The rulings upon the prayers are the subjects of the third bill of exceptions taken by the defendant, and of the second bill of exceptions taken by the plaintiffs.

By the first of the instructions for the plaintiffs, the jury were directed that, upon finding the facts enumerated, their verdict in the first case should be for the plaintiffs, "with such damages as would, in the judgment of the jury, amount to a fair compensation for the said unauthorized use of the said tracks." And as applicable to the second and third cases, the jury were directed that in finding for the plaintiffs, their verdict should be for such an amount as would, "in their judgment, fully compensate the plaintiffs for such continued and unauthorized use of the said tracks, between the dates named, against the wishes of the plaintiffs, and under all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence."

By the first of the defendant's prayers, which was refused, the court was asked to instruct the jury that there was no evidence legally sufficient, from which they could find that there was any substantial damage or injury done to the locus in quo, by the acts of the defendant, and therefore the verdict should be for nominal damages only.

The court, however, while refusing to require the jury to find their verdict for nominal damages merely, did instruct them, by granting the second prayer of the defendant, that if they found from the evidence that no substantial damage or injury was done to the plaintiffs' lot of ground, by any act or user thereof by the defendant, the verdict should be for nominal damages only. We do not understand that there is any question made as to the propriety of granting the defendant's third prayer by the court.

It clearly appears that since the death of Philip D. Boyd, in 1881, who held a life estate in the premises, the defendant in these cases has been, down to a very recent date, a tort feasor, in the use and continual occupancy of the locus in quo, as against the heirs at law of Mrs. Clarissa Boyd, deceased, those heirs being plaintiffs in the present actions.

It is true, the original entry into, and the construction and use of railroad tracks over, the locus in quo, were all supposed to be authorized by virtue of certain condemnation proceedings had under certain city ordinances for opening of streets, but which proceedings proved to be defective and insufficient to secure to the defendant the right of way over the lot of ground in question. The defendant, therefore, was not a willful wrong doer. This was determined by this court in the case reported in 63 Md. 325.

The lot of ground belonging to plaintiffs was, and still remains, uninclosed, and without any improvement thereon whatever, apart from the railroad tracks placed there by the defendant. The space occupied by the road, in passing through this lot, was very small, being only about eighteen by thirty-six feet. The defendant, since the decision of this case on the former appeal, has procured condemnation of the right of way for its road through the lot, and the inquisition has been confirmed; but the present actions were brought for the repeated trespasses on the lot from the time of the death of Philip D. Boyd to the time of the taking of the recent inquisition by the defendant.

That the entry upon and use of the land although under color of right, and although the ground was uninclosed and vacant, was unlawful and therefore a trespass, admits of no question or dispute; and consequently, for such invasion of their rights the plaintiffs are entitled to recover some damages of the defendant. It is not necessary, in order to entitle the plaintiffs to a verdict, that they should have given affirmative proof that they had sustained any particular amount of damages; for every unauthorized entry upon the land of another is a trespass; and whether the owner suffer substantial injury or not, he at least sustains a legal injury which entitles him to a verdict for some damages, although they may, under some circumstances, be so small as to be merely nominal. Ashby v. White, 2 L. Raym. 955; Mellor v. Spateman, 1 Saund. note 2, p. 207, a; Taylor v. Henniker, 12 Ad. & El. 448; Dixon v. Clow, 24 Wend. 188.

The present cases, however, we think, are not cases for nominal damages merely; for although there is an entire absence of any such element of wanton or malicious motives, or such reckless disregard of the rights of others, in the commission of the trespass, and the repetition thereof, as would entitle the plaintiffs to claim punitive or exemplary damages, yet the strip of ground belonging to the plaintiffs has been continuously and beneficially occupied by the defendant, as the bed of its railroad tracks, since the death of Philip D. Boyd to the time of bringing the last suit; and for such use of the land a reasonable, but a substantial, compensation ought to be paid.

It is true, there is no evidence whatever of any special damages sustained, or that the plaintiffs were hindered or obstructed in any proposed use of their lot, by reason of the presence and use of the railroad tracks; but, nevertheless, we are of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to a reasonable compensation for the use of their land, and we think this is measured by what would be a fair rental value for the ground, occupied as it has been, for the time covered by the actions, and nothing more. In such cases as the present, where there is nothing to show that any special damage has been suffered, the principle seems to be established by many respectable authorities, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover such compensation as the use of the ground was worth, during the time and for the purpose it was occupied. It has been so held in several cases, and we need only refer to Mc Williams v. Morgan, 75 Ill. 473; Chicago v. Huenerbein, 85 Ill. 594; Ward v. Warner, 8 Mich. 508.

And although the facts are somewhat different, the same principle of compensation was adopted in the cases of Blesch v. Chicago etc. R. Co. 43 Wis. 183; Carl v. Sheboygan etc. R. Co. 46 Wis. 625.

Such, then, being the proper rule of damages in these cases, the instructions, given at the request of the plaintiffs, were not sufficiently definite, and were well calculated to mislead the jury. They were certainly susceptible of a construction that would permit the jury to transcend the fair rental value of the piece of ground, occupied by the defendant, as the measure of compensation to be allowed; and that such was the understanding or interpretation of these instructions by the plaintiffs' counsel is made manifest by the arguments and illustrations urged by him while addressing the jury, as reported and set out in the defendant's fourth and fifth bills of exception. We are, therefore, of opinion that there was error in granting these instructions in the terms therein employed, and that there was also error in granting the second prayer of the defendant, but no error in refusing the first, or in granting the third, of the defendant's prayers.

In the view we have stated of the measure of recovery in these cases, the questions of evidence raised by the first and second bills of exception taken by the defendant become quite immaterial; and it is unnecessary to express any opinion in regard to them.

With respect to the fourth and fifth exceptions taken by the defendant, they present a question of practice as to the right and duty of the trial judge to interpose to restrain counsel, who is alleged to be indulging in argument and illustrations before the jury, unwarranted by the instructions of the court, and which will, if unrestrained, likely mislead the jury in the finding of their verdict. This is a matter that must, in the nature of things, rest largely in the discretion of the trial court.

It is, however, proper for us to say that no duty incumbent upon the judge of a trial court is more imperative, or more important to the fair and orderly administration of justice, than that of interposing to restrain everything in the course of the trial that tends to mislead the jury and to divert their minds from the strict line of inquiry with which they are charged.

It is the function and duty of the court, when called upon in the trial of civil cases, by either of the parties, to instruct the jury as to the principles of law applicable to the case on trial; and it is the duty of the jury to observe and conform to such instruction. Counsel can never be permitted to argue to the jury against the instruction of the court, or to indulge in any line of argument or comment that would tend to induce them to disregard the instructions given for their government. This is a matter that is always within the control of the court. Sowerwein v. Jones, 7 Gill & J. 335; Bell v. State, 57 Md. 120.

When, however, the instructions given are ambiguous, or susceptible of different interpretations, and the attention of the court is called thereto, no matter at what stage of the trial, if before the jury have acted thereon, it at once becomes the duty of the court to remove the ambiguity, and to make the meaning of the court plain.

Here, as we have shown, the instructions were indefinite, and were, to some extent at least, open to the construction that was being placed thereon by the counsel of the plaintiffs when he was interrupted by the adverse counsel, and the court's attention called to what he was contending for before the jury, as set forth in the fifth exception. The counsel was not restricted in his contention by any affirmative action of the court; and we infer, from such nonaction, that the counsel, in urging the allowance of a large and discretionary amount of damages, was, in the opinion of the court, conforming his contention to the instructions given the jury. We have said that the instructions were erroneously granted; and whether or not they were rightly construed in argument before the jury is a question quite immaterial to be decided for the retrial of the cases.

There were two bills of exception taken by the plaintiffs. The first was taken to the refusal by the court to admit as evidence, to prove malice on the part of the defendant, certain declarations or statements made by counsel on a former occasion, in the course of a trial, and while arguing the question of the damages before a jury of condemnation of the property in question. We know of no principle or authority, and have been referred to none, upon which such declarations of counsel as those here offered could be admitted for the purpose indicated. We, therefore, think the court was clearly right in excluding them.

The second exception taken by the plaintiffs was to the granting by the court of the second and third prayers of the defendant. As to the second prayer, thus excepted to, we have said there was error; but as to the third, there was no error, and therefore no ground for the exception to that instruction.

It follows that the several judgments entered in these cases must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Thomas H. GAITHER, Appt.,
v.
Margaret E. CLARKE, By Her Next Friend, Joshua T. Clarke.

1. If the plaintiff in an equity case can plainly and with certainty get at his rights and have them determined without trying and deciding a case as between codefendants, the court will not enter into such a case. But it will enter into and decide such case, as between codefendants, whenever it is necessary for the fair determination of the plaintiff's case; and the codefendants will be bound by such determination.
2. Where in a proceeding by a mortgagee to have the mortgaged premises sold, in order to determine what may be sold and what may be applied to the discharge of plaintiff's mortgage, it becomes necessary, the court may determine the question of the validity and the true nature and effect of a deed and lease which stand ahead of plaintiff's mortgage; and that question may be determined not only as between the plaintiff and one of the defendants, but as between the codefendants; and they will be bound by the determination.

3. It is not necessary in such case that the plaintiff should have offered to redeem by making tender of the amount supposed to be due to a defendant in respect to an informal mortgage held by him in the shape of a deed and lease, where the amount is unknown to plaintiff; a willingness stated in the bill, to allow all that is actually and fairly due, is all that is required.
4. Letters from the agent of the lender to the agent of the borrower, found among the papers of the latter after his decease, bearing upon their envelopes the postmarks and postage stamps showing the dates of their passage through the post office, in connection with letterpress copies in the letter book of the writer, are admissible as part of the res gestæ.
5. A deed and lease, held, under the circumstances of this case, to be merely security for a loan of money, at usurious interest; and only the amount found due at legal interest, deducting payments, allowed priority over plaintiff's mortgage.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court for Prince George's County, in favor of complainant in a bill to have a deed declared a mortgage and to foreclose a subsequent mortgage. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Robinson, Irving, Stone, Bryan and Yellott, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George R. Gaither, Jr. and William S. Bryan, Jr., for appellant:

The demurrer to the bill should be sustained, because even granting that the averments of the bill state such facts as would tend to prove that the complainant would be injured by the character of the alleged usurious transaction, there is no offer to redeem; and such relief would only be granted upon an offer to redeem. The complainant must offer to do equity.

The burden of proof that the mortgage is usurious is upon the mortgagor. He is impeaching his own obligation formally executed under seal, and must establish the facts to constitute usury beyond a reasonable doubt.

Conover v. Van Mater, 18 N. J. Eq. 481.

Joshua T. Clarke has recited under seal that his interest in said property was under a lease, and that Thomas H. Gaither owned the ground rent, and that on the faith of these recitals Thomas H. Gaither, by agreement, extended the time of redemption of said lease, and parted with certain rights which he had thereunder. By every principle of estoppel Joshua T. Clarke is prevented from denying the facts which he has thus recited under seal, and on which Mr. Gaither acted.

It has been held that the plea of usury must be accompanied with a tender of the amount admitted due; but the cases where it has been so held have been cases where the party seeking to plead usury was either the mortgagor himself or the owner of the entire equity of redemption, which is not this case.

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case Mrs. Clarke, as mortgagee, filed the bill against her husband, the mortgagor, and the other defendant, Thomas H. Gaither, charging that prior to the date of the mortgage to her, which bears date the 25th of September, 1877, her husband had made a deed of the mortgaged premises, being the farm upon which he resided, to George R. Gaither, since deceased; and that, upon the date of the deed, to wit: the 15th of November, 1869, and as a part of one and the same transaction, George R. Gaither executed to Joshua T. Clarke, her husband, a lease of the premises for ninety-nine years, with covenant for renewal thereof, at an annual rent of $600, payable quarterly in advance, over and above all deductions for taxes that might be assessed upon the premises; with right reserved to Gaither of re-entry upon the premises, for failure to pay rent or taxes, according to the terms of the lease. The farm contains about 400 acres of land, and the consideration expressed in the deed to Gaither is $5,000.

It is stipulated in the lease that Clarke should have the right of redemption and a reconveyance of the farm, upon payment of the principal sum of $5,000, and all rent due, at any time between the 15th of November, 1872, and the 15th of December, 1872. This sum Clarke failed to pay within the time designated; but after the time for redemption had passed, George R. Gaither, on the 22d of January, 1873, executed an instrument under his hand and seal, whereby he extended the time for "redeeming and relieving the aforesaid land" to the 15th of December, 1876, upon payment, at that date, of the $5,000, and all arrearages of rent, and also agreed to reduce the rent to $500 per annum, to be paid in the manner as provided in the original lease.

Some time after this arrangement, George R. Gaither died; and in the distribution of his estate, under his will, this reversionary estate and ground rent, according to the face of the deed and lease, were turned over to Thomas H. Gaither, one of the defendants; and before the time had arrived for redeeming the ground rent as fixed by the agreement of the 22d of January, 1873, Thomas H. Gaither, on the 13th of November, 1876, agreed with Clarke for a further extension, for a period of two years within which Clarke might redeem the farm, "upon paying the principal sum, and all rent due," etc.; and by the same agreement the rent was further reduced to $300 per annum. It was while this arrangement subsisted between Thomas H. Gaither and Clarke, that the mortgage by the latter to his wife was made for $2,000, the larger portion of which is alleged to be still due and owing.

The plaintiff alleges that the deed and lease, with the rent reserved, were originally intended, and are still kept on foot, as a mere cover and device to evade the law of the State against usury; that the original transaction between George R. Gaither and Clarke was a loan of money at a grossly usurious rate of interest, the rate being 12 per cent per annum, on $5,000, the amount loaned, less the first year's interest deducted. It is charged that the deed and lease were not in fact intended to have operation according to their legal import, but were intended simply as means of security for the money loaned, instead of a regular mortgage; and that there was no real bona fide intention of effecting a sale and purchase of the farm, as between the parties.

It is charged that all, or nearly all, of the money loaned by Gaither to Clarke has been paid, with the accrued interest thereon, if all payments made on account thereof be legally and properly applied. The plaintiff insists that the deed, and the rent reserved under the lease, cannot (in view of the facts of the case) be construed as having any greater effect and operation than a mortgage for the money loaned would have; and that, as her mortgage binds the equity of redemption, the effect of the deed and lease on record is to impair her security, and that they constitute a fraud on her rights as mortgagee. She therefore insists that she is entitled to have the true nature of those instruments declared; and if there be any amount still due on account of the loan, that it shall be ascertained under the direction of the court. She prays for a sale of the mortgaged premises, and that the proceeds of sale be applied to the payment of incumbrances according to their legal priorities.

To this bill Gaither demurred, for various causes stated; but the demurrer was overruled, and he then answered. Clarke, the other defendant, also answered, admitting substantially the facts as stated in the bill. Gaither, in his answer, states that he knows nothing in regard to the justness of the plaintiff's claim, but he requires strict proof of the same. He also says that he has no personal knowledge in regard to the circumstances under which the deed and lease were made; and he therefore neither admits nor denies the nature of the transaction as charged, but he requires strict proof in regard thereto. He further states that he received under his father's will the reversion and ground rent, secured by the deed and lease referred to, and that he still holds the same; and he insists that the plaintiff shall be required to show in what manner and to what extent she is interested in having the deed and lease declared to have the effect of the mortgage; and he denies all imputations of fraud, oppression, etc.

Proof was taken and, by agreement, a decree pro forma was entered, from which this appeal is taken by Thomas H. Gaither, one of the defendants.

1. It is contended for the appellant that Mrs. Clarke has not alleged and shown such state of facts as will entitle her to a standing in court as against the appellant; that it is neither alleged in her bill nor shown in proof that she is or will be affected by the strict legal operation of the deed and lease, or that the leasehold estate would not be sufficient to satisfy her mortgage; and further, upon the assumption that the deed and lease should be allowed the operation only of a mortgage security, that she has failed to offer to redeem or make tender of the amount due the appellant, without which her bill ought not to be sustained.

But these contentions, although very ingeniously pressed, we think are wholly untenable under the circumstances of this case. The mortgage to Mrs. Clarke does not profess to be a leasehold estate merely; and if it were restricted and made to operate upon a mere leasehold interest of the mortgagor in the land, it would, according to the settled law of this State, become subject to the covenants and conditions of the lease, and would be liable to be entirely defeated by the exercise of the reserved power of re-entry for the nonpayment of rent or taxes. Such a state of things would certainly render her mortgage security very precarious, to say the least of it.

But the plaintiff charges and insists that the deed and lease constitute nothing more than a security for money loaned; and in that light she is entitled to treat them simply as a prior incumbrance to her own mortgage; and as it is necessary to foreclose by sale of the mortgaged premises, justice to herself and to other lien holders requires that the true nature and effect of the deed and lease should be ascertained and declared, and whatever may be due to the appellant shall be paid out of the proceeds of sale. And this, if the plaintiff be correct in her contention as to the objects and purposes of the deed and lease, would seem to be entirely consistent with principle, and promotive of substantial justice.

As a general principle of equity procedure, it is very true that if the plaintiff can plainly and with certainty get at his rights and have them determined without trying and deciding a case as between codefendants, the court will not enter into such case. But it will enter into and decide such case, as between codefendants, whenever it is necessary for the fair determination of the plaintiff's case; and the codefendants will be bound by such determination. Cottingham v. Shrewsbury, 3 Hare, 627.

This being a proceeding by a mortgagee to have the mortgaged premises sold, in order to determine what may be sold and what may be applied to the discharge of the plaintiff's mortgage, it becomes necessary to determine the question of the validity and the true nature and effect of the deed and lease, which stands ahead of the plaintiff's mortgage; and that question must be determined not only as between the plaintiff and defendant Gaither, but as between the codefendants, Gaither and Clarke, and they will be bound by the determination.

It was said by the court of appeals, in the case of Thomas v. Mason, 8 Gill, 11, that "It is the constant practice to permit a subsequent mortgagee to question the title and claim of a prior incumbrancer, and to take advantage of the legal defect or taint of the elder incumbrancer. It is the right of every party in equity to question the title or the legality of a claim that precedes his own, and, by a successful impeachment, to render it void, and defeat it."

Nor do we think that it was at all necessary that the plaintiff should have offered to redeem by making tender of the amount supposed to be due to the defendant, Gaither, in respect of what is alleged to be the informal mortgage held by him, in the shape of the deed and rent reserved by the lease. Under the circumstances of the case such tender would have been impracticable, as the amount really due, if any, was wholly unknown to the plaintiff. A willingness to allow all that is actually and fairly due is the equitable requirement in a case like the present; and this the plaintiff has expressly reserved to the appellant in her bill. Nothing more could be required, in order to do justice in the case. Thomas v. Mason, 8 Gill, 1, 12; Doub v. Barnes, 1 Md. Ch. 128, 141.

2. We come now to the consideration of the question whether the original transaction between George R. Gaither and Clarke was really a loan of money, and the deed and lease adopted as a device to evade the law against usury, or whether it was a bona fide sale and purchase of the farm, and a simultaneous lease thereof to the vendor. And in regard to this question, in view of the facts disclosed, there would seem to be but one conclusion to which any rational mind could come; and that is, that the transaction was simply a loan of money, at a usurious rate of interest, taken in the form of a rent.

It is not shown or pretended that the elder Mr. Gaither had ever seen the farm in question before the money was paid over to Clarke, or that he had ever contemplated the purchase of it. There is no evidence whatever of any negotiation for the purchase of the farm; but all the preliminaries to the making of the deed and lease were such as evidenced the purpose of making a loan of money and of obtaining ample security therefor. The negotiation for the loan was conducted by and through the late C. C. Magruder, Esq., of Upper Marlboro, and John Glenn & Co., real estate brokers, of the City of Baltimore. Mr. Magruder has since died; but Mr. John Glenn is still living, and has been examined as a witness in the case; and the evidence furnished by him is most material.

Mr. Glenn states in his testimony that he remembers negotiating with Mr. C. C. Magruder, attorney for Joshua T. Clarke, for a loan on certain property belonging to Clarke or his wife, or both, and of consummating that loan. The deed and lease being read to Mr. Glenn, he was asked why that form of security was resorted to, instead of a mortgage to secure the money loaned by Gaither to Clarke; and his reply was: "Because the rate of interest was over 6 per cent."

Mr. Glenn was then requested to produce any letters he might have, relating to the subject; and he produced his letterpress book, containing two letterpress copies of letters addressed to Mr. Magruder, the one bearing date the 30th of October, 1869, and the other the 22d of November, 1869, and from which letterpress book transcripts were made by the examiner. And the witness seems to have no doubt that the originals of these letters were duly mailed to Mr. Magruder. Objection, however, was taken to these copies; and afterwards the originals were produced, taken from among the papers of Mr. Magruder, to whom they were directed.

These original letters proven to have been found among the papers of Mr. Magruder, deceased, bear upon their envelopes the postmarks or stamps, and postage stamps, showing the dates of their passage through the post office; and they, in every particular, correspond with the letterpress copies. Thus proven and identified, we think these letters were properly admissible in evidence. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 116, 120. See also § 40. They are admissible in evidence as part of the res gestæ.

By the first of these letters Mr. Glenn informs Mr. Magruder that Mr. Gaither will take Clarke's property of 500 acres, as security for a note of $6,000, payable two years after date, without interest, to be discounted by Mr. Gaither at 12 per cent per annum; provided Mr. Magruder considered the property worth easily from $18,000 to $20,000, and provided he could recommend the man. This proposition seems to have been based upon the supposition that the farm contained 500 acres, and was worth at least $18,000. But as we may infer, upon being informed that it contained but 400 acres, and was worth less than $18,000, the amount of the proposed loan was reduced to $5,000, at 12 per cent per annum; as that was the loan actually consummated by Mr. Glenn.

The second letter was written after the deed and lease had been executed, and it refers to some apprehension expressed by Mr. Gaither, that his lien on the farm was not the first; and Mr. Magruder is requested to be explicit upon the subject, and to have the deed recorded, and forward it at once. The first year's interest of 12 per cent was deducted from the $5,000, and Clarke received of the loan only $4,400.

There is, certainly, nothing in all this to indicate a purpose on the part of Mr. Gaither to really purchase the farm; and it is difficult to believe that Clarke would have been willing to sell his valuable farm, of 400 acres, for $5,000, and take a lease thereof at an annual rent of 12 per cent of the purchase money. And that an actual bona fide sale and purchase of the farm was not what was really and truly intended by the parties is strongly indicated by the letter of the appellant, of February 20, 1880, addressed to Clarke upon the subject of his indebtedness. In that letter, the appellant says to Clarke:

"I did not mean to change our agreement; I only wanted you to see how the acct. stood between us. I will not trouble you, if you so choose, until February, 1881. I think you said you would try, during this year of extension, to pay something on account of the interest, as it matured. I would advise, if you can raise any money, that you pay what you can to keep the interest down. You know the larger claim I have the less chance you will have to get your wife's claim."

It was not rent, but interest, that Clarke was advised to keep down, and the whole tenor of the letter shows that it was to an interest bearing claim that reference was made. Upon the whole, we are entirely of opinion that the original transaction was a loan of money at forbidden rates of interest, and that the deed and lease were adopted as means to evade the law. They were intended as security for the loan, and nothing more. And such being the case, it is wholly immaterial that the transaction was made to assume the form of a sale and lease of the farm,—the general principle being that if the transaction be really a borrowing and lending of money, at unlawful rates of interest, as it doubtless was in this case, no ingenuity can give to it a form that will shield it against impeachment and judicial investigation.

This case falls directly within the principle of the case of Montague v. Sewell, 57 Md. 407, and must be disposed of accordingly. Upon account stated, whatever may be found to be due the appellant, on account of the loan of $4,400. with interest at 6 per cent per annum, will be allowed priority over the mortgage claim of the plaintiff, Mrs. Clarke.

The decree passed by the court below is correct, and is therefore affirmed.

Decree affirmed and cause remanded.

v.
Emily WORTHINGTON et al.

ST. PAUL'S EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF BALTIMORE CITY, Appt.,
v.
Emily WORTHINGTON et al.

1. Innocent bona fide purchasers by virtue of a judicial sale of real property, if obliged to yield their title and possession to a superior title, are entitled to an allowance for the value of all beneficial permanent improvements of the property.
2. Where a purchaser of real property at a judicial sale which did not bar the title of some of the joint owners, has sold and given deeds of portions of the land to purchasers who have improved them by the erection of valuable buildings, such sales do not increase or diminish the rights of such joint owners, who may proceed to have partition as if they never had been made.

3. If the shares of such joint owners not barred by the previous judicial sale, claimed in such partition proceedings, are assigned out of the improved portions of the property, an inquiry would have to be instituted to ascertain the amount to be allowed for such improvements.

4. The more eligible mode of making the division is to take the part claimed by such joint owners from the unimproved portion of the tract, if practicable.

5. When such joint owners prosecute their suit of partition as the holders of a common interest, the portion to which they are entitled may be allotted to them collectively; and they can then, by petition in the suit, obtain a redivision among themselves according to their respective interests, or a sale of the whole of their allotment and a division of the proceeds.

6. A vendor selling in good faith is not responsible for the goodness of his title, beyond the extent of his covenants in the deed.

7. Where the conveyances of the portions of such land given by the purchaser contained only special warranties which were distinct covenants that he was not to be answerable for any losses which might occur from the assertion of a title superior to his own, and a permanent title is subsequently satisfied entirely out of the portion of the property which remained in his hands, held, (Bryan, J., dissenting), that he must be indemnified by the owners of the other portions of the tract by contributions in proportion to the value of their holdings; so that the entire tract may be assessed ratably, to make up the value of the portion allotted to the claimants by such superior title; the basis of estimation being the value of the ground considered irrespectively of the improvements.

(Additional Opinion.)

8. Held, that the entire tract should contribute to make up the value of the portion which shall be taken from the unimproved land, and that to make up this contribution the value of the land must be estimated without regard to the improvements, and that every portion of the tract must be charged with a sum proportioned to its value.

9. Held also, that the responsibility of the devisees of the vendor is dependent upon and limited by the covenants contained in his conveyances.

10. When land leased for a term of years is to be assessed, the assessment must be levied on lessee and reversioner in proportion to the value of their holdings.

APPEALS from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City, in favor of complainants in a bill for partition of land. Reversed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Irving, Robinson, Yellott and Bryan, JJ.

By his last will, admitted to probate in 1824, Kennedy Long devised among other property a certain tract of land, in fee, situate in Baltimore County (now City), in trust for his six children, Andrew, Thomas, James, Eliza, Mary (subsequently Mrs. Knapp) and Amelia (subsequently Mrs. Worthington); the shares of Andrew, Eliza, Mary and Amelia were for life, with remainders to their respective children.

March 1, 1833, a bill was filed in the Baltimore County Court for the sale of said lands, to which the widow, six children of the testator, and the trustee were made parties. The land was sold under said proceedings, and conveyed to the purchasers who supposed they were acquiring a fee simple title. In 1848 under sundry mesne conveyances from the purchasers the property became vested in Philip Hiss, who, supposing himself to be the sole owner in fee of said tract, subsequently conveyed parts of it, with covenants of special warranty only, to various parties, several of the conveyances being leases for ninety-nine years, renewable forever.

June 1, 1880, certain descendants of Kennedy Long, who claimed that the remainders to his grandchildren did not pass to the purchasers under the sale in 1833, filed a bill in the Circuit Court of Baltimore City against other of his descendants and against Philip Hiss and his grantees, and lessees, for the sale of said tract, alleging that said tract was incapable of an advantageous division specifically among those entitled thereto and cannot be divided without loss or injury to the parties interested, etc.

Shortly after the filing of the bill Philip Hiss died, and his devisees were added as parties. The bill was dismissed by the circuit court; but upon appeal this court (62 Md. 33) determined that nine of the descendants of Mrs. Worthington were entitled to an undivided sixth, and five children of Mrs. Knapp to one sixth of another sixth of said tract; and the cause was remanded, in order that a decree might be passed accordingly.

The case having been remanded, the complainants insisted on a sale of the entire tract, on the ground (as alleged in the bill) that it was not susceptible of partition. Hiss' grantees at the same time contended that the share of the claimants should be allotted to them out of the unimproved land in the possession of Hiss' devisees, if a partition in kind could be made, or, in case a sale were necessary, out of the proceeds of the sale of the land held by such devisees.

The circuit court was of opinion that if the partition in kind could have been fairly made out of the vacant ground, the entire loss must fall on Hiss' devisees; but, as such partition was not practicable, a sale must be ordered and each holder must bear his seven thirty-sixth loss and a decree was passed accordingly.

From this decree Hiss' grantees appealed. Hiss' devisees also appealed, in order to avail themselves of the benefit of a reversal by this court upon the question of a partition in kind.

Further facts appear from the opinion.

Messrs. Arthur W. Machen and Ed. Otis Hinkley, for Lambert Gittings, et al., appellants:

In equity, there is no necessity that a partition should be so made as to give each party a share in every part of the property. Each party must have his share in value, and that is all which is required.

Brookfield v. Williams, 1 H. W. Green, Ch. 341, 345; Hagar v. Wiswall, 10 Pick. 152; Buck v. Wolcott, 15 Gray, 502; Paddock v. Shields, 57 Miss. 340; Abbott v. Berry, 46 N. H. 369; Earl of Clarendon v. Hornby, 1 P. Wms. 446, quoted in the note to Agar v. Fairfax, 2 White & T. L. Cas. Eq. part 1, * 471; Canning v. Canning, 2 Drew. 436, quoted in same note, p. 471, 472.

Upon the bill in this case, partition is the proper relief if the property admits of it and no injury is thereby done to the claimants; and the proof does not justify a sale.

Earle v. Turton, 26 Md. 34; Thruston v. Minke, 32 Md. 576; Balt. & O. R. R. Co. v. Trimble, 51 Md. 109.

As between a sale and an actual partition, the court inclines to the latter alternative.

Thruston v. Minke, above cited, and other cases referred to in American note to Agar v. Fairfax, 2 White & T. L. Cas. part 1, p. 916. Catlin v. Catlin, 60 Md. 577.

It is the duty of the court of equity in making a partition to cause the improvements to be assigned to the respective owners of them.

Freeman, Partition, § 509; Leigh v. Dickeson, 15 L. R. Q. B. Div. 65; Crafts v. Crafts, 13 Gray, 360; Brookfield v. Williams, 1 H. W. Green, Ch. 341; Hall v. Piddock, 6 C. E. Green, 311. And see 2 White & T. L. Cas. part 1, p. 916.

Subdivisions should generally be remitted to subsequent proceedings in which those interested only would be necessary parties.

Oram v. Young, 3 Harr. (N. J.) 54. And see Gordon v. Pearson, 1 Mass. 323.

A party whose share can be set off without any prejudice to the other owners ought not, against his will, to have his share sold because the other owners hold in shares so small that a sale of the residue becomes necessary.

Haywood v. Judson, 4 Barb. 228; Lucas v. Peters, 45 Ind. 313.

It remains to consider the equities existing between the purchasers of the lots sold by Philip Hiss, and his devisees who have succeeded him in the possession of the unsold residue. Equity requires that in a partition the claimants who have made no improvements shall have their shares allotted to them out of the unimproved part of the land. The result of such a partition, by confirming the title of Philip Hiss to the improved part, is to perfect the title of his grantees acquired through his deeds.

Freeman, Partition, §§ 509, 465, 207; Brown v. Bailey, 1 Met. 257; Varnum v. Abbot, 12 Mass. 474, 476–478; Nichols v. Smith, 22 Pick. 316; McKee v. Barley, 11 Gratt. 340; Cox v. McMullin, 14 Gratt. 82.

The deed of a tenant in common conveying a parcel of the common land by metes and bounds, while void as against his cotenant, is valid and effectual as against the grantor, and all claiming under him.

The equity existing in favor of the grantees of Hiss, which will be respected by a court of chancery in a partition, must equally be recognized if a sale is decreed in lieu of partition. The grantor cannot derogate from his own grant.

Reese v. Reese, 41 Md. 554; Janes v. Jenkins, 34 Md. 1.

Hiss could not, nor can his representatives since his death, be permitted to throw upon his grantees a burden which, by an application of the principles of equity as to marshaling, can be made to be borne by the unsold land.

Watson v. Bane, 7 Md. 117; Sugden, Vendors, chap. 18, § 2, pl. 29, marg. p. 556.

It is a general rule of equity that where the owner of land which is subject to any kind of lien or incumbrance, conveys part thereof to a purchaser, the burden of the lien must, as between such purchaser and the grantor, be borne by the remaining land of the latter.

2 Story, Eq. § 1233, a; Hartley v. O'Flaherty, Lloyd & Goold, t. Plunkett, 254, 261; Clowes v. Dickenson, 5 Johns. Ch. 235.

As between the vendor and his grantees, this doctrine has never been questioned. Judge Story expressed doubts as to the propriety of applying it as among the grantees themselves, inclining to the view that they might all be treated as standing equitably on the same footing; in which doubt, however, he seems not to have been sustained by the authorities, which, with great uniformity, maintain that, as among several purchasers from the same vendor, in whose hands the entirety was subject to a charge, their respective lands must bear the burden of the original lien in the inverse order of the alienations.

Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 473; James v. Hubbard, 1 Paige, 233; Stuyvesant v. Hall, 2 Barb. Ch. 155; Cowden's Estate, 1 Pa. 267; Carpenter v. Koons, 20 Pa. 226; Kilborn v. Robbins, 8 Allen, 466; Nellons v. Truax, 6 Ohio St. 97; Brown v. Simons, 44 N. H. 475; 2 White & T. L. Cas. part 1, pp. 291, 296; Jenkins v. Freyer, 4 Paige, 52, 53; Hamilton v. Royse, 2 Sch. & Lef. 316, 328; Coote, Mort. 4th ed. 150.

Doub v. Barnes, 4 Gill, 21, which was founded on a case in 1 Leigh, is not inconsistent with this doctrine, except perhaps in the case of judgments.

See Conrad v. Harrison, 3 Leigh, 532, 540.

For the purposes of this case it is not necessary to determine whether Judge Story's view or the other is preferable. It is enough to rest upon the rule which he and the other authorities agree in accepting, that the vendor's remaining land must, at all events, first bear the burden, to the entire exoneration, if sufficient, of all the parcels which he has sold.

Aldrich v. Cooper, 2 White & T. L. Cas. part 1, 4th ed. pp. 291, 293, et seq.

The doctrine does not depend upon the presence of a covenant of warranty in the deed, although such a covenant may be of influence in showing the intent in a case otherwise doubtful, but exists independently of warranty.

2 White & T. L. Cas. part 1, pp. 296, 297.

The principle is irrespective of the origin or nature of the incumbrance.

Id. p. 296.

Nor is it limited to mere incumbrances. "It can have no necessary dependence upon the character of the interest or title of the claimants; it rests upon the intrinsic justice and morality of the maxim that a party shall so exercise his own rights as not to do unnecessary injury to those of others.

Agricultural Bank v. Pallen, 1 Freeman, Ch. 419, quoted in 2 White & T. L. Cas. part 1, p. 291.

Messrs. S. T. Wallis and M. R. Walter, for P. Hanson Hiss, et al., appellants:

A vendor, selling in good faith, is not responsible for the goodness of his title, beyond the extent of his covenants in the deed.

Falconer v. Clark, 3 Md. Ch. 151; 7 Md. 177; Smith v. Chaney, 4 Md. Ch. 246; Harris v. Morris, 4 Md. Ch. 529.

If a purchaser has taken a conveyance, and there be no fraud, he has no remedy, although evicted for want of title, except upon the covenants of his deed.

Middlekauff v. Barrick, 4 Gill, 291.

The purchaser's only right to relief from defects or incumbrances, whether at law or in equity, depends, in the absence of fraud, solely upon the covenants for title which he has received.

Rawle, Cov. Title, 566.

It is one of the best settled principles of this branch of the law, that a purchaser who has received no covenants which cover the defect or incumbrance can neither obtain the purchase money, nor recover it back, if already paid. Unless there has been fraud, accident or mistake, he is absolutely without relief against his vendor, either at law or in equity.

Id. 567.

When the deed contains no covenants, the purchaser is wholly without remedy; for the consideration was the mere transfer to him of the estate of the vendor, who was to be in no way responsible for the title; and when the deed is delivered to the purchaser, he has received the entire consideration for which he bargained, entirely irrespective of any future events; and the question of good or bad title is irrelevant. When the covenants are limited to the acts of the vendor, the consideration would seem to be the present transfer of his estate in the same condition as that in which he himself received it, and the future performance by himself and his heirs, when necessary of the undertaking, that the purchaser and those claiming under him shall not suffer from any of his or their acts.

Id. 588.

When a defect has been caused by anyone in the chain of title prior to the vendor, this can form no defense to the purchaser from payment of the purchase money, for the consideration between himself and this vendor is not affected.

Id. 589.

All covenants arising from implication of law are necessarily controlled or annulled by express covenants between the parties. When a party covenants for quiet enjoyment and possession against himself, and those claiming under him, he excludes the idea of a covenant against the world.

Morris v. Harris, 9 Gill, 20–27.

Mr. Sebastian Brown, for Thomas P. Stran et al., appellants:

A partition between the devisees of Philip Hiss and the Worthington and Knapp heirs, which should give to the latter their full share of the whole, out of the unimproved property, would ratify and confirm the deeds and leases made by Philip Hiss to third parties.

Robinett v. Preston, 2 Rob. (Va.) 277; De Witt v. Harvey, 4 Gray, 491; Cunningham v. Pattee, 99 Mass. 251; Holcomb v. Coryell, 3 Stockton, Ch. 550; Primm v. Walker, 38 Mo. 97; McKee v. Barley, 11 Gratt. 346; Teal v. Woodworth, 3 Paige, 470.

A lease or deed by one tenant in common to a stranger, of a portion of a joint estate, although voidable by the cotenants who do not join therein, is valid between the parties and against all persons, unless so avoided.

Brown v. Bailey, 1 Met. 257; Cunningham v. Pattee, 99 Mass. 250; Compau v. Godfrey, 18 Mich. 36; Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 235; Butler v. Roys, 25 Mich. 53; Hartford & S. Ore Co. v. Miller, 41 Conn. 132; Holcomb v. Coryell, 3 Stockton, Ch. 549–550; Freeman, Cotenancy §§ 199, 207; Carroll v. Norwood, 1 Harr. & J. 100, 167.

The devisees of Philip Hiss, therefore, cannot be permitted to assail the deeds and leases made by their testator; and consequently it would seem that they must submit to a partition which would give to their cotenants the unsold property in satisfaction of their share.

When a cotenant has made improvements on a portion of the property, the partition will be so made as to allot him the land so improved, if this can be done without injury to the parties. This rule would be adopted if the improvements had been made by Hiss; and certainly his grantees, who paid him full value for the property, must receive at least like protection from the court.

1 Story, Eq. § 655; Lowvalle v. Menard, 1 Gilm. 45; Town v. Needham, 3 Paige, 553; Brookfield v. Williams, 1 Green, Ch. 345; Hart v. Hawkins, 3 Bibb, 510; Pope v. Whitehead, 68 N. C. 199; Drennen v. Walker, 21 Ark. 557; Seale v. Soto, 35 Cal. 104; 16 W. Va. 241; 18 Mich. 36; 52 Maine, 25; Freeman, Cotenancy, 465, 509.

If, therefore, a partition can be so made of this property that the Worthington and Knapp heirs can receive their shares out of the unsold property, that course should be adopted; and the result would ratify and confirm all the deeds and leases made by Philip Hiss.

A partition and not a sale should always be ordered where the property admits of partition without injury to the parties interested; and the court always inclines to a partition.

Earle v. Turton, 26 Md. 34; Thruston v. Minke, 32 Md. 576; Balt. & O. R. R. Co. v. Trimble, 51 Md. 109; Ager v. Fairfax, 2 White & T. L. Cas. part 1, p. 916; Catlin v. Catlin, 60 Md. 577.

If the property be sold and the proceeds received from the sales of that portion in possession of the devisees of Philip Hiss are sufficient (and they are doubly so) to satisfy the Worthington and Knapp heirs, reason and justice demand that they shall be satisfied out of those proceeds. The principle applied where a partition can be made should be equally applied where the property is indivisible, and cannot be sold. Otherwise, the mere fact that one lot, perhaps worth less than $1,000, being so situated that it, with other property, could not be divided without loss and injury, would determine whether the vendor or the vendee should bear the loss of thousands of dollars.

Warfield v. Crane, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 525; 4 Keyes (N. Y.), 448; Reese v. Reese, 41 Md. 554; Janes v. Jenkins, 34 Md. 1; Watson v. Bane, 7 Md. 117; Sugden, Vend. chap. 13, § 2, pl. 29, marg. p. 556; 2 Story, Eq. § 1233, a; Hartley v. O'Flaherty, Lloyd & Goold, t. Plunkett, 254-261; Clowes v. Dickenson, 5 Johns. Ch. 285; Agricultural Bank v. Pallen, 1 Freem. Ch. 419, quoted in 2 White & T. L. Cas. Part 1, p. 291.

It is submitted that the Worthington and Knapp heirs can receive their portions out of the unimproved ground without loss and injury.

While every cotenant must receive property in proportion to the value of his interest, nevertheless it is impossible in any case to make the division absolutely perfect.

Brookfield v. Williams, 1 Green, Ch. 341, 345; Hagar v. Wiswall, 10 Pick. 152; Buck v. Wolcott, 15 Gray, 502.

Should there be no difficulty in giving to each of the Knapps a lot in proportion to his interest, and there should be none under the facts of this case, the court should allot to them their share in solido, and they could subdivide among themselves, or have their parcels sold under a decree in equity.

Oram v. Young, 8 Harr. (N. J.) 54; Gordon v. Pearson, 1 Mass. 323.

Messrs. I. Nevett Steele and J. I. Alexander, for appellees.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the second appeal in this case. On the first appeal it was decided by this court that the children of Mrs. Worthington were entitled to one sixth of the real estate sold under the decree of 1833, and that the heirs at law of Moses L. Knapp were entitled to one sixth of one sixth of the same property. Long v. Long, 62 Md. 33.

The bill filed in the case sought a partition of the land devised by the will of Kennedy Long. The complainants were not in possession, and their title was denied by the defendants. The question of the jurisdiction of a court of equity to decree a partition under such circumstances was not before this court. The parties had waived it by express agreement filed in the court below; and under the statute the appellate court had no power to consider it. It was obliged to assume that the complainants were entitled to a partition, provided they showed a title to an undivided portion of the property. And the decision was that the sale in 1833, under the decree of Baltimore County Court, and the subsequent proceedings under that sale did not bar the title of Moses L. Knapp and the children of Mrs. Worthington.

Philip Hiss acquired the title of the purchasers of this sale, and since the acquisition of his interest, he has disposed of a large portion of the property; in some instances making leases for ninety-nine years, renewable forever; and in others, executing deeds in fee. He has also sold the reversions in fee, and rents of some of the property leased by him. The land sold and leased was laid off into lots and described by metes and bounds in the conveyances to the purchasers and lessees; and these lots have been improved by the erection of valuable buildings. Nearly one half in area of the land purchased at the sale in 1833 was in the possession of Philip Hiss at the time this bill was filed, and is now held by the devisees named in the will. All of this portion is still unimproved.

At the time of the sale under the decree of 1833, this tract was remote from the inhabited portions of the city, and was valued at about $5,000. It was rented for $200 a year, and after the payment of taxes and insurance the net amount was very trifling. The buildings and fencing were going to decay, and to all appearance it was very undesirable property. But the growth of the City of Baltimore in the course of half a century has made an enormous difference in its value. Streets have been opened through it and far beyond it, and it has become suitable for the residences of persons whose means are sufficient to provide the comforts and conveniences of life. The value at the present time, exclusive of the improvements, has been variously estimated by the witnesses examined in this cause at sums ranging from $160,000 to $235,000.

If Hiss had remained in possession of the whole tract, it would have been most just and reasonable that the portion now claimed by the Worthingtons and Knapps should have been allotted to them out of the unimproved portion; provided this division could have been made without injury to their interests. The sales by Hiss could not increase or diminish any rights which those persons had who were co-owners with him of the whole tract. These co-owners, not being bound by those sales, have a right to proceed with their partition as if they had never been made. They have not, however, any greater rights than they would have had if Hiss had kept the property in his own hands.

It was decided when this cause came before this court for the first time that as the present possessors of the property were innocent bona fide holders by virtue of a judicial sale, they would be entitled to a proportionate allowance for the value of all beneficial permanent improvements of the property, and also for taxes and insurance which have been paid by them. If the portion now claimed should be assigned out of the improved property, and then an inquiry should be instituted to ascertain the amount to be allowed for improvements and other expenditures proper to be allowed, it is evident that a very large amount of labor and cost would be incurred. The investigation would embrace a great number of details, about which it would be vain to expect certainty or accuracy. The tract originally contained a fraction more than four acres. In the course of fifty years, it has passed from the uses of rural life, and has been adapted to the requirements of a large city, about three fifths of it being occupied by costly residences.

It would be a task of exceeding and almost hopeless difficulty to estimate the beneficial expenditures which have been made on so large a body of land, in its long progress through so great a change. The simple, ready and eligible mode of making the division is to take the part now claimed from the unimproved portion of the tract, provided it is practicable. This portion amounts to nearly one half of the whole tract in area, and about 40 per cent in value. The combined interests of the Worthingtons and Knapps come to seven thirty-sixths of the whole tract. The property fronts on Madison Avenue, McCullon Street, and Druid Hill Avenue. It is well known that the customary and almost invariable mode of valuing ground in the City of Baltimore is by the front foot. Five witnesses have been examined who have made an estimate of the value of all this property by the front foot. While they differ considerably in their valuations of the property they agree pretty nearly as to the proportions of value between the improved and the unimproved. Two of them put the unimproved portion at 41 per cent of the whole, two at about 40 per cent, and one at 42 per cent.

Now the portion to be set off is about 20 per cent of the whole. There can be no difficulty in laying this off. The whole property is valued at so much a front foot, the value of the front foot varying on the different streets; so that this portion may be justly and fairly ascertained even to the fraction of an inch, and the claimants can obtain the uttermost value of their interests. It is difficult to estimate the amount of disaster which would be caused by a sale of all this property. We are to consider that a large number of families would be turned out of their homes, or compelled to buy them. The purchase money would be paid into court and there detained until there was an adjudication establishing the amounts of money to be allowed them for their improvements. The inquiry would be long, tedious and perplexing. At the very best, the result would be reached by adopting the opinions of witnesses on subjects about which they could not have any exact and accurate knowledge. The land and improvements would be sold and witnesses would be called to state their opinions as to what portion of the price should be allowed to the improvements. The value of improvements, and the proportion in which they increase the value of the land on which they are erected, depend on a great number and variety of circumstances. They must be in the nature of things somewhat conjectural. But land is daily bought and sold in the City of Baltimore, and its value by the front foot is as readily and easily ascertained as that of any commodity in the market.

It may be said that each one of these claimants is entitled to his or her portion in severalty. They have prosecuted their suit as the holders of a common interest and have been so regarded by this court. When the bill was dismissed by the circuit court, the children of Mrs. Knapp were not in a condition to appeal, for the reason that they had been made defendants. This court, however, perceiving that the litigation was for the common benefit of all these claimants, gave them the benefit of the appeal, without regarding their position on the record, which would have precluded an appeal on their part. When the portion to which they are entitled collectively has been allotted to them, they can by petition in this cause obtain a redivision among themselves, according to their respective interest, or a sale of the whole of their allotment, and a division of the proceeds, if the redivision of the land cannot be made without loss and injury. This mode of proceeding would secure all their rights, and would relieve the other possessors of this tract from vast and unnecessary expense and inconvenience. It is undoubtedly within the power of a court of equity to adapt its methods to the exigencies of justice, being careful, however, not to grasp at forbidden power, for the purpose of relieving the hardship of a particular case. In the present instance, it is the duty of the court to allot to the claimants their share of this property; and it is simply a question of proceeding, whether this result is accomplished by one division of the whole mass, or by a series of subdivisions. If a testator should direct that one eighth of his personalty should be equally divided among the children of Richard Roe, and Roe should have nine children, an auditor would first ascertain the amount of an eighth part of the personalty, and would then divide this eighth part into nine other parts; one for each of the children. It cannot be possible that such a method of division would not be equally admissible in the case of real estate.

If, in the instance just supposed, the testator had left an eighth of his real estate to the children of Richard Roe, and he had died seised and possessed of eight tracts of land of equal value, everyone would readily recognize the injustice to the other devisees, which would be wrought by a decree that the whole of the realty should be divided into seventy-two parts, and if this could not be done, that it should all be sold. And yet not less injustice would be done in this case by a sale of the whole tract.

The conveyances by Hiss contained only special warranties. A question has been presented and argued, relating to the duty of contribution as between him (or his devisees) and the persons who purchased and leased from him. A majority of the court are of opinion that the responsibility of Hiss to his vendors is measured entirely by the special warranties contained in his conveyances; that these special warranties were distinct covenants that he was not to be answerable for any losses which might occur from the assertion of a title superior to his own; that if he is required to protect these purchasers from the claims of the Worthingtons and Knapps, he is in effect made to give them all the benefit which could be derived from a general warranty; and that therefore he cannot be made to satisfy this paramount claim entirely out of the portion of the property which remained in his hands. As a necessary consequence of these propositions, he must be indemnified by the owners of the other portions of the tract by contributions in proportion to the value of their holdings; so that the entire tract may be assessed ratably to make up the value of the portion allotted to the claimants by a superior title; the basis of estimation being the value of the ground, considered irrespectively of the improvements.

I am constrained to dissent from these conclusions. The question in my view does not involve the obligations arising from general or special warranties made by a vendor of real estate.

When Hiss made conveyances to these persons, he was lawfully entitled to four fifths of the whole tract. These lots were set off to the vendees and lessees by metes and bounds. Of course as against their vendor and lessor, they have a right to hold the whole of the property purchased and leased. In other words, they acquired all the title which he was competent to convey. It is not my opinion that he was obliged to warrant and defend the title to these lots against persons claiming by a superior title; but that he conveyed such title to the property described by metes and bounds as he had, and as he was able to convey. He merely could convey an absolutely indefeasible title, except so far as it was affected by the claims of the Worthingtons and Knapps. We have seen that they will be required to take their fifth interest out of the unimproved property, and to abstain from interfering with the portion which has been sold by Hiss. The right of enforcing such a mode of division is a valuable incident to the property, and essential to its protection by its owners.

When Hiss sold these lots, he parted with every vestige of interest in them; and of necessity this right was conveyed to his vendees along with every other which concerned the ownership of the property. We may say in a few words that the equities of the case protect these improved lots from the claims of the Worthingtons and Knapps; and the owners of them have purchased from Hiss all his rights in them. I think that we can exhibit the true state of this question by a familiar illustration: suppose that Hiss had been in possession of a quantity of flour, say 100 barrels, and had sold to different purchasers sixty barrels, expressly stipulating that he would not warrant the title; and suppose that after these sales had been made, Worthington had successfully maintained a claim to an undivided fifth interest in the whole quantity. Hiss would have been obliged to deliver to him twenty of the barrels remaining in his hands; and certainly he could not have claimed contribution against the purchasers of the sixty barrels.

Everyone must see the essential identity in principle of this supposed case with the one we are now considering. As he made only special warranties in his deeds, if his vendees had been evicted by a paramount title, they would have had no recourse against him. But most assuredly he (or rather his devisees) cannot complain if his vendees maintain the possession purchased from him by means of an equitable right incident to that possession, and given by the law for its protection. If the property had remained in his possession, he would have protected it by this very equity; and his vendees merely seek to exercise a right which they have purchased and paid for. As they have only special warranties they could not claim anything from him, if they had been evicted; but in this instance he seems to be claiming something from them, because they have not been evicted.

It appears to me just, that these parties should stand where the circumstances of the case have placed them. If the vendees can protect their holdings by means of any principle or rule of equity, they ought to be permitted to do so; and the loss arising from the assertion of this claim for partition ought to rest where it may fall. Hiss has sold these lots, and has been paid for them. It is hard that he should lose some of the unimproved lots; but this misfortune does not give him any claim against those who have purchased from him. These purchasers have no claim against him; nor has he any claim against them. Each must be content with such protection as fortune or circumstances may extend to him.

It does not appear to me that Hiss or his devisees have any equitable right to call on his vendees for contribution. I do not think that this question is decided by the accidental circumstance that partition is to be made by an actual division of the property, instead of being effected by the instrumentality of a sale. It depends on the rights of the parties, and not on the forms of proceeding. If the entire tract, with all the improvements, should be sold, the rights and equities of the parties would attach to the proceeds of sale in precisely the same measure as they now affect the land. The sale would merely change the form of the property, and could not increase or diminish any interest in it. The vendees and lessees would be entitled to receive what their lots and improvements sold for; the co-owners with Hiss would receive their due proportion, and Hiss or his devisees would receive the remainder. These considerations may tend to illustrate more fully the flagrant and unnecessary aggravation of the costs which would be incurred by a sale of the whole tract.

I have dispensed with the discussion of some questions which were debated at the bar. The holders of these lots are not tenants in common with the Hiss devisees or with their co-owners. Tenants in common are said by Blackstone to be "such as hold by several and distinct titles, but by unity of possession; because none knoweth his own severalty, and therefore they all occupy promiscuously." The relative rights of Hiss and his co-owners may be determined by considering them as tenants in common, inasmuch as although the latter were kept out of possession, yet they have been decreed to be entitled to an undivided portion of the entire tract.

But there is no unity of possession between either of these persons and the holders of the several lots. The essential element of a tenancy in common is absent. Each of the holders of the lots claims and possesses in severalty the land lying within his metes and bounds, and has no color of pretense of possession to the portions of the tract lying beyond them. The rights of the Worthingtons and Knapps are not in any degree affected by these latter titles or possession. They exist and are to be asserted without any reference to the conveyances made by Hiss to the holders of these lots. They have no interest or concern in the validity or extent of their pretensions; and most certainly can in no respect be considered as having a unity of possession with them. It would greatly mislead our judgment, if we were to attempt to dispose of this question by considering what would be the affect, if there had been a recovery in ejectment against each one of these owners. There is no such condition of things. This court has decided that the Worthingtons and Knapps are entitled to have partition of the whole tract by proceedings in equity, the question of jurisdiction having been duly waived by the parties to the cause.

Now, we must take this determination just as it is, without any strained analogy to the results of other proceedings which have not taken place. It gives the co-owners with Hiss the right to have their undivided interest allotted to them out of the whole tract; and this right must be pursued and attained, according to the rules of equity practice. I have endeavored to state them in what I have said. As my views however are not shared by the majority of the court they are without avail.

It will be seen that we differ from the learned circuit court. Its decree must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Decree reversed and cause remanded.

Thereafter the following additional opinion of the court was delivered by Bryan, J.:

The court has been requested by the counsel for the Hiss devisees to state the application of the language of the opinion to the question of contribution on the part of the lessees from Hiss. This request appears to us in all respects reasonable. It is of course much to be desired that there should be no doubt about the opinion of the court on questions involved in its decisions.

The majority of the court hold that the entire tract should contribute to make up the value of the portion which shall be taken from the unimproved land and that to make up this contribution the value of the land must be estimated without regard to the improvements, and that every portion of the tract must be charged with a sum of money porportioned to its value. It is also held that the responsibility of the devisees of Hiss is dependent upon and limited by the covenants contained in his conveyances. The deeds and leases are not in the record, but we supposed from the argument on both sides that the court was desired to express an opinion on the effect of special warranties. We mentioned the cases of vendees and owners, because we wished to show the rights of contribution which existed against those who were entitled to the entire fee simple, and because in such case (as we were informed at the argument) the special warranties stood unaffected by anything else in the deeds. But we think that the principle stated in the opinion covers every imaginable case where an interest has been acquired from Hiss by any species of conveyance.

Where land is leased for a term of years, the whole interest is comprehended in the term and in the reversion. The lessee and the reversioner together own the land; their combined interests make up the ownership. When the land therefore is to be assessed, the assessment must be levied on the lessee and reversioner, in proportion to the value of their interests. Now to apply these remarks to lessees from Hiss, where his devisees hold the reversion; the term and the reversion must bear their proportionate burdens, just as where the reversions are held by third persons. If, however, there are covenants in a lease by which the reversioner is liable to make good to the termor his loss in case of eviction, the whole amount assessed on the land must be paid by the reversioner. In the absence of such covenants, the rule of contribution prevails, which we have stated. A great variety of covenants may be inserted in a lease; those most usually employed have reference to the tenant's obligation to pay rent while he continues in possession of his term. Unless we had the covenants in these leases before us we could not speak more definitely on this subject than we have done. When a tenant is evicted from any portion of the premises, ordinarily there must be a proportionate abatement of the rent. He is deprived entirely of a portion of the land for which he contracted to make his annual payment, to the landlord; he loses his possession and the landlord loses his rent. But in the case where the tenant and the reversioner together make up the loss, it would not be right to abate the rent. Instead of losing his rent, the reversioner loses the amount which he is obliged to contribute; and the tenant is relieved of a portion of the loss, instead of being allowed an abatement of the rent.

It is competent for the circuit court to cause the partition to be made by commissioners and to direct them to ascertain the sums to be assessed on the different portions of the tract. When these assessments have been ratified by the court, it can compel payment by sale of the property assessed.

I am directed by the majority of the court to make the foregoing addition to the opinion heretofore filed. I do not, however, wish it to be understood that my own personal views have undergone any change.

Gustav A. SCHLENS et al., Trustees.

1. Under the Act of 1868, chap. 273, it is irregular for the guardian of an infant to file a bill in his own name as guardian for the sale of the interest of his ward in real estate; the bill should be filed in the name of the infant by his next friend; but such irregularity does not deprive the court of jurisdiction when the infant is a party defendant, and answers by guardian appointed by the court.
2. The court having acquired jurisdiction of the proper parties, its decree is binding upon all the parties interested, notwithstanding such irregularity, until it be reversed or annulled upon the review in regular proceedings for that purpose. (Decided March 15, 1887.)

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court for Baltimore County, overruling a purchaser's exceptions and confirming a sale of certain real estate under Act of 1868, chap. 273. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Robinson, Irving, Stone, Bryan and Yellott, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John P. Poe and John J. Dobler, for appellant.

Mr. F. G. Slingluff, for appellees.

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case was filed by Gustav A. Schlens, in his own name, but as guardian of Christian Wilkens, a minor, against the said Christian Wilkens, and others to obtain a decree for sale or lease of certain real estate, devised by the will of the late William Wilkens, deceased, and in which Christian Wilkens, the minor, is interested as devisee.

The bill was filed to obtain a decree under the provisions of the Act of the General Assembly of 1868, chap. 273. This statute provides that "In all cases when one or more persons is or are entitled to an estate for life or years, or to an estate tail, fee simple, conditional, base or qualified fee, or any other particular, limited or conditional estate in lands, and any person or persons is or are entitled to a remainder or remainders, vested or contingent, on an executory devise or devises, or any other interest, vested or contingent in the same land, on application of any of the parties in interest, a court of equity may, if all the parties in being are parties to the proceeding, decree a sale or lease thereof, if it shall appear to be advantageous to the parties concerned, and shall direct the investment of the proceeds of sale or the limitations of the leasehold interest, as the case may be, so as to inure in like manner as by the original grant to the use of the same parties who would be entitled to the land sold or leased; and all such decrees, if all the persons or parties who would be entitled if the contingency had happened at the date of the decree, shall bind all persons whether in being or not, who claim or may claim any interest in said land under any of the parties to said decree, or under any person from whom any of the parties to such decree claim, or from or under or by the original deed or will by which such particular, limited or conditional estates, with remainders or executory devises, were created."

The bill was not filed as it should have been, by and in the name of the infant devisee, as complainant, by his next friend; but, as we have stated, it was filed by the guardian in his own name, in his character of guardian; and his infant ward and all other parties supposed to be interested in the property to be affected by the decree were made defendants. After notice to nonresident defendants by publication, a guardian ad litem was appointed to answer for the infant defendants, and answers for them were filed by such guardian. Proof was then taken; and on the 10th of April, 1885, a decree was passed, authorizing the sale or lease of the property, as the trustees appointed by the court might find to be most advantageous to the parties concerned.

It was under this decree that the sale to the appellant was made by the trustees, and which was reported to the court on the 30th of December, 1886. The sale thus reported was excepted to by the appellant, upon two grounds: 1, that the bill was not filed by a party in interest, as contemplated by the Act of 1868, chap. 273; that the bill should have been filed by Christian Wilkens, the infant, by his next friend, and not by the guardian of such infant, against the infant and others holding vested or contingent estates in the land; and therefore the court was without power or jurisdiction to pass the decree upon such application; 2, that it was not made to appear by evidence in the cause that it would be advantageous to the parties concerned that the property mentioned in the proceedings should be sold or leased, and therefore the court had no power to decree as it did.

The exceptions were overruled, and the sale finally ratified; and it is from this order of the court and not the decree of the 10th of April, 1885, that the present appeal is taken.

1. It is very clear that the proceeding contemplated by the Act of 1868, chap. 273, is quite different and distinct from that contemplated by sections 36, 37 and 39 of article 16 of the Code, as those sections have been modified by the amendatory and curative Act of 1868, chap. 249. Those sections of the Code contemplate and direct a proceeding in behalf of infants alone, and where the interests of the infants are the only objects sought to be subserved by sale or lease of the property. Alex. Ch. Pr. 215.

But not so by the proceeding authorized by the Act of 1868, chap. 273. By that statute it is provided that on application of any of the parties in interest, whether infant or adult, a court of equity may, if all the parties in being are made parties to the proceeding, decree a sale or lease of the premises, if it shall appear to be advantageous to the parties concerned. The guardian of an infant party concerned, however, is clearly not a party in interest within the meaning of the Act. He has no right or estate in the property, and had no power to make conversion of the realty into personalty. Therefore, unless he be authorized by express terms of the statute to take proceedings in his own name in his representative capacity, for the sale or lease of the realty belonging to his ward, he can only proceed as next friend of the infant, the latter being the real party plaintiff on the record. As we have seen, the Statute of 1868, chap. 273, does not so provide; and therefore the bill in this case should have been filed in the name of the infant, Christian Wilkens, by Gustav A. Schlens as his next friend, and not in the name of Schlens as the guardian of the infant. Boyd v. Boyd, 6 Gill & J. 25, 30; Downes v. Friel, 57 Md. 536; Bradley v. Amidon, 10 Paige, 235; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 57, 58.

But although such be the case, it does not follow, because of this irregularity in the proceedings, that the court was without jurisdiction to pass the decree of the 10th of April, 1885. The bill was in fact filed for and on behalf of Christian Wilkens, the infant, and the bill expressly charges that it would be to the benefit and advantage not only of Christian Wilkens, the infant, but of all the other parties concerned; that the property should be sold or leased; and to this bill, Christian Wilkens, the infant, together with all the other parties concerned, then in being, was made a party defendant.

Christian Wilkens, the infant, answered the bill by guardian ad litem, duly appointed by the court—and we must assume that it was made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that it would be advantageous to all parties concerned that the property should be sold or leased, or otherwise the decree would not have been made. The court, therefore, had jurisdiction of the parties concerned, and of the subject matter of suit; and having acquired jurisdiction, the decree of the court is binding upon all the parties interested, notwithstanding the irregularity of the proceeding, until such decree be reversed or annulled, upon the review in regular proceeding for that purpose. Downes v. Friel, 57 Md. 531, 536.

But on this appeal, the appeal having been taken from the order overruling the exceptions to the sale, and ratifying the sale as reported, the original decree, authorizing the sale or lease of the property, is not open for review by this court. Porter v. Askew, 11 Gill & J. 347, 350; Vickers v. Tracey, 22 Md. 199.

2. The second objection taken to the ratification of the sale is that there was no sufficient evidence produced to establish the fact that it would be advantageous to all parties concerned that the property should be sold or leased, and therefore that there was error in passing the decree, which may subject it to review and reversal, on a bill of review that may, some time in the future, be filed by some of the infant defendants, when they attain age: and the case of Earle v. Turton, 26 Md. 23, is cited. But the case referred to is quite different from the present, and is not an authority for the position sought to be maintained by the appellant here.

There is evidence in the case from which the court below could have reasonably concluded that it would be to the advantage of all parties concerned that the property should be sold or leased. But whether there be such evidence or not is quite immaterial on this appeal; for the principle is now too firmly settled to be questioned, that even if the decree could be reversed for errors or irregularities, whether in respect to the evidence or otherwise, provided the court had acquired jurisdiction to pass the decree, a purchaser in good faith under the decree, while it was subsisting and binding upon the parties thereto, will not be affected by such reversal. The established principle is that a purchaser under a judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction has a right to presume that the court has taken all the necessary steps to investigate the rights of the parties, and that on such investigation the decree or judgment, under which he purchased, was properly passed. He is bound, however, at his peril, to see that all proper parties to be bound were before the court, and that he does not take a title, supposed to be covered by the decree, that may be impeached aliunde.

In the leading case of Bennett v. Hamill, 2 Sch. & Lef. 566, where the whole doctrine is fully examined by Lord Chancellor Redesdale, the bill was filed to impeach and vacate a decree for the sale of an infant's real estate, and to vacate the sale thereunder, upon the ground of collusion in filing the bill, and obtaining the decree, and of certain errors and irregularities in the proceedings, which were alleged to be prejudicial to the rights of the infant. But the chancellor, while admitting the existence of the errors and irregularities in the proceedings as charged, held that the purchaser under the decree, was not to be affected by such errors and irregularities. In the course of his opinion he said:

"But as to Hart's representatives, and Hamill, the question is whether they are persons who can be affected, supposing the circumstances to be clearly true as stated, namely: that there was error in the judgment of the court in not giving a day to show cause and error also in directing a sale under the circumstances. Now on that subject I must confess, after considering this a good deal, I think it would be too much to say that a purchaser under a decree of that description, can be bound to look into all these circumstances. If he is, he must go through all the proceedings from the beginning to the end, and have the opinion of the court that the decree is right in all its parts, and that it would be impossible to alter it in any respect. The cases warrant no such opinion. On the contrary, as far as I can find, the general impression they give is that a purchaser has a right to presume that the court has taken the steps necessary to investigate the rights of the parties; and that it has on that investigation properly decreed a sale. Then he is to see that this is a decree binding the parties claiming the estate; that is, to see that all proper parties to be bound are before the court; and he has further to see that, taking the conveyance he takes a title that cannot be impeached aliunde. He has no right to call upon the court to protect him from a title not in issue in the cause, and no way affected by the decree; but if he gets a proper conveyance of the estate, so that no person whom the decree affects can invalidate his title, although the decree may be erroneous, and therefore to be reversed, I think the title of the purchaser ought not to be invalidated. If we go beyond this, we shall introduce doubts on sales under the authority of the court, which would be highly mischievous."

This opinion of Lord Chancellor Redesdale has been fully adopted by this court on more than one occasion; Elliott v. Knott, 14 Md. 121, 134; Gregory v. Lenning, 54 Md, 52; and the principle of that decision has been asserted by other courts of the highest authority. Lloyd v. Johnes, 9 Ves. 37, 65; Whiting v. Bank of the U. S. 13 Pet. 6 [38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 33]; Jackson v. Robins, 16 Johns. 582.

Indeed, any rule furnishing less security to purchasers under decrees and judgments than that laid down in Bennett v. Hamill, supra, in view of the great number of titles held by the people of this State dependent upon judicial proceedings, would certainly lead to the gravest and most mischievous consequences.

Seeing, then, that the title to be acquired by the appellant under the decree could not be impeached or questioned because of any supposed errors or irregularities in the proceeding, for which a bill of review might lie, and if such bill were filed, possibly the decree might be reversed (a proceeding that cannot now be anticipated), there is no sufficient ground shown for setting aside the sale to the appellant. The order appealed from must therefore be affirmed.

Order affirmed and cause remanded.

Stone, J., concurring:

I agree with the opinion of the court in all respects, except that I think the bill is sufficient, and should not be reversed on bill of review, and that the bill might well have been filed, either in the name of the infant by his guardian or by the guardian of the infant. I can see no substantial difference.

(Decided March 15, 1887.)

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court for Allegany County, modifying a decree for the sale of realty of deceased for the payment of debts, by appointing a receiver to take charge of such realty and collect rents and profits for the benefit of creditors. Reversed in part.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Miller, Robinson, Irving, Stone, Yellott and Bryan, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. James A. McHenry, for appellants.

Messrs. Josiah H. Gordon and Robert H. Gordon, for appellees.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A decree was passed by the Circuit Court for Allegany County, sitting in equity, for the sale of the real estate of Thomas J. McKaig, deceased, on the ground that his personalty was insufficient for the payment of his debts. Afterwards a petition was filed by certain of his creditors praying that a receiver might be appointed to take charge of the real estate of deceased, and collect the rents and profits for the benefit of the creditors.

If the real and personal estate combined were sufficient to pay the debts of the deceased, the creditors would have no reason to apply the rents and profits to their payment. They would be fully paid without a resort to them. If, however, a strong probability of this insufficiency should be shown, a court of equity ought to interfere and appoint a receiver. The creditors ought to be relieved from the hazard of losing their debts, so far as the rents might contribute to secure them. Warfield v. Owens, 4 Gill, 364.

In this case no reasonable ground is shown for inferring that the real and personal estate combined will not be fully adequate to pay the decedent's debts. The application for the appointment of a receiver was heard on petition and answer. In the petition it is not averred that the proceeds of the sale of the real estate will not be adequate to the payment of all the debts, when taken in conjunction with the personalty. In the answer, however, it is distinctly stated that the real estate is abundantly sufficient to pay all the debts of the deceased. When the hearing is on petition and answer, all statements in the answer must be regarded as true, if they are susceptible of proof by legitimate evidence. Crowe v. Wilson, 3 Cent. Rep. 881, 65 Md. 479; Eversole v. Maull, 50 Md. 95.

The court modified the decree originally passed, and in the modified decree appointed receivers of the real estate, with power to rent it. That portion of the decree which appointed receivers must be reversed.

Decree reversed in part, with costs to the appellants in this court, and cause remanded.

In Condict v. King, 2 Beas. 375, the chancellor says: "The expression in a will 'dying without lawful issue,' under a well settled rule of law imported an indefinite failure of issue. Personal property could not be limited over, on so remote a contingency; and consequently under such a gift of a personal chattel the legatee took the absolute property."

The limitation over of a chattel personal is void where the property is vested and not the use only.

Annin v. Vandoren, 1 McCart. 143, and cases there cited.

Those taking under the codicil take only what remains.

In this case the absolute control of the legacy is given by the will. In the codicil, "My executors or the survivor to pay to my daughter Fanny the whole of the interest and so much of the principal as she may need and her circumstances may require from time to time, and whatever may remain at the time of her death to go to her issue equally; and should she have no issue then," etc.

See 2 Roper, Legacies, 1432.

II. There is no limitation over as to any of the fund. Limitations over will not be implied. Express language is necessary.

1 Jarm. Wills, 349; 4 Kent, Com. 531.

The language of the codicil limits the meaning of the testator. "It is my will that so far as relates to the legacy," etc. The bequest is: "I give to my daughter Fanny $4,000, to be paid to her in one year after my decease." He had given other legacies and he adds: "After paying the above legacies, I give, etc., one fourth (to persons named) of the residuum." Again; in speaking of what complainants claim he says, "What may remain of the said Fanny's legacy."

Just construction requires the same word to be used in the same sense, in the same instrument; and so the rule is expressly declared as to a will.

Goodright v. Dunham, 1 Doug. K. B. 268.

In numerous cases in New Jersey it has been held that the words "dying without issue," "have no issue," and "dying without lawful issue," when applied to real estate have been uniformly construed to mean, not a definite failure of issue (which is a failure of issue at the death of the person whose issue if living would take), but an indefinite failure of issue which is "a failure by the deaths of all the descendants of such person, to the remotest generation."

Den, Wardell, v. Allaire, Spencer, 6; Den, Howell, v. Howell, Spencer, 411, 415; 2 Beas. 101, 375; Morehouse v. Cotheal, 1 Zab. 480; 2 Zab. 430; Kent v. Armstrong, 2 Halst. Ch. 640.

In Morehouse v. Cotheal, 2 Zab. 430, the devise was as follows: "A testator gave to S. A. and her heirs forever all the residue of his real and personal estate, but if S. A. should depart this life without leaving lawful issue then to A. R. and to E. W. H. and their heirs as tenants in common." Held: this limitation over is upon an indefinite failure of issue and fails as an executory devise.

On page 439 of 2 Zabriskie reference is made to Osborne v. Shrieve, 3 Mason, 391. The term used is "die leaving no male heir."

In Nightingale v. Burrell, 15 Pick. 104, it was "die and leave no children."

In Ide v. Ide, 5 Mass. 500, it was "die without issue," or "without leaving issue;" and the same in Hawley v. Northampton, 8 Mass. 3, and in Den, Pinkerton, v. Laquear, 1 South. 301, it was "should die and leave no issue;" and in all these cases it was held to refer to an indefinite failure of issue.

In Den, Pinkerton, v. Laquear, the court, C. J. Kirkpatrick, says: "It will be sufficient to say that no principle in our law is more clearly settled than this: that a devise to one for life or for life only, or for life and no longer, and then to the heirs of his body, carries an estate in tail to the devisee."

The Courts of New Jersey have settled what the effect is as to personalty, when as to real estate the language creates an estate tail in the devisee. 2 Beas. 101, 375.

In Van Horne v. Campbell, 1 Cent. Rep. 532, 101 N. Y. 608, it is held "Where in a will a devise is made in words which carry an absolute fee and in a subsequent clause a devise of the same estate is made over upon condition that the first devisee died seised, without issue, the devise over is void. The first taker has an absolute fee whether the estate be real or personal property.

In chapter 41, Vol. 3, Jarman, Wills, p. 296, the general rule is thus stated: "It has long been settled (as to wills made before 1838) that words referring to the death of a person without issue whether the terms be 'if he die without issue;' 'if he have no issue;' 'if he die without having issue;' 'if he die before he has any issue;' or 'for want' or 'in default of issue,' unexplained by the context and whether applied to real or personal estate are construed to import a general indefinite failure of issue."

In the case of Campbell v. Harding, 2 Russ. & M. 390, 13 Eng. Ch. 390, we have a very exhaustive and lucid exposition of this doctrine. The case was first decided by the Vice Chancellor, then by the Lord Chancellor and on appeal from the House of Lords under the name of Caudry v. Campbell, affirmed. All the authorities seem to be here collated, and the case seems to be on all fours with ours.

III. But if a trust was created upon failure of issue definite, then the gift over was only what remained at the death of the first devisee. Such remainder, being the result of a discretionary power of expenditure, vested in the trustee. This is a void bequest, both for uncertainty and because the prior disposition of the property imparted absolute ownership.

Bull v. Kingston, 1 Meriv. 314; Bourn v. Gibbs, 1 Russ. & M. 615, note 1; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1070; 2 Roper, Legacies, 1431.

Bird, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

David Traphagen made his last will August 2, 1836. One clause reads thus: "I give to my daughter Fanny $4,000, to be paid to her in one year after my decease." As to the residue he said: "One fourth part I give to my daughter Fanny." He made his son David executor.

February 1, 1840, he made a codicil to his will, in which he said "It is my will that so far as relates to the legacy in my said will given to my daughter Fanny, that my executors and the survivor of them pay to her the whole of the interest which may accrue on the money given to her, and so much of the principal as she may need and her circumstances may require from time to time, and whatever may remain at the time of her death to go to her issue equally; and should she have no issue then I give the same equally to my grandchildren at the time of her death (that is my grandchildren that may be living at the time of her death)."

By this codicil he appointed his brother Henry executor with his son David. He authorized his executors to make said payments to Fanny whether she should be married or not, and declared that her receipt should be a sufficient voucher. May 20, 1841, he revoked the appointment of his brother Henry as executor, and appointed his daughter Fanny executrix. He died in 1842.

The will and codicils were proved. David and Fanny undertook the burden of the settlement of the estate. They had in hand the $4,000 legacy, the interest of which was so given to Fanny and so much of the principal as she might need or her circumstances require, and also $2,952.41, one fourth of the residue. Fanny died in the year 1885 leaving a will in which the defendant is named as executor thereof.

The grandchildren of the testator named in the codicil claim these legacies at the hands of the executor of Fanny.

The executor of Fanny's will resists this claim. In plain words, the first contention is that both of these legacies were paid over to Fanny in her lifetime, according to the directions of her father's will; that she accepted them as her own private and separate estate, as she had a right to; and that consequently, the defendant, as the executor of her will, cannot be called to an account. Is it true, then, that Fanny received all these moneys according to the plain intent of the testator, as expressed in the codicil? She doubtless became possessed of both sums in full. After the death of her brother, who was coexecutor, she had a right to the possession of the fund. But, as the case stands, did she hold these sums as executor or trustee, or did she hold them in her own right absolutely? Her coexecutor in 1847 assigned to her bonds and mortgages of the estate of the value of $5,300 in the receipt for which she acknowledged taking them "from my brother David Traphagen, executor of my father, and to be allowed him on the legacy and money, in part payment, given me in and by the will of my said father."

David died in 1850, but after he and his sister had made what they regarded as a final settlement of their accounts in the orphans' court. He left a last will and named Joseph Thompson executor. As such executor Judge Thompson had a settlement with Fanny Traphagen September 30, 1852, in which these words and figures are made, "Fanny's legacy bal. due, $2,011.83. "April 1, 1853, inst. thereon, $120.71. "Allowed her for commissions $1,200.00." For these sums she gave a receipt to the executor of David.

Other receipts given by Fanny to her brother, as executor, are produced, showing payments by him to her of moneys; one April 1, 1848, for $275, one April 8, 1850 for $583, and one September 26, 1850 for $230. It does not appear on what account these last three sums were paid her.

It is plain that when David paid Fanny the $5,300, he regarded it as a payment on account of her legacies. It is also plain that when Judge Thompson, as executor of David, paid Fanny the $2,011.83 and $120.71 and the $1,200, he regarded the first two items as payments on account of her legacies.

The question still comes up, Shall the court regard those payments made to her in her right as executor and trustee or in her own individual right? If David intended to pass these moneys over to his sister, as part of her own separate estate, in attempting it, did he comply with the will and codicil under which he was acting? The very first glance at the will and codicil prompts the remark that the testator did not intend the legacy to be paid to Fanny in bulk; he did not intend that she should have the principal as an unqualified gift. It seems quite useless to make observations on this point, but the counsel for defendant pressed their views with great ability, insisting that the two acts, the one by David, in paying the $5,300, and the one by Judge Thompson, in making the other payments, were the exercise of legitimate powers, under the will, and effectually transferred the money to Fanny's private estate. Is this the true view of the case?

By his will the testator gave to Fanny $4,000, payable in one year after his death. Therefore, his first intention was that she should have the entire sum absolutely. But by the codicil he as distinctly says that his executors or the survivor of them shall pay to her the whole of the interest which may accrue on the money given her, and so much of the principal as she may require from time to time. He says the whole of the interest, but in express terms limits the payment of the principal to her needs or to the requirements of circumstances. This plain language cannot be disregarded. In considering the rights of these grandchildren, the court must take it into account. The testator had them in mind and their claims cannot be overlooked.

But, to continue, the testator changed his mind from making an absolute gift, to one depending on the legatee's necessities. Payments were not to depend upon the will of the executor; of this there is not the slightest intimation; for whatever might be their will or wish, the prevailing condition was Fanny's necessities. But it nowhere appears that she was ever in the slightest "need" of funds, or of aid of any description. It nowhere appears that there ever arose any "circumstances" the most remote, "requiring" the payment of any part of the principal. Must not these things appear, when the intention of the testator is so unmistakable, before the grandchildren can be cut off? I think so.

But, again; on whom is the burden? I think on the defendant. He stands in the place of Fanny. Fanny had these moneys. With the facts as they are now presented, had a bill been filed in Fanny's lifetime against her, requiring her to account for these moneys, as trustee, she doubtless would have been required so to do. I cannot imagine any condition which would justify her in resting where the defendant has rested, saying, in effect:

"These moneys were all paid to me; one parcel of $5,300 by my coexecutor, and two other parcels by the executor of my deceased coexecutor; and I accepted them as my own under the will of my father."

I think that the court would have required her to show affirmatively that the principal sums had been paid on the conditions named in the codicil, and that if such conditions had not been satisfied by the proof, Fanny would have been required to render an account of the principal, and to invest it in such manner as to distinguish it, and to preserve its identity.

In the second place it is urged that although these legacies are given upon condition or with a qualification, the condition is void, because the legatee has the absolute power of disposition of the fund. In one of the briefs it is said that if there was any restraint imposed by the first codicil, it was removed by the second, which clothed the same person with both the trust estate and the beneficial interest; adding that the effect is the same as if the testator had said: "I give my daughter Fanny $4,000, she shall hold the same in trust to use the interest and as much of the principal as in her own judgment she needs or her circumstances require. If on her death anything remains, it shall be paid to my grandchildren." I would express it thus in effect; a gift to Fanny, as trustee, to be held by her in trust for herself and the grandchildren of the testator; she to have the interest and so much of the principal as she may need or her circumstances require for her own use, absolutely.

It is maintained that this is an absolute gift of the entire fund. Kendall v. Kendall, 9 Stew. Eq. 91, 96, is cited as sustaining this contention. I think that a very different case from this. The chancellor said: "Though, by the terms of the bequest, the property (which is consumable) is given to her for her natural life, there is also granted to her power to sell it, or any part of it, for her own benefit if she shall see fit so to do. There is no gift over. The authority to sell is evidence of the extent of the interest intended to be given, and is not a mere power. She takes an absolute interest in the property, and not merely a life interest with power of disposition during life." There was no gift over; and the legatee was permitted to sell all or any part of it for her own use, as she might deem best. She was not limited by her necessities. She came to the possession of the goods given as legatee and not as trustee. She had a right to dispose of them as legatee, and not as trustee.

I think the case of The Dutch Church at Freehold v. Smock, Saxton, 148, is as widely different from the one in hand. The testator in that case said: "I also give to my wife the sum of $600, to be at her disposal during her life." I cannot see that this case is controlling. The remarks above made apply to this case with equal force.

Annin's Exr. v. Vandoren, 1 McCart. 185, is regarded as fully analogous to this; but in that case the legacy was given to the legatees, without any qualification respecting their necessities. This clause followed the gift: "Should my daughter Leah or Mary or either of them die, leaving no legal issue, the share or shares herein bequeathed to her or them (if not paid over by my executors, and if paid over then such part thereof as remains unexpended), I give and bequeath unto my surviving children and their heirs equally between them." Here the testator undoubtedly placed the gift within the absolute control of the legatee, if the legatee once acquired possession, and to that extent the general rule applied; but the question discussed and decided was whether the general rule also applied to the moneys which remained unexpended. The court held that it did. The learned chancellor expressed a desire to reach a different conclusion on this branch of the question, but was unable to do so. He observes:

"The uncontrolled power of expenditure necessarily implies absolute ownership, as fully as the power of disposing of it. And this difficulty can only be overcome by limiting the right of expenditure to so much as may be necessary for the support of the legatee." And so, the very method of overcoming a well settled rule of law, suggested by the court in the case of Annin's Exr., we find adopted in the will of Traphagen.

In my judgment this case is not only not decisive but really raises no doubt as to the one in hand.

Nor is the present case within that of Courter v. Howell, 6 Stew. Eq. 80. In that case, although in the first instance the gift of the $3,000 was for life, the testator expressly provided that if the legatee should elect, it might be invested in a house and lot and the conveyance made to her, which of course made it absolutely hers, she having so elected.

I conclude that Fanny took possession of these moneys as executrix or trustee, and that she held them as trustee. So far as appears she exercised and had no right to exercise any other power over them; for the conditions under which she might exercise other rights over them are not proved. It seems to me that it would be a great departure from equitable rules, to allow an executor in such case to appropriate an estate or any part of it to himself, because he chanced to be both legatee and executor. That these moneys were held in trust is shown by the views of Mr. Justice Depue in Pratt v. Douglas, 11 Stew. Eq. 584. See also Thorp v. Owen, 2 Hare, 608, 610, which shows that the court has the power to enforce just such trust as this.

If Fanny was in need of any part of these funds, she might have used them at her own peril; but if in doubt as to the extent of the use, instead of acting as judge in the matter, she could have called on the court for directions; and, through a master, the extent of her necessities could have been ascertained. Woods v. Woods, 1 Mylne & C. 401, 403, 409; Kilvington v. Gray, 10 Sim. 293, 296, 297. This case shows the power of the court and how to exercise it. Raikes v. Ward, 1 Hare, 445.

The argument that a long period of time has elapsed, and that nothing appears among Fanny's papers to show that she held these moneys as trustee and must therefore have held them in her own right, I think is unsound and dangerous. To protect a trustee from accounting, because of the lapse of time and because he has kept no accounts, or has seen fit to appropriate and claim all of the trust estate as his own, would be exceeding any liberality heretofore exercised by the courts towards that class; if such doctrine were to prevail it would prove disastrous to all interests of cestuis que trust.

I think that the codicil operates upon both legacies, the $4,000 as well as the residuum. The testator in said codicil speaks of the legacy and of the money given to Fanny. Now both are legacies; and both are money. If it should be thought that the testator meant only one of them, it would be impossible to say which. I have no doubt that he meant both.

Fanny was never married, and consequently had no issue at the time of her death. In this event, the codicil gives the legacies to certain of the testator's grandchildren, being the complainants. I conclude that they are clearly entitled to the $4,000, and the $2,952.41, with interest on both sums from the time of Fanny's death.

The complainants are entitled to costs.

Mary A. WILSON et al.
v.
Joseph WILSON et al.

In a suit to quiet title, when an issue as to the title was framed and tried by a jury, and the justice before whom the issue was tried certified that, in his opinion, the verdict was warranted by the evidence, and it does not appear that any error of law was committed at the trial, and no reason for setting aside the verdict being found, the decree will be in accordance with the verdict.

(Decided April 30, 1887.)

BILL to quiet title. On motion to set aside verdict for complainants and counter motion for decree upon the verdict. Decree for complainants.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. S. Savage, for complainants.

Mr. W. Brinkerhoff, for defendants.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This is a suit to quiet title brought under the Act "to compel the determination of claims to real estate in certain cases and to quiet the title to the same." Rev. p. 1189.

It is brought by Mary A. Wilson and her husband against Joseph Wilson and his wife, to quiet the title of Mary A. Wilson to certain real estate at Iselin (formerly Uniontown) in the County of Middlesex, in this State.

The bill alleges that the property in question was conveyed to Mary A. Wilson in fee, by

Jacob Wilson, her father-in-law, in 1883, by deed delivered in July of that year, in consideration of her marriage to his son, whom, at the grantor's request and in consideration of his agreement to make such conveyance, she married in March of that year; that after the deed was delivered to her she redelivered it to her father-in-law for safe keeping, and it remained in his custody unrecorded, at the time of his death, which occurred in May, 1885; that she has had possession of the property ever since her marriage; that her title is disputed by the defendant Joseph Wilson, brother of her grantor, who claims under a deed from her grantor to him made in 1881, which the complainants allege was made without consideration, and merely in trust for the grantor, who was then engaged in a litigation, and who made the conveyance to prevent the property from being subject to any judgment which might be recovered against him therein; and they also allege that at the time of making that conveyance the grantee executed and delivered to the grantor a deed reconveying the property, which latter deed was never recorded.

The defendants by their answer set up title to the property under the before mentioned deed of 1881, from Jacob Wilson, Sr., to Joseph Wilson, and allege that that deed was made and delivered in good faith for the consideration of $16,000 paid by the grantee to the grantor for the property, and that it was given and taken for the use and benefit of the grantee and his heirs and assigns, and not in any way in trust for the grantor or to protect the property from any judgment; and they deny that any reconveyance by the grantee to the grantor was ever made. On motion of the counsel of the complainants an order was made directing that an issue at law be framed in the supreme court (to be tried by a special or struck jury, unless one should not be ready at the term fixed for the trial in which case it was to be tried by a common jury) to inquire, ascertain and determine in the ordinary way whether the complainants or the defendants are seised in fee of the premises.

An issue was framed accordingly, to determine whether the complainant Mary A. Wilson is the owner in fee simple of the property. The issue was, as appears by the postea, duly tried at the Middlesex Circuit, by a struck jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the complainant Mary A. Wilson. The justice of the supreme court before whom the issue was tried certifies that it was duly tried, and that in his opinion the verdict was warranted by the evidence. It is not alleged and it does not appear that any error of law was committed at or in the conduct of the trial; and the judge is satisfied with the result.

I have read with great care all the testimony, and find no reason for setting aside the verdict upon any ground.

There will be a decree for the complainants in accordance with the finding of the jury.

George COCKS et al.,

v.

Anna VARNEY et al.

1. On demurrer to a bill filed by devisees, to compel an account and payment by executors of what is due complainants for their share of the estate, held, that, as the testator was domiciled in the State of New York and his will was proved there, and it does not appear that it was ever proved in this State, the executors can not be required to come to an account here for their dealings with the estate.

2. Relief against all the defendants as executors and relief against one of the defendants as mortgagee of trust property with notice of the trust, are distinct matters having no connection with each other; in the latter the executors as such have no interest. A bill uniting all such matters is multifarious.

Bill for relief. On general demurrers. Allowed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. N. McCarter, for demurrants.

Mr. R. Allen, Jr., for complainants:

Cited Crane v. Hearn, 11 C. E. Green, 378; Brice v. Stokes, 11 Ves. 324; 5 Stew. Eq. 611; 9 Stew. Eq. 522; 13 Stew. Eq. 14; Brownlee v. Lockwood, 5 C. E. Green, 239; 74 N. Y. 539.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill states that John Cocks, deceased, late of New York, the grandfather of the complainants, by his will provided that one fifth of the residue of his estate should be invested by his executors and the interest thereof applied by them to the support of his son David (the father of the complainants) and his wife and children, and that at David's death the share should go to David's children; that the will was proved in the State of New York and letters testamentary thereon issued there to the executors, who were the testator's sons David and Harrison, and his daughter Phebe, and Daniel E. Haviland, her husband, his daughter Mary and George J. Barlow, her husband, and his daughter Anna Cocks, who after his death became the wife of Charles Varney; that Barlow, with the consent of the other executors, got all the estate into his hands and with part of the above mentioned share bought a house and lot in Monmouth County, and took the title in his own name; and after mortgaging the property to one Wardell Ivins (now deceased) for $400 and to Mrs Varney for $4,000, conveyed it, subject to the mortgages, to the complainants whose father was then dead.

The bill alleges that that is all that the complainants have received for or on account of their share of the estate, and that the share was of far greater value than that property. It also states that Mrs. Varney knew when she took her mortgage (it was taken in the lifetime of David Cocks) that the property had been bought with money which was part of the before mentioned share; and it also alleges that she, as executrix, was liable to the complainants for a far greater sum on account of that share than the amount which she claims is due to her upon the mortgage. Ivins' administrator has begun a suit to foreclose his mortgage, to which suit she is a party. The bill prays an account of the estate of John Cocks from the surviving executors, and that they may be decreed to pay over to the complainants what is due to them for their share. It also seeks to restrain Mrs. Varney from collecting or parting with her mortgage, and prays that it may be canceled.

Mr. and Mrs. Haviland and Mr. Varney demur to the bill, upon the ground of want of jurisdiction as to the relief prayed against the executors, and for multifariousness; and Mrs. Varney demurs, upon the ground of want of jurisdiction as to the discovery and relief in respect to the estate, and answers the rest of the bill.

The testator was domiciled in the State of New York, and his will was proved there. It does not appear that it was ever proved in this State. The executors, therefore, cannot be required to come to an account here for their dealings with the estate. The demurrers are well taken on that point.

And so too as to the other ground of objection. Relief against all of the defendants as executors and relief against Mrs. Varney as mortgagee of trust property, with notice of the trust, are manifestly distinct matters, having no connection with each other. In the latter the executors as such have no interest.

The demurrers will be allowed.

v.
Mayor etc., of City of NEWARK.

1. In a suit brought by the Attorney-General to establish a trust in certain land in Newark, known as "The Old Burying Ground," and to restrain the mayor etc., of that City from removing from such land the remains of persons buried there, etc., held, that the City has no title to the land in question, except such as it may have under the Act of 1804 and its charter; that, if the Indian title is valid, the City has no title under it.
2. If the title to the land was held by the Township under the Act of 1804 merely in trust for use as a burial ground, the City holds it in like manner and upon the same trust. It cannot sell the land, nor release or extinguish the use for which the land was dedicated, nor employ it in any way variant from the purposes for which it was designed.
3. The City, if it holds the title in trust, holds it for the use of the property as a burying ground and for no other use whatever: and if the Act of 1886 gives the City the power to destroy the trust, such Act is unconstitutional.
4. If a grant is made to a municipal corporation, charged with a trust in favor of an individual, private corporation or charity, the interest which the cestui que trust or beneficiary has under the grant may sustain it against legislative revocation.
5. The Act of 1886 cannot be supported under what is known as the police power of the Legislature; the Act is not an exercise of that power.
6. A trust for a burying place devotes the ground to the perpetual repose of the remains of the dead.
7. The fact that the place in question has become a nuisance, from the neglect by the City to take proper care of it, is no reason why the City should be permitted to go still further and destroy the use altogether.

(Decided April 19, 1887.)

BILL for an injunction. On order to show cause upon bill and answer. Preliminary injunction allowed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Cortlandt Parker, for complainants:

I. The trust in the deed of 1696 is not of a burying place for all people, but only for "the old settlers, their heirs and assigns." It was dated 1696; the settlement was in 1666, when sixty-four men came, whose names were recorded. There was no uncertainty in the trust.

The contemplated use "for a public market" is forbidden.

The relators are descendants of the old settlers, and have the interests of cestuis que trust; and but for the ordinance of the City, forbidding all interments in the City, they have a legal right in the soil. They certainly have the right to protect their forefathers' graves and monuments. The grantors of the deed contemplated use, protection, and preservation.

II. If the use is not for the heirs and assigns of the old settlers only, then it is for the use of all inhabitants of Newark, and is still an enforceable trust impressed upon the land. It is a charitable use.

Dexter v. Gardner, 7 Allen, 243; Re Beekman St. Ch. 4 Bradf. 503.

At any rate it is a good use and enforceable at the suit of the Attorney-General.

If the original deed was void for uncertainty, the City has nothing to do with the property; but why is the deed for the use of the old settlers and their heirs and assigns any more uncertain than for the use of the inhabitants of Newark, their heirs and assigns?

III. What was the effect of the Law of 1804?

1. Not to change the cestuis que trust. That it could not do.

2. Not to expound the words of the deed so as to do this. That is not legislation. The Legislature cannot explain words in a deed.

3. Not to devest the trust from the land; on the contrary it intensified its force.

4. Its only effect was to change the trustees; this it had the right and power to do.

IV. What was the effect of the Act of 1848?

It was in aid of the City to protect part of the ground which it had taken for its own use and profit. The City proposed to the Legislature to protect, preserve and maintain these grounds in consideration of profits arising from part of the land which it had taken and in consideration of which promise the Legislature gave them a clear title to such portion, and a contract was thus formed which the City is now estopped to deny.

V. What effect had the Law of 1886 upon this trust? None, because,

1. It refers to cases where there is a holding of lands by the City, i.e., where they are the property of the City.

2. It refers to lands held by cities "for burial purposes," but the City never held this land for that purpose. It holds it now to protect and preserve decently that which is there.

3. The City does own a burial ground and it is affected by a trust to devote it to that use. Municipal Laws, p. 359.

4. The Act is void on its face. The trust referred to in such Act cannot be devested by the Legislature.

5. The Act is void as impairing the obligation of a contract, and as impairing vested right.

6. The Act is a private, local, and special Act.

VI. No case can be found where a trustee is authorized by an Act to abrogate his trust and himself enjoy the proceeds.

Mr. R. Wayne Parker, also for complainants:

The right of sepulture is a vested right; the trust for that purpose is a charitable use. The monuments and the right to their present location belong to the heirs of the dead, and the kindred of the departed have a legal interest in the safety of their graves, which a court of equity will protect.

We have in this case a charitable use for the burial of the dead, recognized not only by the deed of 1696, but by the Acts of 1804 and 1848, the latter of which provides funds for the keeping of the burial grounds in repair.

The Act of 1886, although general in its scope, was aimed at the conversion of this burial ground into a public market and is unconstitutional: 1, as a special Act, there being no other burial ground in the State embraced in its terms; 2, it is confined by its terms to cases where there is a special trust, and attempts to abrogate such trust and the contract on which it is founded.

Dartmouth Coll. Case.

The general Statute of 1886 does not repeal by implication the special Statute of 1848.

Anderson v. Hill, 13 Vroom, 351; Sheridan v. Stevenson, 15 Vroom, 378.

There is a special trust in this case. The land is in trust for use as for a burial place for the old settlers and their heirs. The relators and all descendants of the old settlers are such heirs, and have a fixed interest by the deed, as recognized by the statutes in these identical lands and the individual and separate graves. Of this no statute can deprive them. The monuments are by common law an heirloom, descending from ancestor to heir, and as to which they have an actual legal right.

Mr. Joseph Coult, for defendant.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This suit is brought by the Attorney-General, by information, at the relation of Henry Congar and others, and by the relators as complainants, against the Mayor and Common Council of the City of Newark to establish a trust in certain land in Newark known as "The Old Burying Ground," and to restrain the defendant from removing from that land the remains of persons buried there and to compel the defendant to keep and maintain the ground in decent and proper order so as to protect the remains and memorials therein from desecration.

The bill states that the relators and complainants are citizens of Newark and heirs and descendants of the old settlers of the Town of Newark; and they bring suit not only for themselves but also for the benefit of all such other citizens, heirs and descendants as may be made parties, and for the protection of the charitable use to which the burying ground was, as they allege, devoted.

The bill states that on the 10th of December, 1696, shortly after the settlement of the Town, the proprietors of the Province of East New Jersey, in pursuance of the concessions to actual settlers thereof theretofore made by them, granted to John Curtis, John Treat, Theophilus Pierson and Robert Young, of the Town of Newark, certain parcels of land in Newark for public use, among which was a tract including the land in question, which tract is described in the deed as "All that small tract therein allotted for the burying place, taking in the pond and meeting house, being seven chains in length and four in width, bounded west by John Treat, south by John Johnston, north and east by highways;" that as to that land the grant was made and was in the deed declared to be made to the grantees and their heirs, to the only proper use, benefit and behoof of the old settlers of the Town of Newark, their heirs and assigns forever, in common; and that it was also therein declared that the land was granted to be and remain for the use in the deed expressed and to be appropriated to no other use or uses whatever.

The complainants allege that the greater part of that tract was then and thereafter used for and devoted to the use of a burial place for the people of the Town, those who settled the place, the old settlers, and their heirs and assigns, and that it has been reserved and kept for such purpose and has been known as "The Old Burying Ground," and that there have been buried in it from time to time deceased persons, people of the Town, old settlers and their heirs and descendants and that the memorials of such deceased persons have been erected there and that some of them still remain; that about the 15th of February, 1804, the Legislature of the State, for the purpose of vesting the legal estate in the property upon the same trust and to the same use upon and to which it had been granted, passed an Act by which it was recited that the inhabitants, the first settlers of Newark, on their first settlement, after purchasing all the lands lying within the bounds of the Town of the native Indians, proceeded to parcel them out among themselves and such settlers as thought proper at various times to settle in the Town according to the rules and regulations established by the first settlers respecting their admission, at the same time reserving certain portions of land in various parts of the Town for public purposes; and that doubts having arisen as to the validity of the Indian title it was afterwards thought advisable by the inhabitants of the Town to take a grant from the proprietors of East New Jersey, for the confirmation of their rights to that public land; and that as the inhabitants of the Town were not incorporated and were incapable of taking a legal estate it was thought advisable to take the grant in the names of certain trustees for the use of the inhabitants, which grant was accordingly taken on the 10th of October, 1696, in the names of John Curtis, John Treat, Theophilus Pierson and Robert Young, to have and to hold, to them, their heirs and assigns forever, to the only proper use, benefit and behoof of the old settlers of the Town, their heirs and assigns forever, in common (the lands) granted to be and remain to and for the several uses therein particularly expressed and to be appropriated to no other use or uses whatsoever; that the original trustees were all dead and the heir of the survivor not known to be resident in Newark; and that through the ignorance of those infant times the use created in the grant, although really meant for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Town of Newark and their successors, yet was so inartificially expressed as to render it difficult for the then inhabitants of the Town, as incorporated by law to assert their rights to the premises; by means whereof the lands contained in the grant and originally reserved by the first settlers for public purposes were exposed to encroachments and other injuries without a competent remedy therefor, either in law or equity; and it was thereby enacted that the trust estate vested in the trustees, their heirs and assigns forever, by the deed from the proprietors for the only proper use, benefit and behoof of the old settlers of the Town of Newark, their heirs and assigns forever, should thenceforth cease and be void, and that the estate so vested in those trustees, their heirs and assigns forever, should be vested in the inhabitants of the Township of Newark in the County of Essex as incorporated by law, and their successors forever; and that they were thereby vested with the legal title thereto, as fully and absolutely as though they had been originally named in the grant in the place of the original trustees; saving the rights of bona fide purchasers without notice of the trust; provided that nothing in the Act should in any way extend to or affect the parsonage lands described in the grant or such parts of the burying ground as had been leased or sold by the First Presbyterian Church in Newark before the first of January then last, or the ground upon which the market then stood. And it was thereby further enacted that the estate vested by the Act in the inhabitants of the Township should be appropriated and forever remain to and for the several uses in the before mentioned original patent (the deed from the proprietors) expressed and for no other use or uses whatever.

The bill further states that in 1836 the City was incorporated and thereupon by force of the laws of this State became subject to all the responsibilities of the Township and succeeded to the duties of the inhabitants of the Township as trustees; that it thus obtained the legal title to the land in question and that it was its duty to protect and preserve the property to the uses to which it was originally devoted, but that it has not only neglected its duty in that behalf but now proposes to remove the remains from the ground and devote the land to use as a public market for the sale of meat and vegetables, and to let it out for hire for those purposes accordingly; and that its action in the manner is under an Act of the Legislature passed in 1886, and obtained by the City itself, by which it was enacted that where lands held by the cities or municipalities of this State for burial purposes are or may be affected by any trust that they shall be devoted to that use and in the judgment of the common council or other governing body the public good will be served by devoting such lands to other public uses, it shall and may be lawful in every such case to use such lands for any public purpose or use to which, in the judgment of the common council or other governing body, they are best adapted; and that in case interments have at any time been made in such lands or any part thereof, the common council or other governing body shall cause the remains so interred to be removed to some suitable and proper burial place, and make proper and reasonable provision therefor and for the protection thereof; and to that end may make such reasonable appropriation of public moneys as may be necessary.

The bill attacks that Act, upon the ground that it is really a private, special and local law within the meaning of the Constitution, and alleges that there are no other cities or municipalities in this State, except the City of Newark, which hold land in trust for burial purposes; that no public notice was given, of the intention to apply for the Act, nor of the object of it; and that the passage of the Act was forbidden by the Constitution of this State, because of the want of such notice and because the Act vacates public grounds.

The answer states that the first settlers came in May, 1666; that soon after they came they laid out the land of which they had taken possession without leave or license, claiming it by occupation, and divided it among themselves into what they called home lots; that in order to secure a more perfect title, they bought the land from the Indians and took from them three conveyances therefor, one in 1666 and the others in 1667; that in laying out the town site they reserved streets, squares and public places for the common benefit of the people of the Town; that among the portions so allotted was the tract set apart for a church and burial place and that that was common property; that soon after the settlement the only building for religious worship in the Town was built upon the property; and that in accordance with the original design of the settlers the bodies of all the settlers who died were there interred; and that the property was common to all the inhabitants, the meeting house for worship, and the burying ground for interment; that up to 1713 the form of government of the Town was a pure democracy, in which all who lived in the settlement and were entitled to a vote were obliged to participate; that in that year the tract then known as the Town of Newark was by royal patent created a township by the name of the "Trustees of the Freeholders and Inhabitants of the Township of Newark," and the government was thenceforward to 1798 carried on under that charter; that in the last mentioned year the Township was incorporated and that the City was incorporated in 1836; that from the earliest settlement the lands in dispute or portions thereof were used as a burying ground and interments were made in it from time to time of the bodies of persons who were inhabitants of the Town, but that it was always common property under the control of the public; that the settlers denied the right of the Indians, although they took the before mentioned deeds from them, and they denied the right of the proprietors, and they held possession for over thirty years before they took from the proprietors the deed mentioned in the bill, which they took as a merely confirmatory conveyance; that it was not intended that that deed should impose any unalterable trust upon the property in question or impress upon it a perpetual use; but the answer alleges that the words relied upon in the bill to establish the use are merely words of description denoting the use to which the inhabitants of the Town had put the land, and were used in order to designate them with absolute certainty; that after the making of the deed of the proprietors the land continued to be used by the public in the same way and to the same extent as before that time, and that in consequence of the doubts which had always existed as to the right and title of the public thereto and to quiet the title, the Act of 1804 was passed; that, subject to such limitations as were by that Act put upon its power, the City had a lawful right and full authority to take such measures as were expedient for the care and custody of the grounds and the preservation of the remains and monuments therein; that the tract lies in the heart of the City and is surrounded by the most populous and valuable portion of the City; that no interments have been made there for many years, and that on account of the peculiar situation and location of the property it has now become unsuitable for burials; that originally the whole of it was used in common by the people of the Town, for purposes of worship and interment, but as the land grew more and more valuable, encroachments were made upon the Broad and Market Street fronts which are now, with a small exception, covered with business buildings in which large amounts of money are invested; that in making such encroachments the persons who claim to be the owners of the buildings have actually erected them upon parts of the land in which interments were made, and that it has been impossible for the City to protect the property from desecration; that it has been and is now open to the common use of the public and is used as a rendezvous for immoral persons, and as a depository for rubbish, and for a long time has been a public nuisance; and that by virtue of its general control over the grounds and under the terms of the Act of 1886, the City has determined that the general good of the community and all considerations of respect for the memory of the early settlers of Newark whose bodies are buried there require that the use to which the premises have been so long devoted should be determined, and that proper measures should be taken to care for the remains of those deceased persons and to perpetuate their memories; that the City proposes to reinter the remains to be removed, in an appropriate place, and erect a suitable monument over them; that it proposes to occupy the land for a market, but only temporarily, and that it intends to get another place for such market hereafter, and to relieve the land in question from use as a market place.

It is evident from the foregoing full statement of the main contents of the pleadings that the City has no title to the land in question, except such as it may have under the Act of 1804, and the charter which provides that the Mayor and Common Council and their successors shall, by virtue of the charter, become and be absolutely and completely vested with, possess and enjoy all the lands, tenements, hereditaments, property, rights, causes of action and estate whatsoever, both in law and equity, in possession, reversion or remainder, which at the time of the passing of the charter were vested in the Township as a corporation, according to such estate and interest as the Township, as a corporation at the time of the passing of the charter, had or of right ought to have therein. P. L. 1836, p. 185, and P. L. 1857, p. 117.

If the title to the land was held by the Township under the Act of 1804, merely in trust for the purposes of the charity (use as a burial ground), the City holds it in like manner and upon the same trust. But it is urged by the answer that the City holds it irrespective of the Act of 1804 as public property generally, without the impress of a trust or of devotion to any particular use upon it. This claim cannot be sustained. How did the City get title, if not under the Act of 1804? And what title has it except such title? Before that Act the title was in the grantees under the deed from the proprietors or the survivors or survivor of them or the heir at law of the last survivor.

If it be conceded that the Indian title is valid, the City has no title to the land under it. If the land was dedicated to public use as a burying ground by the old settlers, the power of the City over it under such dedication is (apart from the Act of 1886) only for the protection and regulation of the public use. It cannot sell the land nor release or extinguish the use for which the land was dedicated, nor employ it in any way variant from the purposes for which it was designed. Trustees v. Mayor of Hoboken, 4 Vroom, 13.

Under the Act of 1804 the title was vested in the Township as a corporation, to be appropriated and forever remain to and for the several uses expressed in the deed from the proprietors, and for no other use or uses whatever. The City, if it took the title under that Act and its charter, took it subject to that provision and with that trust impressed upon it.

In Montpelier v. East Montpelier, 27 Vt. 704, it was held that land held in trust by the original Town of Montpelier did not pass to the new Towns of Montpelier and East Montpelier, created out of the territory of the original town (the court held that by force of the provisions of the Act the original town ceased to exist), although the Act provided that all property then owned and possessed by the original town should be thereafter owned and enjoyed by the new towns in certain proportions. The City then, if it holds the title in trust, holds it for the use of the property as a burying ground and for no other use whatever unless the Act of 1886 has given it power to abolish the use. That Act is an Act to destroy the trust. If it be conceded that there is no valid objection to it, on the grounds mentioned in the bill (a subject which it is not necessary to pass upon at this time), and the Act be regarded as a general law, it may be characterized as an enactment empowering the municipal authorities at will to destroy the trusts in all such cases.

As such it is in my judgment unconstitutional. It is not within the power of the Legislature to abolish such trusts as that on which the City if it has title to the old burying ground holds that property. It is established law that if a grant is made to a municipal corporation charged with a trust in favor of an individual private corporation or charity, the interest which the cestui que trust or beneficiary has under the grant may sustain it against legislative revocation; a vested equitable interest being property in the same sense and entitled to the same protection as a legal interest. Cooley, Const. Lim. 278.

In Montpelier v. East Montpelier, 29 Vt. 12, it was said that grants of property to municipal corporations in trust for other purposes than corporate and municipal use, are no more the subject of legislative control than are the private and vested rights of individuals. It is urged on behalf of the City that this Act may be supported under what is known as the police power of the Legislature, by virtue of which it may, to protect the health of the public, exercise directly, or by delegating it to the municipality, the power of directing the removal of bodies from a graveyard. It is enough to say on this head that the Act is not an exercise of that power.

According to the answer, it may be remarked, no interments have been made in the ground in question for nearly sixty years. The Act provides that when lands held by the cities and municipalities of the State for burial purposes are or may be affected by any trust, they shall be devoted to that use; and if in the judgment of the common council or other governing body the public good will be served by devoting such lands to other public uses it shall and may be lawful in every such case to use such lands for any public use to which in the judgment of the common council or other governing body they are best adapted. This is not a grant based upon the power to prevent or abate nuisances, but construed as the defendant construes it, it is a gift of power to the common council or other governing body to put (entirely at their discretion) land granted to the municipality in trust for burial purposes, whether located in or out of the city or municipality, to any or other public use to which they may think it best adapted; and that too without reference to any consideration of the public health to justify it.

Nor can it justly be claimed that in view of the fact that no interments have been made for so long a period, since 1829, the use has ceased. The object of burial is not to put the dead away temporarily, merely, but to place them in a final resting place. When land is given in trust for a burial place, it obviously can by no means be said that the trust is at an end when the last body which can be buried in it has been deposited. The expectation in the burial of the dead is that they are to remain permanently; and the unauthorized disturbance of their remains is regarded with abhorrence, as a desecration, and is criminal. A trust for a burying place devotes the ground to the perpetual repose of the remains of the dead. It dedicates it to uses of the most sacred character. The burying ground is God's Acre.

In Campbell v. Liverpool, L. R. 9 Eq. 579, by Act of Wm. III, land belonging to the Parish of Liverpool was set apart and dedicated to the use of a burial ground; and by the sentence of consecration the corporation renounced all right to the land. In 1854 the ground was closed against burials by an order in council. In 1866 the corporation (being authorized to take a part of the ground, under an improvement Act) refused to pay for the land to be taken, on the ground that the land reverted to the corporation on the closing of the ground against burials and that on such closing the use came to an end; it was held that the land had been dedicated forever to the use of a burial ground; that there was no reverter to the corporation, and that the court would, if necessary, presume a conveyance of the legal estate. See also Moreland v. Richardson, 24 Beav. 33.

Manifestly the fact that the place in question has become a nuisance from the neglect by the City, of its duty to take proper care of it, is no reason why the City should now be permitted to go still further and destroy the use altogether. By an Act of March 3, 1848 (P. L. 1848, p. 152) the fact that the City had authorized or permitted encroachments upon the ground was recognized, as also the fact that it derived revenue for such encroachments; and it was provided that it should be the duty of the Mayor and Common Council to protect and preserve the ground as then inclosed and the inclosures thereof. It may be added that the nuisances mentioned in the answer are all of them such as the City may prevent.

A preliminary injunction will be allowed according to the prayer of the bill.

HUNT
v.
HUNT.

1. Proceedings in a cause in partition, showing that certain lands were sold to defendant and that the court approved the sale, are relevant evidence to show that defendant accepted a deed for the land named in such proceedings.
2. A transcript of the proceedings in a cause in partition in a court of another State, duly authenticated, according to the Act of Congress, to make it evidence in this State, except that the seal of the court annexed to the certificate of the clerk is not impressed on wax, is admissible in evidence, notwithstanding the absence of wax or anything in the nature of wax from the seal.

(Filed April 23, 1887.)

On objections to the ruling of a master in admitting in evidence a certified transcript of proceedings of a court of another State. Ruling of the Master sustained.

The question presented is stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. James Buchanan, for complainant.

Mr. W. D. Holt, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

On the examination of witnesses before the master, the complainant offered in evidence by way of rebuttal what purports to be a transcript of the proceedings in a cause in partition in one of the counties in Missouri. The defendant objected to its admission, on the grounds that it is irrelevant and that it is not properly authenticated.

First, as to the relevancy of the facts appearing on the face of the record: one of the principal points in dispute is whether or not the defendant ever accepted a deed for the land named in the proceedings certified. The fact appears that certain land was sold to him, and that the court approved the sale. How far such a fact, judicially ascertained, will be efficacious need not now be determined; but that it is relevant cannot be doubted.

Second, as to the authentication. This objection rests on the absence of wax, or anything in the nature of wax, from the certificate. The want of wax makes the whole record a nullity! The want of wax deprives it of all solemnity, of all certainty, of all truthfulness!! It is said that the Act of Congress makes wax the sine qua non of such a paper; and it is said that the Supreme Court of the State of New York has pronounced such interpretation as the only true one of the Act. Coit v. Millikin, 1 Denio, 376.

I am a great admirer of precedents. It is a great relief to be sheltered and protected by an adjudication of a most distinguished court. But when such decision is not of one's own State and it seems to be against reason, and to violate the principles of justice and equity, and not to be required by any sound public policy, I think a judge may be pardoned, if it is not followed.

Now, Congress intended to facilitate judicial proceedings, not to obstruct or embarrass the administration of them. Congress intended to promote and to secure justice and equity, and therefore declared that a copy of the record or judicial proceedings at length, accompanied by the attestation of the clerk, and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form, shall have full faith and credit.

Congress was much more liberal than those who have been called upon to interpret its Acts. Congress said that the seal of the court should be annexed; but Congress was not so worshipful of the seal as to assign to it the sole arbiter of the rights of men, for it distinctly declared that such judicial proceedings shall be entitled to equal credit when they come from a forum which has no seal.

In this case the clerk certifies that he has affixed the seal of the said court. This makes it most clear that the court in which the proceedings were had have adopted what it regards as a seal, without the use of wax. To that court it is a seal, to all intents and purposes. But suppose I take it upon myself to say it is not a seal, and reject the record, what follows? The rejection of the record, and for aught that can now be foreseen, the failure of justice. Can this be overcome? Can any one State say to another, You shall use wax in affixing your seals, if you expect your judicial proceedings to have credit abroad?

Such an attitude would not prove beneficial to anyone, much less to the suitor whose rights may be imperiled. Suppose that A has brought his action against B in Missouri for the recovery of $10,000 upon B's note, which action B has fairly and successfully resisted, and that afterwards A brings another action on the same note in New Jersey, and B offers the proceedings of the formal trial and adjudication, in all respects complete, except that the seal of the court is not impressed on wax, and B has been disabled from making his former defense, by the death of witnesses or otherwise, would it be right, in any sense, to reject such proceedings because of the absence of a little wax?

I do not see how such rejection could be justified. If, under the Act of Congress, everything in the shape of a seal may be dispensed with and the proceedings, when certified, entitled to credit, then surely, in all reason, when the clerk certifies that he has affixed the seal of the court, every solemnity appears, even though the wax is absent.

I conclude that the Master was right in overruling the objections and admitting the proceedings of the cause as certified from the court in Missouri.

The complainant is entitled to costs.

BILL for an injunction to restrain a sale by an executor. Decree for complainants.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. John W. Taylor, for complainants.

Mr. Robert McCarter, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following opinion:

James Tomkins died, leaving a will. He gave to his grandson, James S. Howell, his farm, lying in the County of Morris, his horses, cattle and farming utensils, on condition that he should secure and provide a comfortable maintenance and support for Eliza, the daughter of the testator and mother of James, and to Sarah, a granddaughter of testator and a sister of James. He also gave to James all the furniture in his house on said farm:

"To him and his heirs forever * * * Which I give and bequeath to him, my said grandson, in trust, for the use of his mother during her lifetime, and to his sister, Sarah Jane Howell, during her minority."

He also gave him a bond and mortgage for $1,300, directing the interest to be appropriated for the use and support of his said daughter and granddaughter. He then says:

"And when my grandson, James S. Howell, shall arrive at the full age of twenty-one years he shall have full power and authority to sell and dispose of any or all of the above named real and personal estate devised and bequeathed to him, or any part or parcel thereof, by and with the consent of his mother, Eliza Howell. And in case my said grandson, James S. Howell, shall not survive his mother, Eliza Howell, then I do order that the aforesaid severally named bequests to the said James S. Howell shall revert back to my son, Floyd W. Tomkins, to be held in trust by him, in all respects, in the same manner and in the same use as was intended the same should have been done by James S. Howell, to wit: for the use and support of my said daughter, Eliza, and Sarah Jane, her daughter, and to her heirs after her. But if the said Sarah Jane die before she arrives at the age of maturity, and without issue, then it is my will, and I do order, that the said legacies in trust be equally divided between the surviving children of my son, Floyd W. Tomkins, share and share alike."

He named Floyd W. Tomkins sole executor. The will bore date March 31, 1855. On February 14, 1859, he made a codicil, in which he revoked the provision requiring the consent of his mother to the sale of the real and personal estate, and said:

"And do hereby order and direct the same to be sold, by and with the consent of my executors, if they think proper."

And concluded the codicil thus:

"Lastly. And whereas, my grandchild, James S. Howell, has arrived at full age since my making my last will and testament, I hereby constitute and appoint the said James S. Howell coexecutor, jointly and together with my son, Floyd W. Tomkins, as named in my last will and testament."

James S. Howell died in April, 1866. The said Sarah Jane has arrived at the age of maturity, has been married eleven years, and has two children. The said Eliza, since the death of her husband, has occupied the said farm and enjoyed the rents and profits, and desires to continue so to do during her natural life. Both Eliza and Sarah Jane, the mother and daughter, claim to be the beneficial owners of the rents and profits of said farm, and consequently of the right to the possession thereof during the lifetime of the said Eliza; and the said Sarah Jane claims that having arrived at the age of maturity under the law, the fee of the said farm is vested in her absolutely. And if this be not so in strict law, they have the right of election and, in the exercise of that right, to continue to take the rents and profits, or to take the land absolutely, discharged of the trust named in the will.

Such right they claim to have exercised, and insist that this court shall declare and give effect to that right by decreeing that they are not only entitled to the rents and profits, during the lifetime of Eliza, but to the actual possession and control of the said farm without the interference of the said executor, and that at the death of the said Eliza, the said Sarah Jane, her heirs and assigns, will be entitled to the fee.

The determination of this question has been precipitated by the desire of the executor to sell the farm, to restrain which a preliminary injunction was granted.

Should this injunction be made perpetual? The bill might have been so framed as to have obtained the aid of the court in preventing a sale, upon the ground that it would be more beneficial to the cestuis que trust to possess and enjoy the farm, and the rents and profits, than to receive the interest of the consideration money in case of the sale. But the bill is not so framed. Its construction is such as to go to the root of the matter, and to warrant the court in putting such an interpretation upon the will as will determine the rights of the parties thereunder. With this in view, the question arising was discussed before me.

The defendant insists that the title is vested in Floyd W. Tomkins, and that he is entitled to the whole estate, subject only to the trusts imposed during the lifetime of said Eliza and Sarah Jane. This I think is a forced construction, and not in accordance with the meaning of the testator. It seems to me that in one event, that is, the death of Sarah Jane before maturity and without issue, the said estate would have passed, not to Floyd W. Tomkins, but to his children; but in the event of Sarah Jane arriving at the age of maturity or having issue before her death, she was entitled to the whole estate after the death of her mother. And this clause, it seems to me, justifies such construction, viz:

"And in case my said grandson, James S. Howell, shall not survive his mother, Eliza Howell, then I do order that the aforesaid severally named bequests to the said James S. Howell shall revert back to my son, Floyd W. Tomkins, to be held in trust by him, to be appropriated, in all respects, in the same manner and for the same use as was intended the same should have been done by James S. Howell, to wit: for the use and support of my said daughter, Eliza, and Sarah Jane, her daughter, and to her heirs after her. But if the said Sarah Jane die before she arrives at the age of maturity and without issue, then it is my will and I do order that the said legacies in trust be equally divided between the surviving children of my son, Floyd W. Tomkins, share and share alike."

I can only read this as saying that in case James S. Howell did not survive his mother, then the testator gave and devised the said farm to his son, Floyd W., to be by him held in trust for Eliza and Sarah Jane, during the lifetime of Eliza, and, after the death of Eliza, for Sarah Jane absolutely, in case she arrived at the age of maturity. Certain it is that in case Sarah Jane should have died before arriving at that age, the whole estate was given absolutely to the surviving children of the testator's son Floyd W. It was absolutely given; there was nothing left of it to be disposed of; nothing for the executor or trustee as such, and nothing for the son, Floyd W. These are the last expressions of the testator upon the subject; and they are clear and distinct and, though not in all respects technical, seem to convey an unmistakable intent.

But it is said that the fee did not and cannot pass under this will, except by the act and co-operation of the executor to whom the fee is devised, with the power and authority to appropriate the rents and profits to the use of Eliza and Sarah Jane. It is insisted that the application of the doctrine arising under the Statute of Uses cannot be called in to aid the complainants. Speaking with reference to general principles this is true. If there is any active duty imposed upon the devisee of the legal estate in carrying out the purposes of the devise in favor of the cestui que use, which requires him to be vested with the legal estate, it becomes a trust to her, and the cestui que use is, in modern language, a cestui que trust, the legal seisin and the estate vesting in the trustee. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 434; 2 Jarm. Wills, 148.

Whether the present case is within this rule or not, I need not now determine. Its being a devise and not a conveyance by deed does not prevent the operation of the statute. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 433; 1 Greenl. Cruise, 386; Hance v. West, 3 Vroom, 233.

But to proceed to more certain ground: it also insisted that the title is so placed by the peculiar phraseology of the will as to bar the complainants from every right under the doctrine of election. In other words: it is said that the complainants have no such interest in this land under the will as entitles them to say they will take the land itself, out of which the proposed legacies are to be raised by sale, rather than the legacies themselves. Since I have concluded that the whole estate or interest in the land passes to Sarah Jane after her mother's death, it is not necessary for me to decide the interesting question whether the complainants could elect to take the land during their lives and so resist effectually a sale, or not, during that period. Can the complainants take the land and so prevent the executor from selling it at any time is, I think, the question in this case.

In my judgment this question should be answered in the affirmative. The right to elect, when a proper case arises, is not questioned. Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. Part 2, p. 1118; Fluke v. Fluke, 1 C. E. Green, 480; Current v. Current, 3 Stock. 186; Scudder v. Stout, 2 Stock. 377; Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. 563 [16 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 460].

But it is virtually claimed that the right of election, in all cases, springs from the doctrine of equitable conversion, and that there can be no election here because there has been no equitable conversion. This contention is made upon what seems to be a well settled rule: that there is no equitable conversion in such cases, unless the order or direction to sell, and thereby convert, be inoperative or out and out, which has not been done by the testator in this instance, he only having ordered the sale to be made by and with the consent of the executors "if they think proper."

I recognize this doctrine in all its length and breadth. The heir at law can claim its protection. A devisee would perhaps enjoy the benefit of it over and above a legatee. But I can find no case in which the court has allowed the person to whom the land has been devised in trust, for the use and benefit of others, with a power of sale for their benefit, to defeat the right of election, because the doctrine of equitable conversion could not be applied. It would be a strange doctrine to hold, in such case, that the legatee could not take the land. If such be the law, then, in every case like the present, the trustee can defeat the plainest intentions of the testator. This case affords an apt illustration of the severity, if not the absurdity of the rule sought to be applied. For example: had Sarah Jane died before reaching the age of maturity or without issue, this trustee could have prevented a distribution of the estate among his own children, by saying that they were only entitled to the proceeds of the sale, and that there could be no sale unless he saw fit to make it, and that he did not see fit to make it.

But the executor sees fit to sell. He sees fit to convert. Now, therefore, if he be allowed to sell and to convert, who is entitled to the proceeds? Eliza and Sarah Jane are entitled during the life of Eliza, and Sarah Jane to the fund upon the death of Eliza. It seems clear to me that in such case the rule which allows a legatee to take the land instead of the money arising from the sale applies. It is said that, since the legatee, if she desires the land, can take the money and buy the land, the courts will not oblige her to pursue that useless and expensive form, but will give her the land at once. This, I think, is a most reasonable and commendable rule. I conclude that it should be applied to this case.

Again; it is urged by way of objection that the legatee is a married woman and cannot elect. I cannot understand why she cannot accept what the testator gives; but if she be under any such disability, in my judgment, a court of equity can, when called upon, give the necessary aid and protect her interests.

I think the complainants are entitled to the relief sought for by their bill, and will so advise.

Joseph W. BALLENTINE, Trustee,
v.
John B. WOOD et al.

1. It was agreed, upon a trustee's third accounting, that he should receive 5 per cent commission on the gross receipts of the estate, and that this agreement should be retroactive so as to cover his second accounting. Held, that as the agreement did not apply to the trustee's first accounting, it was improper to allow him 3 per cent additional commission upon income upon which he had been allowed 2 per cent commission in his first account.

2. Held, in construing a will, that by the expression "the moneys arising from the sales of my real estate," although broad enough to include proceeds of land specifically devised, the testator referred only to lands constituting the residue of his real estate.

3. Held also, that in a clause providing that after the death of all of testator's children (during whose lives the property was devised in trust) the residue of his real estate should "go and descend * * * to the respective right heirs of my said children in fee simple, to hold as tenants in common and not as joint tenants,"—the words "right heirs" meant "children," and that the words "and descend" were superfluous or equivalent to "go down," and were not used to express descent in the legal sense, but devolution by force of the devise; and that the gift in remainder and the life estate vested at the same moment.
4. Held also, that the grandchildren of testator who were alive at his death took a vested title to the remainder at his death by independent gift, their estate being, however, subject to the liability to open and let in grandchildren born subsequently.

BILL for relief. On exceptions to master's report and applications for instructions as to distribution of money in the hands of Trustee.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Aug. Fay Jr., for complainant.

Mr. H. C. Pitney, for Helen B. Wood.

Mr. W. L. Dayton, for John B. Wood and others:

The language of the will is that the income shall be paid "to my children or their lawful issue," and, as to moneys in hand, "to the respective right heirs of my said children, the child or children of each deceased child taking the part or share which the parent would be entitled to."

Under such a devise the son's widow cannot, as such, nor can she as legal representative, take any interest in the estate.

A widow is neither an heir, nor next of kin.

Schouler, Wills, § 542.

On a devise of personalty in trust for life, with remainder over to children and their lawful heirs, it has been held to go neither to next of kin nor to the legal representative, but to the heir at law.

Smith v. Butcher, L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 113; 2 Jarm. Wills, 614.

The moneys and securities belonging to the specific trust in hand at its close were, "from and after" the death of the last surviving life tenant, "to be paid over, delivered and transferred to the respective right heirs of my said children; the child or children of each deceased child taking the part or share which the parent would be entitled to."

This last provision must necessarily be read "surviving" children, etc. taking the part or share of the parent. Moneys and securities cannot be "paid over, delivered and transferred" to the dead.

Remainders so devised are contingent and not vested.

See Slack v. Bird, 8 C. E. Green, 238; Van Tilburgh v. Hollinshead, 1 McCart. 32.

In construing the same will in another case this court has already held that the grandchildren of testator's children took their share of the rents and profits under the provisions of the will, which directed that children should take the parent's share.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

Two objections are presented under the exceptions to the master's report: one is that the master has reported an allowance of commissions to the complainant, and the other is as to the amount of such allowance.

It was proper and necessary to establish the amount of commissions in taking the account of the Trustee, in order that distribution might be ordered.

The master has allowed the Trustee 3 per cent additional commissions upon $35,194.95 of income, upon which the Trustee in his first account was allowed 2 per cent commissions. I see no reason for making this extra allowance. In his intermediate account, filed in 1877, to which the master refers as the first intermediate account, the orphans' court fixed the Trustee's commissions upon the income received up to that time. The agreement made by the exceptants in 1880, that the Trustee should receive 5 per cent commissions on the gross receipts of the estate, provided that he should not receive more than $500 in any year or in a greater proportion for any part of a year, expressly provided also that it should be retroactive, so that the sum to be allowed to the Trustee upon his second accounting should be determined on the basis thereof, but that it should have no other retroactive effect. The master has applied it to the first accounting. Therefore, so far as the exceptants are concerned, the award of commissions upon the $35,194.95 is unlawful. The agreement upon the same subject made by other persons interested in the estate covered the whole period from the beginning of the Trustee's administration. The exception must be allowed.

A question was presented upon the argument (but not under the exceptions) as to the right of Mrs. Helen B. Wood to participate in the distribution of the moneys in the hands of the Trustee.

James Wood, deceased, by his will devised to his executors, as trustees, certain specified lands in trust to permit his wife to occupy for life, or so long as she should remain his widow, certain parts of that property, to lease the rest (and after her death or remarriage to lease it all), and after deducting the necessary expenses of repairs, improvements and insurance, to pay over the net proceeds arising from the rents to his wife so long as she should remain his widow, and his five children, William N., Sarah Ann, Jane Elizabeth, Theodore T. and Laura Louisa, share and share alike, and, after the death or marriage of his wife, to pay over such net proceeds arising from the rents to his before mentioned five children in equal shares; and in case of the death of any one or more of his children without leaving lawful issue, then to pay over the share or shares of such deceased child or children to his, the testator's, surviving child or children, in equal parts or shares; and in case of the death of any of his children, leaving lawful issue, then to pay over his or her share to and among said issue in equal parts or shares.

The testator gave power to the executors at their discretion to sell parts of the property, and provided that in case of sale the proceeds of sale should be invested, and that the interest should be paid over to and among his children or their lawful issue, as directed in regard to the rents and profits of the property.

He then provided that from and after the death of all his children the trust thereby created should cease and determine, and that the several tracts or parcels of land and premises therein before mentioned and described (except so much thereof as might be sold by the executors) should go and descend, freed and discharged from all trusts whatever, to the respective right heirs of his children in fee simple, to hold as tenants in common and not as joint tenants; it being always understood that the child or children of any of his deceased children should take the part or share of the trust estate that the parent would have taken had the testator died intestate, and that in like manner all the moneys which the trustees or the survivors or survivor of them or the heirs of the survivor of them may then have on hand, together with all securities for money, be paid over, delivered or transferred to the respective right heirs of his, the testator's, before mentioned children; the child or children of each deceased child taking the part or share to which the parent would be entitled.

The will contains a residuary clause disposing of the residue of the testator's real estate; but that provision was revoked by a codicil by which the testator gave and devised the residue of his real estate to his executors and to the survivors and survivor of them, and to the heirs of the survivor, in trust to sell such residue at discretion or to mortgage it to pay his debts; and he provided that the moneys arising from sale or which might be borrowed on mortgage, together with the moneys due him on bonds, notes, books of account, stocks or otherwise, or so much thereof as might be necessary for the purpose, should be appropriated to the payment of his debts and the expenses incident to the settlement of his estate; and he directed that the residue thereof should be invested, and the dividends or interest thereof be paid over and divided to and among his five children; and that whenever, in the opinion of his executors or a majority of them, any of his children should require more than his or her share of the interest or dividends for his or her comfortable support and maintenance, his executors or a majority of them might pay over and deliver to such child or children a part or the whole of his or her one fifth part or other proportion of the principal moneys or other property constituting such residue; and that at the death of any of his children his or her part or share in such residue of the testator's estate be paid over to his or her child or children; and that if any of his children should die leaving no lawful issue, his or her part or share in the residue be paid to the testator's surviving child or children, and to the child or children of such of the testator's children as should have died leaving children; it being always understood that the child or children are to take the part or share which their parent would have taken if living.

The testator's wife died in his lifetime. His children all survived him. The children are all dead. Two of the daughters died childless. Theodore T. Wood, one of the children of Theodore T. Wood, one of the testator's sons, survived his father but died in the lifetime of the last survivor of the testator's children without issue, leaving a widow, Helen B. Wood, to whom by his will he gave all his property. She claims to be entitled to an equal share with the children of her father-in-law who survived him. If the interest of her husband in the estate of his grandfather, the testator, was a vested interest, she is, as her husband's universal legatee and devisee, entitled to it. It is urged by her counsel that the above quoted provision of the codicil as to the moneys arising from the sale of the testator's real estate includes in its terms and was intended by the testator to embrace the proceeds of the sale of the real estate specifically devised as well as the proceeds of that which may be termed the residuary real estate. But it is quite clear that such a construction is inadmissible.

By the clause of the will by which the testator disposed of the residuary real estate he provided that his executors should sell that property, and that out of the proceeds of sale and the moneys due him upon bonds, notes, books of account, stocks or otherwise, his debts and the expenses of settling his estate should be paid; and he then disposed of the residue of those proceeds. By the before mentioned codicil he revoked that devise, and gave the property to his executors, in trust, to sell it or to raise money upon it by mortgage to pay his debts; and he then directed that the moneys arising from the sales of his real estate and which his executors might borrow on mortgage, together with the moneys due him on bonds, notes, books of account, stocks or otherwise, or so much thereof as should be necessary for the purpose, be appropriated by his executors to the payment of his debts and the expenses incident to the settlement of his estate; and he directed that the residue be invested and that the dividends or the interest thereof be paid over and divided to and among his five children; and that at the death of any of his children his or her part or share in such residue of his, the testator's, estate, be paid over to his or her (the decedent's) child or children, etc.

Although in the provision just quoted the testator gives direction as to the disposition of the proceeds of his real estate, and the language used by him, "the moneys arising from the sales of my real estate" is broad enough to include the proceeds of the sales of the land specifically devised, yet it is apparent from the context that he had in mind and referred only to the lands constituting the residue of his real estate. The claim of Mrs. Wood depends upon the construction to be given to the provision of the clause of the will by which the lands specifically devised and the proceeds thereof are disposed of after the death of the testator's children. That clause is as follows:

"And it is further my will that from and after the death of all my children, the trust hereby created shall cease and determine, and the several tracts or parcels of land and premises hereinbefore mentioned and described (except so much thereof as may be sold as aforesaid) shall go and descend, freed and discharged from all trusts whatever, to the respective right heirs of my said children, in fee simple, to hold as tenants in common and not as joint tenants; it being always understood that the child or children of any of my deceased children shall take the part or share of the said trust estate that the parent would have taken had I died intestate; and in like manner all the moneys which the said trustees or the survivors or survivor of them may then have on hand, together with all securities for money, be paid over, delivered or transferred to the respective right heirs of my said children; the child or children of each deceased child taking the part or share which the parent would be entitled to."

By the words "right heirs" in the clause the testator meant children, as is evident from the accompanying qualifying provision that the child or children of any of his deceased children shall take the part or share that the parent would have taken. At the death of the last survivor of the testator's children the trust is to cease, and the property, if unsold, or, if any shall have been sold, then so much as shall remain unsold and the proceeds of that part of it which shall have been sold, shall go to the testator's grandchildren.

The words "and descend" are merely superfluous. The word "descend" was used not to express descent in the legal sense, but devolution by force of the devise; and the use of it was probably due to the fact that while the gift for life was to parents, the gift in remainder was to children. It is as if the testator had said "go down" to the children. The gift in remainder and the life estate vested at the same moment. The grandchildren who were alive at the death of the testator took the title to the remainder at his death by independent gift; for while the gift in the first instance is to the trustees for the life of the longest liver of the testator's children, the subsequent provision is that at the death of the last survivor of the equitable life tenants the trust is to be at an end and the property is to go to the grandchildren. But the estate taken by the grandchildren at the testator's death was subject to the liability to open and let in grandchildren born subsequently. The amount of the interest in each stock of grandchildren would therefore not be fixed absolutely (except by the death of the parent life tenant) until the death of the last survivor of the life tenants. But subject to that liability to open it was vested at the death of the testator. Theodore T. Wood, Jr., therefore, at his death had a vested interest which was subject to a liability to be diminished in amount by the birth of other children of his father, but only subject to that liability. It is to be observed that the gift is to the children individually, and not as a class; for it is expressly made to them as tenants in common and not as joint tenants.

The cases which support the construction which I have put upon the provision under consideration are numerous. Among them may be mentioned: Wintermute v. Snyder, 2 Green, Ch. 490; Howell v. Green, 2 Vroom, 570; Van Dyke v. Vanderpool, 1 McCart. 193; Feit v. Vanatte, 6 C. E. Green, 84; Beatty v. Montgomery, 6 C. E. Green, 324; Herbert v. Post, 11 C. E. Green, 278, and S. C. 12 C. E. Green, 540.

The cases cited by the counsel of those who oppose Mrs. Wood's claim are not in point. They are: Smith v. Butcher, L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 113; Van Tilburgh v. Hollinshead, 1 McCart. 32, and Slack v. Bird, 8 C. E. Green, 238.

In Smith v. Butcher there was a gift of personalty in trust for the children of the testator's brother for life, with provision that on the death of either of them, his or her share of the principal should go to his or her "lawful heirs." The words "lawful heirs" were held to be used in their ordinary sense. There was nothing in the context to prevent or militate against such construction.

In Van Tilburgh v. Hollinshead the devise was to the testator's son, with provision that at his decease the property should go to his, the son's "surviving children according to law." It was held that the estate of the children was contingent upon their surviving their father; the rule being that where an interest is given to one for life and after his death to his surviving children, those only can take who are alive at the time the distribution takes place. Slack v. Bird was a similar case with a like decision.

TERHUNE
v.
BELL.

1. Where a creditor's bill was filed and the complainant in this suit was appointed a receiver, he may file his bill for the collection of moneys which are held in trust for the debtor in the original suit, making the person who holds the money defendant and charging her with the trust, without first obtaining another judgment at law and issuing execution thereon,—the complainant in the original suit, the creditor, having already obtained judgment and issued his execution.
2. It is no objection to such suit that the complainant has a remedy at law; he has a remedy also in equity.

(Filed April 23, 1887.)

MOTION to strike out bill. Denied.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. William Pintard, for the motion.

Mr. James Steen, contra.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

A creditor's bill was filed in this court under the statute, and proceedings were thereunder taken for discovery. The complainant in this suit, now pending, was appointed a receiver. He files his bill for the collection of certain moneys which he claims are held in trust for the debtor in the original suit, making Grace Bell the person who, as he alleges, holds said money, defendant, and charging her with the trust.

Under the rules, motion is made to strike out the bill, first, because the complainant has a remedy at law; and, second, because the complainant shows no lien by execution, or otherwise on the money sought to be recovered.

As to the first point, however certain it may be (as contended for by the defendant) that the complainant has a remedy at law, it is equally certain, and I think beyond dispute, that he has a remedy also in equity. Certain it is that he is in this court in pursuit of the rights and credits of the debtor which it is impossible for him to reach at law, under our practice. The applicability of this rule will appear more fully in this case as we consider:

Second; whether the complainant, as receiver, should obtain another judgment at law and issue an execution thereon (the complainant in the original suit, the creditor, having already obtained judgment and issued his execution) before he can proceed in equity. The statement of the question suggests the answer. No such duplication of proceedings can possibly be required. The certainty of the complainant's demand has been once fixed by a judgment. It has been ascertained with such reasonable certainty that the defendant has moneys in trust that the court appointed a receiver to collect such moneys and to apply them to the payment of the judgment.

The bill by the receiver, now filed for that purpose, shows that the defendant in the original suit, the debtor, was at one time the owner of valuable real estate which he conveyed in such a manner and upon such consideration as to have secured unto himself, in the hands of the defendant, Grace Bell, a large sum of money, alleging that said Bell now holds such money for the benefit of the said defendant.

As to the points raised by the notice, the bill is well filed and is sufficient in its statements to sustain a decree in equity.

The motion is denied, with costs.

APPEAL from a decretal order of the Essex Orphans' Court. Affirmed.

The nature of the case, and the facts and questions raised, appear from the opinion.

Mr. G. W. Hubbell, for appellant.

Messrs. J. W. Taylor and J. R. Emery, for appellees:

The several claims of the testator, evidenced by bonds and mortgages of the appellant and the promissory notes are debts.

A debt is "a sum of money due by certain and express agreement, as by a bond for a determinate sum or bill or note."

3 Bl. Com. 154; Burrill, Law Dic. title, Debt.

The bonds and mortgages both recognize and characterize the sums of money secured thereby, as debts. The same is true with respect to the promissory notes. They were entered in appellant's bill book as debts or liabilities.

The debts bear interest, the bonds and mortgages on their face, by express terms, and the notes from their maturity.

An "advancement" is "money or property supplied by one person to another, who will be his heir or distributee, in anticipation of, and to be deducted from the share of the recipient in the donor's estate as distinguished from a loan made to be repaid in any event, or a gift which would benefit, in addition to the inheritance or distributive share.

Abbott, Law Dic. title, Advancement. See also Bouvier, Law Dic.; Burrill, Law Dic.

An advancement creates no debt to the person making it, and in all its features, and in its very nature is distinguishable from a debt or indebtedness.

Chase v. Ewing, 51 Barb. 597, 601; Wait, Act. & Def, 206, § 2.

An advancement is an irrevocable gift by a parent in his lifetime, to a child, on account of such child's share of the parent's estate. Where a father, on advancing a sum of money to a son, takes a bond for its repayment, with or without interest, it is a debt and not an advancement, High's App, 21 Pa, 283, 287.

A note given by a son to a father is not of itself evidence of an advancement by the father. It is evidence of indebtedness by the son.

Batton v. Allen, 1 Halst. Ch. 99, 102.

Where money is lent or paid by a father, to or for a son, at the request of the latter, and an account is stated by the father and interest charged, such loan or payment is a debt and not an advancement.

Harris' App. 2 Grant, Cas. 304; 1 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 206, § 2.

In the leading case of Kirk v. Eddowes, 3 Hare, 516, Wigram, V. C., says: "The questions I have to consider are two; first, as to what the second transaction (the alleged advancement) really was; and, secondly, as to the effect, if any, of the second transaction upon the first (the legacy). Where similar questions have arisen upon gifts given by two distinct instruments, the law as to the admissibility of parol evidence has, I believe, long since been settled. In such cases the rule of law applies, that written instruments cannot be added to or explained by parol evidence; and, therefore, unless the second instrument, in express terms or by presumption of law, adeems the gift made by the instrument of earlier date, no question can arise. Both instruments will take effect."

Runyon, Ordinary, delivered the following opinion :

Jacob H. Dawson, Sr., deceased, who died July 9, 1882, by his will, dated January 28, 1875, gave to the appellant, one of his sons, one eighth of the residue of his estate. On the first day of April, 1878, the appellant received from his father $10,000, and gave to him his bond and mortgage of that date for the amount, payable in one year with interest. The mortgage states that it was given to secure the payment of the appellant's bond to the testator, of even date with the mortgage, conditioned for the payment of $10,000, in one year, with interest.

After the death of the testator, the bond was not found among his papers; and the appellant, at the request of the executors, executed another one of the same description, tenor and terms, to supply its place. On the 21st of February, 1880, the appellant received from the testator the further sum of $8,000, for which he gave him his bond and mortgage of that date, payable in one year, with interest. On the 4th of October, 1881, he received from the testator the further sum of $2,200, for which he gave him his promissory note of that date, payable to the testator's order, on demand, for value received, at the maker's office, No. 363 Halsey Street, in Newark.

On the 13th of April, 1882, the testator indorsed for the accommodation of the appellant the note of the latter of that date for $5,000, at four months, payable to the order of the testator; and on the 12th of May following he indorsed another note of the appellant for the accommodation of the latter, of that date, for $5,000, at four months, payable to the order of the testator. Those two notes for $5,000 each were discounted by the National State Bank of Newark at the request of the appellant, who received and applied to his own use the proceeds thereof. The notes did not mature until after the death of the testator, and they were paid by his executors out of his estate.

The appellant paid interest upon the $10,000 bond and mortgage up to July 1, 1882, and on the other bond and mortgage up to February 21, 1882. He claims that these various instruments (the bonds and mortgages and notes, including those indorsed for his accommodation) were all advancements made to him by the testator, on account of his residuary share of the latter's estate, and were not intended to be evidence of indebtedness on his part, to the testator or to his estate.

The orphans' court decreed that the advance in question created debts from the appellant to the testator, and that the payment of the two $5,000 notes created a debt from the appellant to the testator's estate, and that any dividends of the estate that should become due to the appellant should be applied first to the payment of principal and interest upon the notes, and next to the principal and interest of the bonds and mortgages, and then to any other unsecured debt besides the notes, due from the appellant to the estate.

That the two $5,000 notes were not intended as advancements is clear. They were renewals of other notes, the originals of which were made by the testator for the accommodation of the appellant. The notes thus made or indorsed for the accommodation of the appellant, whether made by him or by the testator, were always entered in the appellant's books as notes payable by him. The notes in question, those which were unpaid at the testator's death, were not made by the testator, but were merely indorsed by him; and his liability thereon was a merely contingent liability. The notes, as already stated, did not mature until after his death, and they were then paid by his executors. There is no evidence showing or tending to show that the testator gave the indorsements on acount of the appellant's interest in his estate.

And so too in regard to the note for $2,200. So far as appears it was given to secure a loan of so much money from the testator to the appellant, and the money was advanced without any reference to the residuary legacy.

The bonds and mortgages were made and taken, as was the note just mentioned, precisely as they would have been made and taken had the advances of money, the payment of which they purport to secure, been made by the testator with the full intention of requiring and enforcing, if necessary, the payment thereof, as a loan strictly, and with no intention to make an advancement. An advancement creates no debt to the person making it; and in all its features and in its very nature it is distinguishable from a debt or indebtedness. Per Johnson, J., in Chase v. Ewing, 51 Barb. 597.

In the absence of evidence of intention on the part of the testator that the money was to be an advancement the bonds and mortgages and notes are evidence of debt and not of advancement. Speer v. Speer, 1 McCart. 240; Batton v. Allen, 1 Halst. Ch. 99; Bruce v. Griscom, 9 Hun (N. Y.), 280; High's App. 21 Pa. 283.

The case of Wanmaker v. Van Buskirk, Saxt. 685, in which it was held that there was an advancement, although a bond for the repayment of the money was given, was (as was said in Batton v. Allen) decided upon the peculiar circumstances of the case.

But to consider the testimony which is claimed to be evidence of advancement: there is no evidence at all that the $2,200 was given as an advancement; and the evidence that the testator intended to advance to the appellant, on account of his residuary legacy, the money for which he took the bonds and mortgages is not convincing. It is as follows:

McDonald, who was the appellant's bookkeeper up to November, 1884, says he has heard the testator "say in so many words, a number of times, that it was merely done—he did not keep any records himself, and wanted them to appear among his papers, and that at his, the testator's death, they (the mortgages) would be the appellant's; that at his, the testator's death, the interest would stop, that the appellant would have no more interest to pay." He says that he remembers that on one occasion the testator said that in forty-eight hours after he would be under the ground, the appellant would have $50,000 coming to him, and would have no interest to pay; and that on an occasion when the appellant, objecting to pay the interest, said that it was "eating him out of house and home," the testator said, "As soon as I am gone, your interest will stop."

Mr. Hixson, who was a creditor of the appellant, testifies that the testator said that the mortgages would never bother the appellant, that they would not have to be paid, but that the appellant must pay him interest so long as he, the testator, should live, but that he did not expect him to pay him the mortgages. Hixson says he is not sure that the testator used the word "pay;" but he says he gave him, Hixson, to understand that the mortgages were not likely to trouble the appellant. He further says that on another occasion when the appellant asked the testator to give up the mortgages to him and take from him an agreement to pay the interest, the testator declined, saying that it did not make any difference about the mortgages, that all the appellant had to do was "to pay him the interest so long as he (the testator) should live, and when he was gone it would stop and the mortgage is paid." David A. Hall says that the testator said to him that the mortgages did not amount to anything to the appellant, that they were merely memoranda that he, the testator, retained against the appellant, and that at his, the testator's, death, "it would wipe the thing out," or something to that effect.

In all this there is no evidence of advancement, but on the contrary the testimony shows that the testator regarded the mortgages as valid claims against the appellant not only for the interest, but for the principal also. When the appellant proposed to him, in the presence of Hixson, to give up the mortgages and take an agreement instead thereof for the payment of interest only, he refused. What he meant by what he said was that the appellant, at his, the testator's, death would be enabled to pay the mortgages off out of his share of the estate, which share it seems the testator estimated at $50,000; but he manifestly intended to hold a claim, for the money for which the mortgages were given, upon the appellant and the mortgaged premises so long as he lived. Had there been occasion, or had he been inclined to do so, he might have collected the money, and of course might have made such disposition of it as he saw fit. It is quite clear that he did not intend to part with his property in it so long as he lived, and indeed he never did part with it, but held it up to the time of his death. The fact that he referred to the gift which he had made to the appellant in his will (the gift of a share of his residuary estate) as a means of paying off the mortgage, did not make the transactions under consideration an advancement. Had the testator brought an action upon the bonds or suit for foreclosure upon the mortgages, the appellant could not have defended himself therein by the claim now made. The statements of the testator now relied upon would not have been admissible.

The order appealed from will be affirmed, with costs.

Runyon, Ordinary, delivered the following opinion:

This appeal is from an order of the Orphans' Court of Hunterdon County, denying a motion to dismiss exceptions to the inventory, filed by legatees. The ground of the motion was that the exceptions were improvidently and illegally filed.

There is nothing in the record to support the objection. (Decided—— —1887.)

APPEAL from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Hunterdon County, directing the payment of a claim against a decedent's estate. Affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. A. Cotter, for appellant.

Mr. C. A. Skillman, for respondent.

Runyon, Ordinary, delivered the following opinion:

The orphans' court in this case directed the appellant, who is administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of John Sproat, deceased, to pay out of the balance in his hands (the estate is insolvent) certain money which was decreed to be due to the respondent, one of the executors (the executors were removed by order of the court) upon the passing of her account, and then to pay the rest upon a claim of Joseph Sproat, administrator of Elizabeth Sproat, deceased, against the executors upon a promissory note given by them to his intestate.

The court decreed that the respondent's debt was a preferred debt, and therefore entitled to priority in payment over the Elizabeth Sproat claim. The ground of preference appears to have been that the money was expended by the respondent out of her own funds in payment of preferred debts of the estate.

The money for which the note was given by the executors to Elizabeth Sproat was borrowed by them from her to pay debts of the estate of their testator. The appellant insists that the latter claim is entitled to preference in payment over that of the respondent.

The respondent, having paid preferred debts with her own money, was obviously entitled to be reimbursed by subrogation out of the funds of the estate in the hands of the appellant, to the extent to which those funds were available for the purpose. She had been removed, and the estate had been taken out of her hands. She, therefore, could not reimburse herself. The funds in the hands of the administrator were sufficient to repay her in full.

The claim of Elizabeth Sproat was and is a claim against the executors themselves personally. The court, probably in view of the purpose for which that money was borrowed, recognized it as a claim against the estate, entitled to preference over the other (unpreferred) debts. Whether the money was in fact used for that purpose does not appear. But the propriety of that preference is not in question.

It is said that the money went to increase the assets of the testator, but there is no evidence upon the subject. It does not appear in the respondent's account.

The decree will be affirmed, with costs.

1. Where the trust is one devolved upon the executors by the will, an error in the executors' account may be corrected by the orphans' court in their subsequent accounts as trustees.
2. Where the commissions allowed the executors were too large, in an account which is not final, the fixing of the commissions being in the discretion of the court, it is competent for the court, without notice and ex proprio motu, to take such error in the allowance of commissions into account when fixing the commissions in a subsequent account.

APPEAL from a decree of the Passaic Orphans' Court fixing the commissions of trustees on an accounting. Affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Barkalow, Pennington & Beam, for appellants.

Mr. Eugene Emley, for respondents.

Runyon, Ordinary, delivered the following opinion:

The accountants, trustees under the will of John Shaw, deceased, appeal from so much of the decree of the Passaic Orphans' Court upon the allowance of a partial account filed by them in 1886, as fixes their commissions at the sum of $10. The period covered by the account is one year from March 31, 1885.

By the account it appears that the accountants received during that time, $7,117.70 of rents, interest and dividends, and $36,958.48 from the sale of real estate; altogether $44,076.18.

No reason appears upon the face of the proceedings for the allowance of so small an amount of commissions. It is suggested, however, that the reason may have been that the accountants, who were executors of Shaw as well as trustees under his will, were allowed in what purported to be their final account as executors, passed in 1882, too large commissions, and that the orphans' court may have undertaken to correct such error if it existed by the small allowance made in the account under consideration.

The orphans' court had a right to correct such errors, if any there were, unless prevented by the fact that the account of 1882 was the account of the appellants as executors, while the account of 1886 was their account as trustees. The will is not before me, but I perceive that the partial account of the appellants of 1884, covering their transactions for a year from March 31, 1883, is stated to be their account as "executors and trustees" of the testator, although what purported to be their final account as executors was settled in 1882.

The subsequent accounts, however, are filed as their accounts as trustees merely, and not as executors. But it appears from the statements and arguments of the counsel that the trust was one devolved upon the executors by the will. There is, therefore, such a connection between the accounts that any error in the executors' account of 1882 might be corrected by the orphans' court in their subsequent accounts as trustees. It is urged upon the part of the appellants that if the reason suggested for the making of so small an allowance of commissions was the true reason therefor, they had no previous notice, either by exceptions or otherwise, that the court would be called upon to refuse to allow the usual commissions upon the account of 1886, in view of the fact that there was any error in their favor in the allowance of commissions in their account of 1882 as executors.

But the account of 1882 is not a final one, and the fixing of the commissions was in the discretion of the court, and it was quite competent for the court without notice and ex proprio motu to take any previous error in the allowance of commissions into account in fixing the commissions on the account in question.

The suggestions as to the practice in Jackson v. Reynolds, 12 Stew. Eq. 313, are in reference to the fixing of commissions upon a final account, where an excessive allowance had been made upon passing the intermediate account or accounts.

As the record stands, the decree must be affirmed.

Francis C. VAN DYK, Respt.

Held, on the facts, that a decree admitting to probate a will made by a woman about seventy-seven years of age, whereby she disposed of her property differently than she had done in a former will, should be affirmed—it appearing that the testatrix was of testamentary capacity, and free from undue influence.

(Decided April, 1887.)

APPEAL from a decree of the Passaic Orphans' Court, in the matter of the propounding of the last will of Jane Miller, deceased, admitting the will to probate. Affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. D. L. Bolton and J. W. Griggs, for appellant.

Mr. Frank E. Pellett, for respondent:

The attestation clause to a will is prima facie evidence of the facts stated in it, and the instrument will not be rejected because the witnesses fail to remember the mode of the execution.

Mundy v. Mundy, 2 McCart. 290; Allaire v. Allaire, 8 Vroom, 312; Re Alpaugh, 8 C. E. Green, 507.

A will may be established without evidence of witnesses to it and without any attestation clause in case it is signed in the presence of a sufficient number of witnesses.

Bailey v. Stiles, 1 Green, Ch. 220–232.

When the evidence is doubtful the presumption is in favor of the attestation clause, and the burden of proof is on the contestants.

Tappan v. Davidson, 12 C. E. Green, 459.

The test of testamentary capacity.

The test which the law applies is a practical one. Was the testatrix, at the time of making the will, capable of discerning and feeling the ties of kindred and obligations of family and blood? Had she a mind to recollect the property she means to dispose of, the persons who are to be the objects of her bounty and the manner in which it is to be distributed among them?

Den v. Vancleve, 2 South. 589; Stackhouse v. Horton, 2 McCart. 202, 206; Den d. Trumbull, v. Gibbon, 2 Zab. 133, 134.

The time of the execution of the will is the material period to which the court must look to ascertain the state of the mind of the testator.

Whitenack v. Stryker, 1 Green, Ch. 8; 1 Jarm Wills, p. 75; Chambers v. The Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. Eccl. 415.

If there is any doubt as to the sanity of the testatrix on the day of making the will, the benefit of the doubt ought to be in favor of the sanity of the testatrix.

Clark v. Fisher, 1 Paige, 171; 1 Jarm. Wills, p. 75, note.

The mistrust of and hostility to James Miller, if founded on reasonable grounds of believing that testatrix had been injured and wronged by him is no ground for setting aside the will.

Stackhouse v. Horton, 2 McCart. 228.

It is a well established principle of law that all influence on the part of the devisee in his or her favor is not undue influence. The influence of affection, of kind offices, of fair argument or urging upon one person the propriety of providing for the helpless or even of persuasion does not invalidate a will, otherwise the very motive of the testator's benevolence would make void the gift.

Den d. Trumbull, v. Gibbon, 2 Zab. 117, 136; Re Gleespin, 11 C. E. Green, 523.

The influence which the law denounces as undue influence over a testator, must be such as to destroy his free agency and amount to moral or physical coercion; it must be proved moreover that the act done was the result of such coercion; there must be a control exercised over the mind of the testator or an importunity practiced which he could not resist, or to which he yielded for the sake of peace.

Wills, p. 521, 523; Kitchell v. Beach, 8 Stew. Eq. 455.

Mr. T. M. Moore, also for respondent.

Runyon, Ordinary, delivered the following opinion:

Jane Miller, widow, late of Paterson, died in that place, October 11, 1885, at the age of about eighty years. Her husband died December 30, 1876. Her property consisted of her household furniture and wearing apparel, about $1,500 due her from a savings bank, and a lot of land upon which were two houses on Passaic Street in Paterson. That property was worth $4,000 or $5,000. She supposed that she owned a vacant lot on Sheridan Avenue on Totowa Hill in Paterson, but her title to it has proved invalid.

At her death she had five children, Mary Ann Tuttle of Morristown, Catharine Crocker and James Miller of Paterson, George Miller of Chicago and Matilda Dumas of Northampton, Massachusetts. In 1879 she made a will by which she gave to James her black walnut bedroom set of furniture and her best bedding for the bed. All the remainder of her household furniture, and her clothing and all the rest of her personal estate she gave to her three daughters in equal shares. To George she gave only her love and best wishes, adding that she supposed that he was well situated as regards this world's goods without anything further from her estate. To James she gave the Passaic Street property and she devised the lot on Sheridan Avenue to Eugene Dumas, a minor son of her daughter Matilda, and appointed her son James his guardian to take care of that property for him, with power to sell it and invest the proceeds for his use.

She appointed James her executor. In the summer of 1882 she was living on the Passaic Street property. Matilda and James were living there with her. She was then managing her own business, collected (through James) her rents from her tenants, deposited her money in the savings bank, kept her bank book, etc. During that summer, while they were so living together, a rupture of their friendly relations occurred. She became offended at James and Matilda, and left the house and went to the house of her daughter Mrs. Crocker, where she stayed for about a week. She then, in company with Mrs. Crocker, returned to the house in Passaic Street; but James talked so violently to her that she declared that she was afraid of him and she went again to Mrs. Crocker's. In the latter part of July or early in August of that year she made a visit to her daughter, Mrs. Tuttle, at Morristown, and stayed there until some time in September, when James took her to Mrs. Crocker's in Paterson, where she remained until her death.

In the winter of 1882, and before the will in question was made, she came to the Passaic Street house where Mrs. Dumas was. Affectionate relations had been resumed between them. James found them there together (he says they had his trunk open and were pulling his clothing out of it) and violently and with curses ordered his mother to go away, back to Mrs. Crocker's, and stay there. She fled from the house. He appears to have cursed both of the women upon that occasion. On the 9th of December, 1882, the testatrix, with Mrs. Dumas, went to the office of the late Socrates Tuttle, a counselor at law of high standing in Paterson, and he then, at her request, drew for her another will; and he and his son, who also was a lawyer, witnessed her execution of it.

By it she gave $500 to her before mentioned grandson Eugene, and then gave $300 to each of her five children by name. She then empowered her executor to sell the Passaic Street property, either at public or private sale, for the best price he could obtain for it, and ordered that the proceeds of the sale, together with the residue of her money if any, be divided into six equal shares, one of which she gave to Eugene, and one to each of her children. She then gave to James her best bedroom set, and gave her wearing apparel (except her broché shawl, which she gave to her daughter Mrs. Tuttle), to her three daughters. She then gave the lot upon Sheridan Avenue to Eugene, and provided that in case of deficiency all the legacies should abate proportionately, except the legacy to him, which should not abate all all. She appointed Francis C. Van Dyk, of Paterson, executor.

Soon after her death, James filed in the Passaic Surrogate's Office a caveat against admitting to probate any paper purporting to be her will, until examination and decree thereon. After a full trial and investigation the orphans' court made a decree admitting the will of 1882 to probate. From that decree the caveator appealed to this court.

The will in question was executed with all due legal formalities. Mr. Tuttle was dead when the trial in the orphans' court took place, and his son, the other witness to the instrument, could remember nothing whatever of the transaction. He proved the signatures of his father and himself, however, to the certificate of attestation, which certifies to all the legal requisites of execution. The certificate is prima facie evidence of the facts stated in it.

Mrs. Dumas, who was present at the execution of the will, testifies to what she remembers of the proceedings. Her testimony corroborates the statements of the certificate; and there is no evidence impeaching them.

The preponderance of evidence is in favor of testamentary capacity of the testatrix, at the time of executing the will. She was indeed about seventy-seven years old then, and was afflicted with nervous palsy, and at times she was subject to delusions; but it appears affirmatively that when the will was made she not only knew what the business was in which she was engaged, what her property was and who had claims upon her bounty or consideration, but she had a long cherished object in making the will, which she declared and which she said bore heavily upon her mind, and that was to make a better provision for her grandson Eugene, before mentioned and for whom she made some provision in the will of 1879, by giving him the lot upon Sheridan Avenue. He was a deformed child incapable (to a very great degree at least) of earning a living.

It appears from the testimony of her pastor, Rev. Dr. Magie, that she frequently spoke of the necessity of changing her will in order to make better provision for Eugene. He says that on the day she made the will, of 1882, she called upon him and told him that she had been in great anexiety in regard to that child and that she could not rest quietly until she had made a special provision for him, and that she had been to Mr. Tuttle's office and had executed a will by which she had made such provision.

Dr. Marsh, her physician, testifies that she called upon him (it was on the same day) and that he had quite a long conversation with her; that she spoke of having made a will and with one particular object; that of making provision for her grandson Eugene because he had since his childhod had an infirmity and disease which had left him permanently crippled. It appears from the testimony of Mrs. Dumas that the testatrix gave the same reason to Mr. Tuttle for desiring to make a new will. She gave another also: that James, to whom she had given the Passaic Street property by the will of 1879, had grieved her by his subsequent treatment of her. Mrs. Dumas testifies that Mr. Tuttle satisfied himself of the testatrix's testamentary competency by conversing with her for the purpose before drawing the will.

On the same day on which the will was executed, and after it had been executed, the testatrix, at the suggestion of Mr. Tuttle, went to Dr. Magie and Dr. Marsh with a view of obtaining from them a certificate that in their opinion she had testamentary capacity. This she did because she apprehended that opposition would be made to the will, on the ground of her alleged incapacity. Dr. Magie says she appeared unusually bright and intelligent, and that he never heard her speak more intelligently than she did at that time. He was her pastor for about fourteen years. Dr. Marsh says that he saw no evidence that she was laboring under any delusion, that she appeared to know what she was doing, that he talked with her about the provision she had made for Eugene, that he conversed with her upon some other matters at that time (in order to test her mind) and that he talked with her about the different members of her family; and he says her mind seemed perfectly clear but not very capacious; that her memory was not very capacious, although things seemed to be perfectly clear before her. He also says that she could not tell him the number of her children, whether there were four or five of them, nor where they were located, and that he saw no defect in her mind except a little want of clearness in that respect.

Mrs. Dumas testifies that the testatrix when questioned upon the subject by Mr Tuttle, with a view of drawing the will, gave the names and places of residence of her children. Indeed Mr. Tuttle and his son, by the act of signing the will as witnesses, certified that in their judgment the testatrix was possessed of testamentary capacity.

It would seem that the caveator himself did not then doubt her competency to dispose of her property. He says that before Christmas in 1882, his sister, Mrs. Crocker, with whom as already appears, the testatrix lived, said to him that she thought the latter had been to some lawyer's office and probably was making out some papers; and he says he asked the testatrix whether "she had lately been in any lawyer's office having anything to do with papers," and that she said she had not, and that he said: "If you have, there are the keys of your house and your bank book. You pay me what I have spent upon the house, and then take your property and do as you like with it." Again; he says he asked her if she had been to Mr. Tuttle's office "making out any papers" and she said she "had not altered a paper."

From the letters of Mrs. Crocker to Mrs. Dumas, contained in the testimony of the former, written one in June and the other in October, 1884, it appears that even at that distance of time Mrs. Crocker did not consider the testatrix as of unsound mind. Mrs. Crocker says that the testatrix was pretty well on the day when Mrs. Dumas came to the house and took the testatrix out, which Mrs. Crooker supposed was the day on which the will was made; but according to Mrs. Dumas' testimony, it was a day or two before that time; so that, according to Mrs. Crocker, the testatrix was in good condition of body and mind about the time of making the will.

The testatrix concealed the fact that she had made a new will from James and Mrs. Crocker, because she thought (and it would seem correctly) they would be displeased with her if they knew it. It may be added that she apprehended (and it appears not without reason) that James contemplated placing her in a lunatic asylum, and she was dissatisfied with his conduct towards her in taking her away from her house in Passaic Street, where she might have lived with Mrs. Dumas, and compelling her to live at Mrs. Crocker's; and she was displeased with him, because of his harsh treatment of her, before referred to, and because he persisted in taking her business into his own hands against her will, collecting her rents and keeping her bank book, etc.

Nor does the evidence establish the fact of undue influence on the part of Mrs. Dumas. It appears, as before stated from the testimony of Dr. Magie, that the testatrix had it in contemplation for a long time before she made the will in question to change her testamentary disposition of her estate so as to make better provision for Eugene. Her feelings towards James had changed because of his treatment of her; and it was natural for her, under the circumstances, to revoke the disposition so largely in his favor (which she had made in the will of 1879) by which she gave to him alone the Passaic Street property.

By the last will she treats her children substantially alike, making only such slight discrimination as was reasonable and to be expected in favor of James as to the bedroom set and her daughters as to her wearing apparel. The reasons which led her to change the disposition as to James would of course lead her to appoint another person executor. She herself appointed the respondent whom she had long known as a member of the church to which she belonged. It may be added in this connection that before she went to Mr. Tuttle's office to have the will drawn she requested her neighbor Judge Sanderson to act as executor, but he declined. It may be added that the fact that the change in the disposition of her estate was largely due to her wish to provide for Eugene is evidenced by the provision contained in the will that in case of deficiency the legacies to others shall abate proportionately, but his shall not abate at all.

The orphans' court had the witnesses before it, and had the advantage of seeing them and of observing their manner in giving their testimony. They adjudged that the will was well executed, that the testatrix had testamentary capacity and that the will was not the product of fraud.

I see no ground for coming to a different conclusion. The decree will be affirmed. The costs of this litigation in both courts and a reasonable counsel fee to both sides, in both the orphans' court and this court, should be paid out of the estate.

CROSS APPEALS from a decree of an advisory master, on exceptions to a master's report of a balance due from an administrator on a bill for an account. Affirmed.

The facts appear from the opinion.

After hearing the exceptions to the master's report Joseph D. BEDLE, Esq., Advisory Master, filed the following conclusions:

I think the jurisdiction of the court of chancery to deal equitably with this case is clear, although no question is raised upon it. The claim of the complainants is subject to equitable adjustment and control.

The administrator has kept his accounts in such a way, and mingled the funds of the estate with his own in such manner, as to make the examination of the case very difficult; and for that reason he is entitled to no liberal consideration in a court of equity. Still, it is not the right of the complainants in any way that they should profit by his errors.

I detect no actual fraud in the management of the estate. The management has been loose, and, from a mistaken judgment, palpably so; yet in the settlement of the equities and the subjection of himself to proper liability the object of the court should be to do equity to these complainants, to give them what they are fully entitled to under the circumstances.

Although the management has been loose, yet in some respects I think it may be said that it is not unlikely that they will get more out of the estate than if the management had been better.

If there had been a guardian appointed for these minors, who were very young when their father died, and the expenses of the guardianship, and the disbursements of the moneys through the hands of a guardian, it is not unlikely that these complainants would have received less than they will receive now. The view I take of it is that they should not profit by the mistakes and looseness of management of the administrator, but that they should, by an equitable adjustment, be entitled fairly to what their interests require in this estate.

Now I will take up these exceptions: in regard to the first, second, seventh and eighth (these being the exceptions applicable to the two children and concerning the claim on the part of the administrator for board after the death of the father and up to the final accounting, and also for clothing), my judgment is that the final account settled May 6, 1872, does not conclude the allowance of these claims. It would not have been proper to include in the final account any of these matters. Whatever advancements have been made to those who are entitled to a distributive share of the estate are not proper matters to go into the final account at all.

The account must be settled without reference to any advance; and the fact of an advancement preceding the final account does not conclude an allowance therefor.

There is an error in a good many that the final account takes in all transactions previous to it. These moneys, that are advances on the distributive interest, are to be taken out of the balance when settled in the final account; and, therefore, I do not regard that these exceptants are concluded by the final account, and do not see any reason why these allowances should not be made up to the final account as claimed for the board of the children and the clothing. They were of tender years; and the amount claimed seems to be not unreasonable, both for the board and clothing.

I therefore shall allow these exceptions, viz.: the first, second, seventh and eighth, and these amounts should be taken right out of the balance fund in the final account. They need not disturb the system of calculating interest by the master, except only so far as they will reduce the amount that he starts with.

Now that brings us to the third and ninth exceptions: I shall disallow these exceptions. The facts do not warrant them.

Now I take up the fourth exception: speaking generally, the master has stopped any allowances on the account of Charles since 1880, or rather there are no allowances after that time, being about the time of his marriage. In the account of the administrator in regard to Charles, there is a gap between November 22, 1879, and April 29, 1881, and this exception is to the nonallowance of a claim for groceries between that date, April 29, 1881, and July 1, 1884. The question is as to whether that exception should be allowed during the time the mother was living with Charles and his wife, Charles having been married in or about the month of October, 1880. The evidence is clear that Charles got these groceries. He admits it, and it is evident that they were obtained through the instrumentality of the mother.

I have examined this testimony several times on this point, and the conclusion that I have reached is that those groceries, so much a month, were actually received by Charles, and there is no controversy in the case about the facts with reference to it. I therefore think that he should be charged with them; I do not see any reason why he should not be. He was then married. He had his wife, and they were living together; the mother was living with them, and he got the benefit of these groceries. I think the equities are all most decidedly in favor of allowing this claim.

I now take up the tenth exception and also the eleventh: the tenth exception is a claim for rent from March 1, 1879, to March 1, 1882, at $10 per month. The eleventh exception is a claim for rent from March 1, 1882, to July 1, 1884, at $10 per month. Emma became of age October 5, 1881. The allowances on the account of Emma cease, under the master's report, September 6, 1877, which I understand to be the date of her marriage. I have concluded not to make any allowance for rent previous to October 5, 1881, the time she became of age; and my reason is that although there are some equities in favor of it, from the fact that she did, with her husband, actually occupy this house, yet I do not think that, in the light of her minority and the fact of her having a husband, I should make this allowance. I think that the administrator should be at whatever loss he has sustained by reason of that; but the proof is, in substance—and there does not seem to be any controversy in the testimony about it—that she was there occupying these premises under an understanding that they were to be paid for out of her share of the estate.

The administrator swears to that, and she herself admits it distinctly, in forms of expression like this: that she had received nothing except rent. She repeats that several times, over and over again; and it is quite clear, from the general run of her testimony, that she regarded herself as in there under an arrangement that she should meet the rent out of her estate. Now, when she became of age, I do not see any difficulty in her making such an arrangement; and I think the facts warrant my deciding that that was the fact, and I do not feel willing to deprive the administrator of his claim for that rent, under those circumstances, when she, an adult, taking it from the time of her becoming of age, was occupying this property under an understanding that the rent should be satisfied out of her distributive share of that estate.

I have read the testimony several times upon that point, both the testimony of Emma and Mr. Traphagen, and that is the conclusion which irresistibly forces itself upon me. I therefore think that, notwithstanding her husband, but treating her as of age October 5, 1881, and she occupying the premises and getting the benefit of it, under an arrangement that it should come out of her distributive share, the administrator should have an allowance for it here.

These two exceptions then will be allowed, so far as they cover the rent from October 5, 1881, the time that she became of age, up to the end of the claim for rent. These tenth and eleventh exceptions both have reference to Emma, and they are allowed as stated.

The twelfth exception is disallowed.

The fifteenth exception, which is the claim for commissions is disallowed.

Now, the other exceptions cover the question of interest. In regard to interest, as I understand the mode adopted by the master, up to the period of time when he ceased to make allowances, he calculated interest at the end of each year, deducting the allowances or payments, commencing six months after the final accounting. I think that that principle is right, but, so far as any question of compounding after that is concerned, I disallow it.

Practically, a readjustment of the account will result in this: These allowances that are now made cover a later period of time, and up to near the commencement of the suit. My decision is that the same system of calculation adopted by the master during the period of time that he made allowances be continued during the whole period covered by the allowances now made by me, and that the balance be not compounded, but draw only simple interest. And my reason for that is this : that the allowances or payments were such that it would be unjust to adopt any compound system.

The amount of the interest was not such as to require the administrator to keep it invested, under the penalty of having it compounded against him; and besides, the payments will absorb the interest,

The administrator is to pay the costs out of his own pocket.

Mr. S. B. Ransom, for Henry Traphagen, administrator.

Messrs. Parmley, Olendorf & Fisk, for Charles E. Rogers.

Reed, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are cross appeals from a final decree, fixing the extent of the liability of Henry Traphagen as administrator of Charles E. Rogers,

Charles E. Rogers died December 7, 1870, leaving a widow and two children, Charles E. and Emma A.

Letters of administration were granted to Henry Traphagen on December 24, 1870.

On May 6, 1872, Mr. Traphagen filed his final account as administrator, with the surrogate of the County of Hudson, which was duly passed showing a balance in his hands of $6,897.54.

He paid to the widow the one third part of said balance, and held the children's portions of $2,132.51 each in his own hands, no guardian of the estate of the children having been appointed. The administrator, at different times and in various ways, made payments of money to, and for the benefit of, the children, up to the time when they attained their majority. On February 29, 1884, the children filed their bill in the court of chancery for an account, and on October 15, 1884, an account was ordered.

The master, to whom the matter was referred, reported that there was due to the complainant Charles E. Rogers, the sum of $2,210, 44, and to Emma A., the sum of $2,824.78.

Exceptions were by Mr. Traphagen, filed to this report, which exceptions were referred to Advisory Master Bedle, who advised a decree allowing a number of the exceptions and disallowing others. From these conclusions of the master, appeals are taken by both parties to the suit.

In the consideration of the counter contentions as to the amount of the allowances which should be permitted to the accountant, it is observable that the administrator made the disbursements to the infants and for their benefit, in a manner entirely irregular.

The functions of his office as administrator were entirely ended when he had filed his account and received the orphans' court's approval thereof, with the one duty still subsisting, namely, that of paying over the balance in his hands to the persons by law entitled thereto. The persons entitled by law would have been the regularly appointed guardians of the infants. Payment by a trustee to an infant, without the sanction of the court, is irregular, and the trustee may be compelled to pay again to the infant when he comes of age. Dagley v. Tolferry, 1 P. Wms. 285; Phillips v. Paget, 2 Atk. 80; Davies v. Austen, 3 Bro. Ch. 178; Lee v. Brown, 4 Ves. 362; Furman v. Coe, 1 Cai. Cas. 96.

The court, sometimes, where the amount is small, for the purpose of saving the expense of taking out letters of guardianship will direct a payment to a relative of the infant. Farrance v. Viley, 21 L. J. Ch. 313; Ker v. Ruxton, 16 Jur. 491.

It is not, however, an inflexible rule that payment directly to an infant, without an order of the court which supervises the trust, results in a forfeiture of all benefit arising from the payment made.

Nor do I perceive any reason why, in the absence of bad faith on the part of the person making the payment, he should not be allowed the benefit of all disbursements, which would clearly have been sanctioned by a court of equity had the administrator occupied the position of guardian.

His conduct should undoubtedly be scanned with the closest scrutiny; but if his acts appear to have been bona fide, and to have been attended by a benefit to the infant cestui que trust, then he is equitably entitled to the same degree of relief as if his conduct had been marked by the strictest conformity to the rules of legal or equitable procedure.

The advisory master in the present case recognized this equitable rule in dealing with the several questions presented for his consideration. Regarding the cause from the same point of view, the question is presented whether the court of chancery, in so dealing with the accounts, failed in certain particulars to reach correct results.

The counsel for Mr. Traphagen first insists that he should be allowed a bill for groceries which were delivered to Emma A., and paid for by Traphagen. Emma was at this time married, and living with her husband and her mother, although she was yet an infant. Her husband was presumably able to support her, and it was his duty to do so. The disallowance of this payment was correct.

Next, the counsel objects to the manner in which the advisory master dealt with a claim for the allowance of $324 for three years' rent.

It appears that Emma A. removed with her husband, in March, 1879, into a house belonging to Mr. Traphagen, and lived there until July 1, 1884. Mr. Traphagen prayed an allowance for $9 per month rent, during a period from March 1, 1879, to March 1, 1882, and for $10 per month for the rest of the period of occupancy.

Emma arrived at her majority on October 5, 1881.

The advisory master sustained the claim for an allowance for rent from the time Emma was of age, but disallowed it for the time previous to that event.

The disallowance is based upon the fact of her infancy and her marriage, and the consequent liability of her husband to support her. The allowance is grounded upon a contract made by her after she attained her majority, by which the rent was to be deducted from her distributive share.

I think there is in her testimony that which justified the conclusion of the master in finding the existence of such an agreement; and the law places no obstacles in the way of such a contract on the part of a married woman. If the renting was to her, it was her own contract, and valid by the terms of our statute.

In regard to that part of the rent, the allowance of which was refused, it is urged that the master erred. It is insisted that Emma, by remaining in possession of the premises after October 1, 1881, ratified an agreement to pay rent, made while she was an infant. The position of Emma is likened to that of a person who has purchased land while an infant and remains in possession when of age; and of one, who, having taken a lease for years, remains in possession after attaining his majority. But whatever may be the effect of the retention of possession by an adult, of the subject of his infantile contract of sale or letting, it is apparent that the facts in the present case bear no resemblance to either of the samples.

There was no contract of letting, for a term of years proven, which expired after the arrival of October 5. There is nothing to show the terms under which she agreed to hold the house.

Mr. Traphagen says that he charged so much a month, and she says that she received nothing from Mr. Traphagen but rent.

Upon this slender foundation is built up an agreement to pay rent accruing after she arrived at her majority, but certainly no contract for any specific time can be deduced from it.

The agreement to pay after arriving at maturity seems to be merely an admission of a liability to pay for a previous use and occupation. Certainly the possession of Emma cannot be said to have been the ratification of any precedent contract.

It is also a ground of objection that there is a compounding of interest, against the express views of the advisory master, who ordered simple interest. On the other hand it is objected that the part of the decree which directs that there shall be no compounding is erroneous.

The advisory master ordered yearly rests, so long as there were payments made by Mr. Traphagen, and interest to be computed upon the balances; but he directed that only simple interest should be computed after the disbursements ceased.

I am not clear but this was an equitable adjustment of this branch of the case under all the circumstances, and that it should stand.

The counsel for the complainants below, upon their appeal, insist that there was error in permitting the administrator to claim an allowance for disbursements made to the infants previous to the settlement as administrator. It is said that the presumption is conclusive that such payments were included in that account.

But there is no such presumption, because such payments would have no legitimate place in such accounting. They can be regarded as payments in advance of a part of the distributive shares in the estate, and can be deducted whenever such shares are claimed. As the claims are made by way of this bill for an accounting, it is the right of the defendant to claim the benefit of any legal disbursements to the distributees, made at any time upon the credit of the future shares to be distributed.

There is a claim allowed, however, about which I have had some doubt.

It is a sum of $294.03, claimed to have been paid to the mother of Charles, for his benefit, by groceries delivered to her, and charged to Mr. Traphagen.

At this time Charles was married, and was earning wages, and his mother was living with him. The groceries, Charles says, he got the benefit of. This amount was all that he received during this period from the administrator. It seems to have been a great assistance to him. It was not in excess of the interest charged against the administrator during that period, so no inroads were made upon the principal of the infant's estate. I think if a guardian had made this expenditure, it would receive the sanction of the supervising court. So I incline to an allowance of this item.

I think the conclusions reached by the advisory master in other respects should stand, and that the decree below should be affirmed, without costs.

Decree unanimously affirmed.

APPEAL from a decree of the Court of Chancery. Reversed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles D. Thompson, and George Northrop of Philadelphia, for appellant.

Messrs. Cortlandt and R. Wayne Parker, for respondent.

Reed, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decree appealed from was made upon a petition filed in this cause. The facts involved in the suit which are important in respect to the question raised by the petition are substantially the following:

Trotter, the respondent, in 1881, entered into an agreement with one Heckscher that he would deliver to Heckscher 12,000 tons of Franklinite ore in regular monthly shipments of 1,000 tons each month, said shipments not to fall short of 990 tons nor be in excess of 1,010 tons.

The agreement further provided that after the expiration of the time mentioned for the delivery of the above 12,000 tons, Heckscher, upon notice to Trotter, should have the right to the delivery to him of such quantities of ore as he indicated in his notice, under certain specified conditions.

On the 6th day of August, 1881, Heckscher assigned all his interest existing under this agreement to the appellants, the Lehigh Zinc & Iron Company. On the 22d of May, 1882, the said Company gave notice to Trotter that they would take 12,000 tons of the said ore annually, in monthly shipments of not less than 990 tons, nor more than 1,010 tons, until the year 1907, under the same terms, covenants and conditions as contained in the agreement of June 2, 1881.

The agreement provided that the prices of the said ore should be graded according to the percentage of the oxide of zinc which it was found to contain by the test made by an assayer or assayers to be appointed by the parties. A disagreement arose in 1882 in respect to the accuracy of the assays, and Trotter, alleging that money was due him which the Company refused to pay, stopped the shipment of ore. He then filed a bill for the specific performance of the agreement, and the Company filed a cross bill for the same purpose and for the appointment of a receiver of the mine.

The court in August, 1882, appointed a manager for the purpose of seeing that the ore was delivered and paid for, according to the terms of the contract. This was in accordance with the prayers of both parties.

†Head note by Reed, J.

The Zinc Company failed to pay for the ores shipped under the contract for the month of December, 1884, and on January 15, 1885, the manager ordered shipments to stop and they thereupon stopped.

The reason assigned by the Zinc Company in its answer to the petition for the cessation of payments is based upon the following alleged existing facts: that Trotter, when he entered into the agreement to deliver ore, was a lessee of the land from which the ore was to be taken. His lessor was James L. Curtis, who had the legal title to the premises. Curtis conveyed his reversion to the Franklinite Steel & Zinc Company, and that company sold the same to Heckscher. Under one of the two leases made to Trotter rents and royalties were reserved; and Heckscher, as the assignee of the reversion, claimed these from Trotter.

Attachments were issued, both in this State and in the State of Pennsylvania, for their collection. Under the last mentioned writ the moneys due from the Lehigh Zinc & Iron Company in Pennsylvania to Trotter were attached. After the service of this writ of attachment the Lehigh Zinc & Iron Company held back the December payment. This was followed, as we have observed, by a stoppage of the shipments of ore. Trotter then filed the present petition. In it was set forth the issuance of the writs of attachment and that the claim of Heckscher for royalties was unfounded, that the moneys due were required to operate the mine.

The petitioner prayed that Heckscher might be enjoined from prosecuting his writs of attachment, that he be decreed in contempt for the issuing of the same, and that the Zinc & Iron Company might be decreed to have forfeited its right (which had been decreed to it in the suit) to detain in the court of chancery moneys due to the petitioner. The petitioner prayed to be advised whether by reason of the foregoing acts of Heckscher and the Company he was not justified in abrogating the contract made for the delivery of and payment for the ore.

Upon the hearing upon the petition and answers it was decreed that Heckscher was in contempt for issuing the attachment in Pennsylvania. It was further decreed that Trotter should ship to the Lehigh Zinc & Iron Company each month the number of tons called for in the contract, and also should deliver in addition thereto at least 250 tons of ore each month, until the whole number of tons of ore due to the defendants for the months of January, February and March should have been shipped, but no more in any month, unless defendants required it. It is from this part of the decree, namely: the order for the extra shipments of ore, that this appeal is taken by the Lehigh Zinc & Iron Company.

The action of the manager in stopping the shipments of quotas of ore for the months of January, February and March was induced by the failure of the defendants to pay for the previous December shipment. He acted upon the supposition that the failure of the Company to pay for one or more justified him in refusing to deliver any subsequent quota until the previous dues were liquidated.

In this view he was supported by the court, which by an intermediate order approved his conduct in this respect. It was upon the assumption that the stoppage of the shipments was justified by the default of the defendants, and for the purpose of restoring to the petitioner what he had lost by the cessation of shipments for three months, that the part of the decree appealed from was made.

It seems plain, however, that under the contract the failure of the defendants to pay for the December shipment did not justify a refusal to deliver the quotas due in each of the succeeding three months.

When this cause was before this court on a previous occasion it was held that a default in payment for one installment of ore did not excuse the nondelivery of a subsequent portion unless the conduct of the defaulting party was such as to evince an intention to abandon the contract. Trotter v. Heckscher, 2 Cent. Rep. 729, 13 Stew. Eq. 612.

No facts are apparent which indicate such an intention on the part of the defendants; but on the contrary all the circumstances display the absence of such an intent. But even if it be admitted that an unjustifiable refusal to pay for the December shipment afforded a legal ground for the refusal to make deliveries during the three subsequent months, yet the facts appearing in the petition and the answer to the petition relieves the defendant from responsibility for the failure to make the payment.

The money due upon the December delivery was impounded in the hands of the defendant by legal process from the Courts of Pennsylvania. Although the attachment, under which this was done, was sued out by Heckscher, and although he was held to be in contempt by the court of chancery for this conduct, yet no complicity between him and the defendants in carrying out this scheme is proven.

After the garnishment of the money due for the December quota the defendants were powerless to do aught except hold the money to answer the purposes of that proceeding, until the attachment was dissolved or otherwise terminated.

It seems clear, therefore, that the defendants were not responsible for the failure to pay for the December quota of ore and also that the petitioner was inexcusable for not delivering the quotas for the months of January, February and March. The decree therefore compels a party, not in the wrong and against his wish and presumably to his disadvantage, to accept ore at times and in quantities uncalled for in his contract, for the purpose of aiding the party who, without excuse, refused to deliver the ore according to his agreement. In this view of the question involved the decree seems to be erroneous. Nor does this seem the less true because of the existence of the circumstance that by the assent of both parties the court of chancery had placed a manager in charge of the business whose duty it was to make deliveries of ore, and to collect pay for them; and it was the manager who stopped the deliveries during the three months.

It is obvious that the manager was not appointed to modify the terms of the contract between the parties, but for the purpose of executing that instrument. And the power of direction over his conduct which existed in the court of chancery would be exercised in the light of the rights of the parties under the provisions of their agreement. It has already appeared that, under the contract, the circumstances which surround the present transaction afford no ground for the present order. And if the manager be regarded, in respect to his previous conduct, as the representative of both parties to the contract, then no act on his part can be the subject matter of complaint by the petitioner nor can the result of such be visited upon the defendants in the shape of this adverse decree.

In any aspect in which the cause can be viewed, I think that the decree is erroneous and should be reversed.

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Chancery, denying a petition for an allowance or deduction from a price paid on a contract. Affirmed.

The opinion of Bird, V. C., advising the order appealed from, is reported in 5 Central Reporter, 644.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. D. Thompson and H. C. Pitney, for appellant.

Messrs. Cortlandt & R. Wayne Parker, for respondent.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal presents a question as to the proper mode of assaying ore, under the contract between Charles W. Trotter and Charles A. Hecksher, who assigned his rights to the appellant, which is stated at length in Trotter v. Heckscher, 2 Cent. Rep. 729, 732, 13 Stew. Eq. 612, 645.

In that case it was decided by this court that the contract allowed to the appellant a reasonable discretion as to when and where the assay should be made, and that the making of the assay at Bethlehem, in the method theretofore used was a proper exercise of that discretion.

In the assay then approved by us, no account was taken of the moisture of the ore, nor was any suggestion made that it was at all important.

But in April, 1883, it occurred to the appellant that, in handling, crushing, separating, and pulverizing the ore, preparatory to getting a sample for analysis, the moisture contained in the ore when delivered was evaporated, so that while the pinch of dust taken by the chemist might correctly represent the average of all the other ingredients of the ore, it did not represent the moisture; and consequently, when the chemist reported that in a specified weight of the dust he had found a specified weight of Zn. O., the percentage of Zn. O. thus indicated was not the true percentage of Zn. O. in the ore, but was greater than the true percentage, according to the amount of moisture which the ore contained.

Acting upon this idea, in December, 1884, the appellant took a separate sample of the ore from each case as it arrived at Bethlehem, and weighed it, then dried it in bulk at a temperature of about 96° F., and again weighed it, thus discovering that the ore had lost in drying 3.04 per cent of its weight; hence, the inference was drawn that the weight of Zn. O. found by the chemist in the pulverized sample should be reduced in the same proportion, in order to give the true percentage of Zn. O. in the ore, and so the reputed percentage of that month, December, 1884, which was 29.93, should become 29.02. Similar processes for the subsequent months gave somewhat similar results.

Inasmuch as the price of the ore was fixed according to its richness in Zn. O. increasing fifty cents per ton for each additional 1 per cent of Zn. O. above 26 per cent, the differences in percentage seemed important, and accordingly, early in 1885, the appellant presented to the chancellor (under the supervision of whose manager the ores were being delivered and the assays made), a petition asking that due allowances be awarded on account of this moisture. The chancellor denied the petition, and, we think, rightly.

According to the contract, the ore was to be delivered to the appellant on the cars at Franklin, New Jersey, and its price was to be fixed by its richness in Zn. O. when delivered. After receiving it at Franklin, the appellant transported it on open cars a distance of sixty-two miles to Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, before attempting to ascertain the amount of its moisture. It is evident that the amount of moisture in the ore at Bethlehem furnishes no safe indication of the amount at Franklin. It will vary with the constantly changing atmospheric conditions through which the ore has passed in transportation. This variation will indeed be confined to comparatively narrow limits, but it is because slight differences are important that the appellant filed its petition.

When the appellant seeks to substitute, for a method of analysis adopted by itself and approved by the other party to the contract, a new method not approved by the other party, and asks the court to sanction the substitution, upon the ground that the new method is more accurate than the old, it should satisfy the court that its ground is well taken. But we are not satisfied that such is the fact.

A supplemental petition filed by the appellant on July 8, 1886, states that its tests showed moisture in the ore varying from an average of 3.04 per cent of the whole weight in December, 1884, to an average of 0.36 per cent in August, 1885. Whether these differences were due to causes operating before the delivery at Franklin or to those operating afterwards, there is no testimony to show, and conjecture may at least as easily fasten upon the latter as upon the former. Moreover, it is not clear that the sample, when weighed by the chemist for analysis, is free from moisture. The petition avers that it containes "no appreciable moisture." But we understand that in the analysis as at first conducted no attention was paid to moisture, and it is not suggested that the method of analysis has been changed; hence, we are not informed that any (or if any what) effort was made to detect the moisture in the sample.

*Head note by DIXON, J.

It seems plain that, unless it was weighed by the chemist in an atmosphere as drying as that through which the bulky sample, used for estimating the moisture, had passed, it would have absorbed more moisture proportionally than that bulky sample contained, and that the proportion would be greater than the mere difference in dryness of air would occasion; for the many particles of the pulverized sample would expose a relatively larger surface than the lumps of the bulky mass. Although the moisture thus adhering to the sample might be incapable of being separated and weighed by the chemist, yet still it might amount to some thousandths or even hundredths of the little pinch subjected to analysis, for we have already learned in this case that the assay of this ore is a very difficult process, and that elements which one chemist detects escape another equally skilled; hence, our conclusion, that there is nothing in the case, either of averment or of evidence, warranting the belief that injustice is done the appellant by refusing the allowance for which it prays, or any allowance based upon tests made in the manner above set forth.

The respondent, in answering the petitions filed, insists that the usage of those dealing in ores of this nature is so uniformly to disregard moisture, that the agreement of these parties must be construed in compliance with it, and hence that any tests for moisture naturally in the ore are excluded by the contract. We do not pass upon this claim, because it is not properly presented in the evidence, and the cause can be decided without it.

Let the order appealed from be affirmed.

NATIONAL BANK OF RAHWAY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Rachel A. BREWSTER.

A note made by a married woman to a firm of which her husband is a member is void at law, and an action at law cannot be maintained thereon by an indorsee.

(Decided — — — 1887.)

ERROR to the Union Circuit Court, to review a judgment of nonsuit in an action on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Vail & Ward, for plaintiff in error:

The note in suit was given by Mrs. Brewster for her own benefit, for materials used in the construction of her house; and no defense is made, except the technical one that her husband is a member of the firm who are the payees.

The defendant is clearly liable in law, unless protected by the last clause of section 14 of the Act in relation to the property of married women.

Rev. p. 636.

The contract was not made with Walter Brewster, but with Brewster & Co., from whom the material was purchased; and the case is analogous to that of a note made by an individual to a firm of which he was a partner. Upon such a note a suit at law could not be maintained by the payees against the maker; but the disability would be removed by indorsement to some third party.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in the Union Circuit, to recover the amount due upon a promissory note made by the defendant, a married woman, to a mercantile firm of which her husband was a member. The note was transferred by proper indorsement, before maturity, to the plaintiff. The circuit court nonsuited the plaintiff.

The plaintiff's counsel insist that although the payees of the note, the firm of which the husband was a member, could not have sued the defendant at law upon the note, the indorsees may do so. This proposition is based upon the notion that the only reason why a suit at law could not be maintained against the maker upon such a note is that a husband cannot maintain an action against his wife because of their unity in law, and that, therefore, if the note be held by a stranger, the difficulty is overcome. But at law, the contract between husband and wife is null and void, and the defect is inherent in the contract which therefore cannot be enforced at law.

In Gould v. Gould, 8 Stew. Eq. 37, affirmed, p. 562, a wife lent money to her husband's firm upon their promissory note. After his death, she brought suit at law against the surviving members of the firm. She was nonsuited, and it was held that in order to recover the money she must have recourse to equity.

The judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

For reversal—None.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 143, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 3 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of trover. Reversed.

This was an action of trover, begun by capias, by Rose Bella Flanigan, Administratrix of Patrick Flanigan, deceased, against Thomas Flanigan, to recover the value of goods alleged to have been appropriated by the defendant.

At the trial before FINLETTER, J., the following facts appeared:

Patrick and Rose Bella Flanigan were husband and wife. The defendant was Patrick's father. Some time about the 12th day of December, 1883, Patrick being sick agreed with his wife that they should separate, and that he should go home to his father, and that the household goods should be divided between them. This was done, and the goods divided as agreed on, she taking the piano, and he the rest of the furniture. Patrick then went to live with his father. A short time after, Patrick died at his father's house.

The defendant alleged that before his death Patrick gave to him the furniture he had retained under the agreement with his wife, and requested him to pay the funeral expenses after his death; and that the expenses, amounting to $202, were duly paid by him.

The plaintiff alleged that Patrick did not give the furniture to his father, and having at the trial proved Patrick's ownership of the goods and the defendant's refusal to give them up, rested.

The defendant's evidence is sufficiently set forth in the opinion.

In rebuttal the plaintiff's counsel called Mrs. Deal who, being sworn, testified as follows:

I lived next door to Mr. and Mrs. Flanigan. I was often in the house.

Q. What knowledge have you of Mrs. Flanigan's sitting up with her husband, Patrick Flanigan?

Defendant objected.

Objection overruled. Exception. First assignment of error.

A. I know she sat up all night, and she carried the pillows and bolsters up and down stairs, and also a feather bed, when he did not feel well; and she often carried a feather bed down stairs for him; and went out at 1 o'clock at night to get liquor to make him punches, which he fancied. He took a fancy to doughnuts, and I went in there to make them, between 11 and 12 o'clock at night, at Mrs. Flanigan's desire. They lived like two children, and I never heard them have a word. He said: "I have the best of care, and she gives me better care than my mother could or would. I could not have a better wife."

The plaintiff also offered evidence of a demand on defendant's daughter for the body of the plaintiff's husband, as follows:

Plaintiff's counsel calls upon defendant's counsel to produce a letter, written by plaintiff to defendant, December 17, 1883, of which notice was given defendant's counsel, January 20, 1885, by John McDonald. Defendant's counsel does not produce the same. Thereupon the plaintiff's counsel offers in evidence a copy of said letter, as follows.

Mr. Flanigan, Stone Mason:
Clementine and Emerald Sts.

Dear Sir:

I respectfully claim the body of my late husband for the purpose of burial, and will thank you to let me know, by bearer, if you are willing for me to take it without trouble. As his wife, it is my right; and you must not do me the injustice of refusal. He will be buried from my father's house, 329 E. York St.

Your daughter-in-law,
(Signed,) Rose Bella Flanigan.
Dec. 17, 1883.

Plaintiff's counsel thereupon also offered in evidence the answer to the foregoing, as follows:

Belle Flanigan:

You will not get your husband's body. Go ahead with your trouble, if you like. You will never get Patrick's body.

Plaintiff's counsel also offered in evidence the envelope, wherein the answer was contained, bearing the following indorsement, viz:

Bella Flanigan,
Mr. Flanigan, Stone Mason,
Clementine and Emerald Sts. Philad'a.

Defendant objected. Objection overruled. Second assignment of error.

The court charged, inter alia, as follows:

"From the evidence it would appear that the defendant came to take his son and the furniture away. There is no evidence that the sick man desired it, nor that the defendant had any reason to do what he did. It was a case in which a man, without authority of any kind, takes possession of another man's property. The evidence is that the father went there for that purpose. You, therefore, start with a wrongful act! No one has a right to come to a man's house and take away his property without authority.

"The evidence tended to show that the defendant absolutely refused to allow her (the wife) to see her dying husband. The defendant forcibly carried away property which he had no right to take. The defense is that the husband, on his death bed, gave these things to the father, upon the condition that he would pay the funeral expenses.

"The witness said that the dying man said to his father: 'Take my furniture, and pay my expenses.' If that were true, it gave him no right to keep the furniture. He says, take the furniture, and pay the debts of my funeral. If the husband had said, 'I make you a present. I give you these upon condition that you pay my debts,' then of course they would have belonged to the father when he paid all the debts of the son; but the only witness who speaks of that does not bring it up to that point. Of the credibility of this witness it is a matter entirely for you to judge. It does not amount to a gift to the father; it simply amounts to this: that the goods were given to him in trust to pay his debts. That he has not done. I do not see that there is any defense, unless the jury are satisfied that there was an absolute gift, in so many words, from the son to the father. But I apprehend you will not find there was a gift of the goods. It does not amount to a gift, if you believe the daughter, and I do not see how you can under the evidence." Third assignment of error.

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, for $590.

Mr. John S. McKinlay, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Joseph Mellors, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The first and second assignments of error must be sustained, for the reason that the testimony was irrelevant. That Mrs. Flanigan kindly treated her husband while they lived together had nothing to do with the issue. The testimony of Mrs. Deal was inadmissible to contradict Kate Flanigan, if that was the purpose for which it was offered, for Kate Flanigan testified to what had occurred at her father's house, and Mrs. Deal to what occurred at another time and place. The letters showing that the widow of Patrick Flanigan demanded his body, which was refused her, were written after the alleged conversion of the goods. Such testimony as is set out in these assignments might raise indignation in the minds of the jurors, and enlarge punitive damages; but the facts, not having occurred at the time of the alleged wrongful taking of the goods, were impertinent.

The third assignment must also be sustained. Patrick Flanigan and his furniture were taken to his father's house some days before Patrick's death. A daughter of the defendant testified that Patrick gave the furniture to the defendant, saying: "Father, I give you all my furniture, to pay all my expenses." She said this was on Wednesday, and Patrick died on the following Sunday. The learned judge of the common pleas disbelieved the witness, and did not see how the jury could believe her; but it was for the jury to determine her credibility, and whether Patrick gave the furniture to his father. If he did, the act of taking possession by the father was settled in the lifetime of the son. From the testimony the jury could well have found that the goods were taken on the same day that Patrick went to the defendant's house, and that Patrick was present when his goods were removed from his own dwelling. In that case, in absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption is that Patrick went of his own will, and assented to the moving of the furniture, not that the father's act at the start was wrongful.

Saxon testified that he hauled the furniture to Thomas Flanigan's house. It appears in the testimony, set out in the bill of exceptions, that Saxon was asked if he did not say that he had been employed by the defendant, and he answered: "I do not remember. Mr. Patrick Flanigan employed me to take the furniture away." Were this a mistake, and even if the defendant had employed Saxon, the other evidence was such that the jury ought not to have been told, "The defendant forcibly carried away property which he had no right to take."

Did Patrick give the furniture to the defendant? We think there was sufficient evidence to require submission of that question to the jury. And if submitted, it should not be fogged with narrations of family difficulties which have no connection with the alleged act which is the foundation of this suit. The issue involves no extended inquiry into the conduct of the parties toward each other either before or after the alleged conversion.

Judgment reversed, and venire facias de novo awarded.

Lavinia E. PRENTICE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

A. J. PLEASONTON, Trustee under the Will of Joseph Dugan, Deceased, Garnishee of Alfred Pleasonton.

A fund held in trust under a will, and directed by a decree of the orphans' court, "to be paid to the defendant to be applied to his personal support and maintenance or in his discretion to the support and education of any children he may have, so as the same shall not be in any manner assignable or anticipated, nor liable to his debts or liabilities, or that the trustee may, if thought needful by him, apply the fund in like manner for the benefit of the said defendant and any of his children," is not attachable.

(Argued March 23, Decided April 4, 1887.)

Error to Common Pleas No. 2 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for garnishee in attachment sur judgment. Affirmed.

November 24, 1886, the plaintiff issued an attachment in execution on a judgment against Alfred Pleasonton and A. J. Pleasonton, Trustee, under the will of Joseph Dugan, deceased, as garnishee. Interrogatories were subsequently filed by the plaintiff. In his answer to these, the garnishee admitted that he had funds in his hands belonging to said Alfred Pleasonton, under certain decrees of the orphans' court; but he averred that by the terms of said decree said funds were not liable to attachment.

The court discharged a rule for judgment taken upon the garnishee's answer to the interrogatories. The garnishee pleaded nulla bona, and the case was put at issue. On the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence the will of Joseph Dugan, which provided, inter alia, as follows:

"I give and bequeath to my said niece, Mrs. Caroline Pleasonton, one annuity of $4,000 per annum, to be paid to her during the term of her natural life, for her own sole and separate use, and upon her own receipt, notwithstanding her coverture, and free from the control of any husband whatsoever; said annuity to be paid her by my trustees, hereinafter named, out of the rents, dividends and incomes of the estate and property hereinafter devised and bequeathed to them, in half yearly payments of $2,000 each; the first payment to be made at the end of six calendar months from the date of my decease.

"If my said niece, Caroline Pleasonton, shall survive my said sister, Ann Dugan, then it is my will, and I do order and direct, that her annuity shall be increased by the additional sum of $4,000 per annum, so as to make the whole amount of her said annuity equal to $8,000 per annum; the said increased annuity to be paid to her at the same time and in the same manner as before provided for. If the death of my said sister shall occur before my own decease, then the first semi-annual payment to be made to my said niece, Caroline, will be $4,000; but if my sister shall survive me, and shall die before said Caroline, then the first payment to be made to her, after the death of my sister, shall include, in addition to the amount due upon the original annuity, such proportion of the additional sum hereby given as may be adequate to the time which shall then have elapsed from the death; and my said sister's representatives shall be entitled to receive the sum which will make up all arrearages of her annuity, calculated and apportioned to the time of her death.

"I do hereby further give and bequeath to my said niece, Caroline Pleasonton, in addition to the above annuity and increased annuity, and do order and direct to be paid to her in semi-annual payments the sum of $500 per annum for each and every of her children that shall, at my decease, be twelve years of age, or that shall afterwards attain to that age (as many sums of $500 as there shall be children of twelve years of age), to be applied by her to and for the clothing and education of her said children. The payment of each sum of $500 is to commence six months after the time of my decease, for each child then twelve years of age, and for the others six months from the time when each child attains the age of twelve years, and is to be continued until each child respectively shall reach the age of twenty-one, or before that age shall die, and is to be made by my trustees hereinafter named in semi-annual payments out of the dividends, interests and income of the estate and property hereinafter devised and bequeathed to them; and upon the receipt of the said Caroline, whether sole or covert. And in case of the death of my said niece during the minority of any of her children, I order and direct the same amount of $500 per annum to be paid to the surviving parent or guardian of each child so in his or her minority, for its education and clothing from its age of twelve years until such child shall attain the age of twenty-one years; if the father of the said children survives, his receipt to be sufficient; if not, then payment to be made to a guardian. And to each and every of the said children of my said niece Caroline, as they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, I give and bequeath the sum of $1,000 per annum, if the income of my estate shall be sufficient for that purpose after paying all other charges, expenses and annuities herein provided for, said sum of $1,000 per annum to be paid in semi-annual payments by my trustees hereinafter named, out of the income, interests and dividends of my estates and property hereinafter devised to them, the first payment to be made to each child six months after he or she shall reach the age of twenty-one years, and to be continued until the period as hereinafter appointed for the division of my estate, unless sooner determined by the death of such child.

"I give and bequeath to Augustus James Pleasonton, the husband of my niece Caroline, an annuity of $2,000 per annum, to be paid to him during the term of his natural life, by my trustees hereinafter named, out of the rents, dividends and income of the estates and property hereinafter devised and bequeathed to them, in half yearly payments of $1,000 each; the first payment to be made in six calendar months from the date of my decease; and if he, the said Augustus James Pleasonton, shall survive his wife, my said niece, I do order and direct that his said annuity shall from the time of her death be increased to and stand at the sum of $5,000 per annum. In that event the arrearages of his annuity of $2,000 will be paid up to the day of her decease, and from that day forward, all future payments shall be at the rate of $5,000, and the proportion of my said niece's annuity, which, at the time of her death, may have accrued since the last payment to her, shall go to her representatives."

He then devised and bequeathed to the trustees, all of his estate not before devised: "In trust, after paying all my just debts, funeral expenses, and the pecuniary legacies herein bequeathed, to collect the rents, issues and profits of my real estate, and the interest, income and dividends of my personal property, and out of the moneys so collected to pay from time to time and until the period of the division of my estate shall arrive, the annuities hereinbefore bequeathed to my sister, Ann Dugan, my niece, Caroline Pleasonton, her husband, Augustus James Pleasonton, and to the children of my said niece. And if at any time it shall so happen that the said rents, issues, profits, incomes, interest and dividends are insufficient to pay the costs, charges, taxes and repairs upon and of my said estate, and the said annuities in full, then it is my will, and I order and direct that an equal deduction shall be made from the several sums payable to the children of my niece Caroline, or to any person for their benefit, to the full extent necessary to make the fund adequate to the rest of the annuities and expenses; and if such reduction and nonpayment shall still leave a deficiency, then a pro rata deduction shall be made among the other annuitants, in proportion to their several annuities, it being my intention that the said annuities shall never be permitted to encroach upon the capital of the estate. But the sums so reduced or withheld may be made up to the respective persons entitled when the funds again shall permit.

"And in trust to invest from time to time all such surplus moneys as may be in their hands in such stocks, public loans, mortgages, ground rents or other securities as to them may appear most safe and judicious, and to collect the interest and dividends thereof and the same to reinvest.

"And upon trust after the death of my sister Ann Dugan, and of my niece, Caroline Pleasonton, and of my niece's husband, Augustus James Pleasonton, and so soon as the youngest surviving child of my said niece Caroline shall attain twenty-one years of age (and not before) to divide the personal property, with all its accumulations, and to make partition of all the real estate in equal parts and shares, share and share alike, to and among the then surviving children of my said niece Caroline, and the children or lawful issue of any child of my said niece, who may then be dead, having left children or lawful issue him or her surviving; such children or lawful issue of a deceased child to take among them the same share (neither more or less) and interest which their parent would have taken if then alive.

"And, if my niece Caroline shall leave no children her surviving, or if her children who do survive her shall all die before their age of twenty-one years, and leaving no children or lawful issue them surviving, then in trust to divide my said estate real and personal in equal shares—share and share alike between my grandniece, Ann Eck, and my grandnephew, Joseph Eck; and if either of them should be dead, leaving lawful issue, such lawful issue to take among them the share of the deceased parent; but if no such lawful issue, then the whole to go to the survivor or the lawful issue of such survivor.

"And I do hereby authorize and empower my said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, and their successors in the trust, to sell and dispose of any of my unimproved lots of ground, upon ground rents so reserved as to be redeemable at the time when my estate is so as aforesaid to be divided. And I also authorize and empower them, the survivors and survivor of them and their successors in the trust, when partition and division of my estate is to be made as aforesaid, to sell and convey in fee simple such parts and so much of my real estate as may be necessary to enable them to effect entire equality of partition and division among the devisees.

"And in cases of sales on ground rent or for equality of partition, I give them full power to convey estates to the purchasers, entirely freed and discharged from all trusts created by this will, and from all liability on the part of the purchasers for the appropriation of the purchase moneys. But I expressly direct that, except in these cases thus provided for, my said trustees shall not sell or dispose of any part of my real estate, but shall reserve the same for partition among the devisees, keeping it at all times in due and proper repair, and paying all taxes, assessments and charges thereon.

"And for the purpose of making partition of the real estate as aforesaid, I do further authorize, empower and direct my said trustees, the survivors or survivor and the successors of them, to convey by deeds in fee simple duly executed to the persons entitled, such portions and parcels of my real estate as may be allotted to them respectively, and this allotment shall be made by my trustees according to their best judgment.

"And I do further order and direct my said trustees, when proceeding to make partition and division of my estate, if there shall be children of my niece, Caroline Pleasonton, to receive it, and any of those children shall be females, so to convey, transfer and settle the parts and portions which may be allotted to such female children that they may take, hold and enjoy the same, free from all liability for any debts or engagements of any husband, subject to their own control, and with power to devise the same, whether single or covert, and for this purpose I direct my trustees to make such conveyances and transfers to trustees, if necessary, to be selected with the consent and approbation of such females, and in such manner as may be advised by counsel learned in the law, and releases and discharges given to my trustees by the trustees for such females shall be as valid and effectual as given by the females themselves, or by them and their husbands if they are covert."

The plaintiff also offered in evidence a decree of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia County, entered January 4, 1879, sur petition of Augustus J. Pleasonton, sole acting trustee under the will of Joseph Dugan, deceased, for an order increasing the allowance to the children of Mrs. Caroline Pleasonton, etc., as follows:

"It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the prayer of the petition be granted as follows, to wit: that the said trustee, after providing for the payment, as the same shall annually accrue of all annuities given under the said testator's will, and of all taxes and water rents and recurring charges upon the several properties belonging to this estate, and after retaining a balance sufficient to provide for recurring repairs of the said properties and taxes thereupon, and a further fund sufficient to meet all contingencies and extraordinary liabilities which may befall the said estate, the surplus of the said contingent fund which may remain unexpended at the end of each fiscal year of the said estate to be invested by the said trustee as part of the fund for accumulation of the said estate as directed by the will, the sum of $10,000 out of the annual income accruing from the said estate shall be divided into five equal parts and shares; and that one of the said parts or shares be paid over by the said trustee in half yearly payments * * * to Alfred Pleasonton, one of the children of Mrs. Caroline Pleasonton, deceased, the same to be applied to the personal support and maintenance of the said Alfred Pleasonton, or in his discretion to the support and education of any children he may have, so as the same shall not be in any manner assignable or anticipated, nor liable to the debts, contracts or liabilities of the said Alfred Pleasonton; or that the said trustee may, if thought by him needful, apply the said part of the said income in like manner for the benefit of the said Alfred Pleasonton and any children he may have."

"Provided, that if said trustee shall for cause satisfactory to himself, in the exercise of a faithful discretion, subject to the revision of the court, withhold any part of said allowances to prevent waste and improvidence, the part so withheld shall inure to the benefit of the party or parties from whom withheld, or his or her legal representatives, to be paid over or applied as aforesaid, whenever the same may be safely done, or if not so paid to go to his or her executors, or administrators."

The plaintiff also offered a decree of the same court, entered May 22, 1886, as follows:

"It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that said trustee pay out of the income of said estate, subject to the restrictions and directions of the decree for allowance of January 4, 1879, the sum of $4,000 per annum, half yearly, instead of the sum of $2,000 per annum heretofore ordered, unto each of said petitioners and to the said Francis S. Pleasonton and Mrs. Anna Josephine Guest, respectively; provided, that the said children of Augustus Pleasonton, deceased, shall receive together said sum of $4,000, one half thereof to be paid to the said Stella Maud Pleasonton, and the other half to be paid to the guardian of the said Julia Aline Pleasonton until she reaches her majority, when her proportion shall be paid to her individually."

The court, FELL, J., directed the jury to find for the garnishee.

Verdict and judgment accordingly.

The assignment of error specified the action of the court in directing the jury to find a verdict for the garnishee.

Mr. N. Dubois Miller, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. F. C. Brewster, for defendant in error.

Per Curiam:

The court correctly charged the jury to find a verdict in favor of the defendant, garnishee. The fund in the hands of the garnishee is not subject to the attachment of the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

Walter BOSWELL. Plff. in Err.,
v.
William B. COLLINS.

1. Mere technical error in the charge of the court below is not, where substantial justice has been done, ground for reversal.

2. In an action for damages for the breach of a contract to furnish cold storage for eggs, it is error to instruct the jury that by removing the eggs to the warehouse the owner of them impliedly warranted them to be sound, and that it was his duty to examine every barrel and to put the warehouseman on his guard as to their condition; but if, in view of other portions of the charge and the whole evidence, no injustice has been done the plaintiff, such an instruction is not ground for reversal.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 21, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 3 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial were as follows:

The plaintiff, Boswell, was a produce commission merchant. In May, 1882, he bought, for the most part in the West, and carefully packed in oats, 140 barrels of eggs for the purpose of keeping them by means of ice storage until the winter months, when they could be sold at an advance. He first stored them in an ice house, built by H. G. Harris, who had loaned him some of the money to purchase the eggs. Finding that the ice in this ice house melted very rapidly and constantly required to be renewed the plaintiff applied to the defendant, who kept a warehouse in which he furnished what is known as cold storage. Plaintiff informed defendant that he wanted to keep the eggs during the summer, and might want to keep them until December, and that he wanted an even temperature.

The defendant said that he frequently received eggs on storage and that they had kept in a satisfactory manner, and that he would receive the eggs on cold storage at 20 cents per barrel per month, and that the warehouse would be kept at a temperature of about 52 degrees until October 1. Plaintiff accordingly had 132 barrels of the eggs carefully moved in the early morning in July, to defendant's warehouse, distant about forty squares, and delivered them to defendant, receiving the following receipt:

No. 1106 Philadelphia, July 24, 1882.

Received of Walter Boswell, in warehouse 238 and 240 North Front Street, 132 barrels eggs.
W. B. Collins.

The remaining eight barrels were taken by plaintiff to his own store and there unpacked and examined. They were found to be in good condition.

In the latter part of September defendant sent word to the plaintiff that the head of one of the barrels had fallen out. Plaintiff went to the warehouse and repacked the eggs in that barrel. The eggs in that barrel were found to be some in excellent condition, and some unsound. In November plaintiff went to the warehouse to remove some eggs and found that the temperature was high and the eggs were ruined. Upon making inquiry he was informed that the ice had been taken off in the middle of October and that therefore for about a month the eggs had not been kept cold. Even the oats in which they were packed could not be used.

The plaintiff's evidence further showed that eggs could be kept for the length of time these were stored if kept cold, and that the average loss on such eggs was usually from five to ten dozen in a barrel containing from seventy-five to eighty dozen. He also showed that the cost of these eggs when put in was eighteen to nineteen cents per dozen and that the market value of ice house eggs in November, 1882, was twenty-eight to thirty cents per dozen. He also showed, both by his own evidence and the evidence of the only man in his employ in October, 1882, that no notice had been received of any intention on the part of defendant to take off the ice.

The defendant's evidence contradicted plaintiff's on two points, viz.: 1, defendant testified that at the time he received the eggs he had told the plaintiff that his ice storage ran from the first of May until the first of October; and 2, defendant's clerk testified that in September, in obedience to instructions from his employer, he gave to a young man whom he found coming out of plaintiff's cellar a verbal notice that the ice storage would expire October 1.

The defendant also introduced expert testimony to show that in any event, even if the ice had been kept up, the eggs would have spoiled by reason of the length of time they were stored after a change from one ice house to another and that when the eggs were removed they were not fit for keeping longer, though fit for sale at once.

The court charged as follows:

"This is an action to recover damages for breach of contract. The contract was one for storage. It was not a contract to keep ice in the store house at all. It was a contract to keep the temperature at fifty-two degrees—to give what is known as cold storage. The terms of the contract are for the jury. The length of time it was to continue becomes very important. The plaintiff avers that it was a contract to keep the goods on cold storage until December. The defendant avers that it was a contract to keep them on cold storage until October 1. This is entirely for the jury. Whatever the time may have been practically, it was the business of defendant to keep a temperature of from fifty-two degrees to fifty-four degrees. He was not bound by any obligation to have anything to do or say about the goods after the time for which he contracted.

"[In a case of this kind the plaintiff must show that the eggs were in a fit and sound condition and were in such condition as to be kept at a temperature of fifty-two degrees. He must also establish that during the time they were stored they were injured by the act of defendant and by his act alone, because if they were injured by any other fact, such as inherent decay, etc., the defendant is not responsible.]

"The plaintiff should show by evidence that the eggs were in good condition. The plaintiff has shown that three fourths of the eggs came from the West. He has said that he assorted, picked and packed them; that they were stored until he took them out in July. [At this point it is the duty of the plaintiff to show you that Mr. Harris' ice house was a fit and proper place to store eggs and one that would keep them in as sound condition as when they were taken there. I do not recollect any evidence of that kind.]

"The evidence is that they were taken away from Harris' ice house, because at the time it was not a fit place.

"The plaintiff says that at the time the eggs were moved he repacked and examined some of the eggs and they were sound. He says he examined eight barrels, or rather that he sold eight barrels, and that he and the purchaser found them sound. Again; he says that he afterwards examined one barrel that had broken open in defendant's warehouse—critically examined it—and found the eggs sound. As to the eight barrels, you will recollect that the witness he called said the eggs were good enough to be sold, but that he could not say that they were fit to be stored. Impliedly, he said that these goods were not in a condition to be stored. Practically, he said that they were only fit to be sold.

"[The plaintiff said: 'I cannot say, when I stored the eggs with Collins, whether they were sound or not.' If he cannot say, how can he ask you to say on your oaths? Because, to find a verdict, you must say that at the time they were stored they were in a fit condition.]

"[As to whether Harris' ice house was a proper place, you must say; and you must take into consideration the fact that the eggs were removed for want of ice.] After you have examined plaintiff's testimony, unless you are satisfied that the eggs were sound when stored, it is not necessary to inquire into the defense; you must find for defendant.

"[When the plaintiff undertook to remove the goods from one storehouse to another, he impliedly warranted the eggs to be sound, and that they were to be stored in the usual course of business; and it was his duty to examine them. It was not sufficient to examine two or three barrels. He must open each barrel. It is an easy matter for a man who intends to store goods, which he impliedly warrants in good condition, to examine them. When a man makes a contract with another, it is his duty to put that other on his guard, and to put him in possession of all the facts with reference to the subject matter necessary to understand the subject matter. If the jury find that the previous storage of the eggs was a material fact, it was the duty of the plaintiff to notify defendant that the eggs had previously been stored, because it may well be that defendant would not have undertaken the storage if he had known that fact.] (Fifth assignment of error.)

"I have already alluded to the fact that the witness Liebig says that he will not swear that the eggs were in fit condition to store, and if you believe that witness, the evidence as to the soundness of the eggs fails. As to Harris' ice house, you have the evidence of a neighbor that while the eggs were stored there was no ice there. Again, you have the evidence that the eggs were removed in July, and carried forty-five squares. As to the effect of this, you must depend upon the evidence of persons who have had experience. You have first the testimony of Dr. Formad, and he tells you any egg shaken begins to be diseased, and the more you shake the egg, the more likely it is to spoil and become damaged. The testimony substantially was that the shaking of eggs breeds disease, and you may soon expect decay afterwards.

"One or two of the experts said that a temperature of fifty-two or fifty-four degrees is not cold enough to keep eggs, and that a removal of the eggs necessarily produces sweating. [If the testimony of defendant satisfies you that these goods were subject to any conditions that would produce decay within the time agreed upon the plaintiff cannot recover.]

"The defense is that at the expiration of the time during which defendant claims he was to keep the eggs, he gave notice that he would not replenish the ice. It is alleged by the plaintiff that he did not get the notice. If the defense rests on the notice, it is the business of defendant to make it clear. The evidence is that the notice was given at the place of business of the plaintiff. Defendant went there and found no one there, and gave to a workman coming out of the vault; and the evidence is that next day some one came to do just what the notice called upon him to do.

"The defendant produced a witness, not interested except that he is in the employ of defendant, and he says: 'I saw that barrel repacked; and the eggs were not examined, and the eggs broken gave evidence of being unsound.' If you believe that witness, the evidence on which plaintiff relies, that the eggs in the barrel were sound, fails. In considering the evidence, you will most readily give credence to the man who is frank and honest, but not to the man, who, in making a contract, reserves important information.

"[Plaintiff must establish that the goods were sound and fit to be kept, and that a temperature of fifty-two degrees was such a temperature as would keep sound goods in a sound condition, and that the damage arose solely from the act of defendant; and if the damage could have arisen in any other way, either from the fact that the eggs came from the West or were hauled from one store house to another, plaintiff cannot recover.]"

The plaintiff submitted the following points:

1. "If the defendant received goods on cold storage and subsequently allowed the ice in his warehouse to become exhausted, whereby the plaintiff's goods were injured, defendant is liable for the loss."

Ans. "The plaintiff's first point is affirmed, subject to the comments I have already made."

2. "Even if plaintiff failed to remove the eggs at the expiration of the time for which they were stored or after notice to remove, it was still the duty of defendant to keep them in the usual and ordinary method of keeping such goods until they could be sold; and if, instead of this, he kept them in a temperature at which they were certain to be destroyed, he is liable for their loss."

Ans. "Refused."

3. "If the natural and probable result of defendant's omission to renew the ice in the store house was an injury to plaintiff's goods, and such an injury did result, the burden is on defendant to show that the injury was not caused by the omission to renew the ice, but by other causes."

Ans. "The plaintiff's third point is affirmed if the jury finds that the eggs were sound when stored, and not injured by other means."

Verdict and judgment were for the defendant. The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets, and the answers to the plaintiff's points.

Mr. Frank P. Prichard, for plaintiff in error:

It is manifestly impossible for the owner to prove that the loss was occasioned solely by the warehouseman's negligence, or that no other cause could have caused the loss. To carry this ruling out to its logical conclusion, no owner of goods could recover from a warehouseman who destroyed them, unless he showed that it was impossible for the goods to have been destroyed by an accidental fire or flood, or that there were no conditions to which the goods were subjected, such as defective packing, etc., which might have contributed to the injury.

It is not sufficient for the defendant to show that other causes could have caused the loss, or even that other causes not within the plaintiff's control had actually contributed, unless he also shows the extent of the loss actually caused by such contribution at the time he committed the act complained of. Beatty v. Gilmore, 16 Pa. 463-468.

He who avers a fact in excuse of his own misfeasance must prove it.

To say that the very fact which increases the danger shall protect him who was the author of it, by rendering the necessary proof difficult, or cutting it off altogether, is too unreasonable to attract the deliberate sanction of tribunals created to watch over the interests of the community.

In Powers v. Mitchell, 3 Hill, 545, goods in a warehouse were injured through the warehouseman's negligence and were subsequently destroyed in the warehouse by a flood for which the warehouseman was not responsible. It was held that he was liable for the injury caused by his negligence, notwithstanding that the goods would in any event have been totally destroyed by the flood.

It was error to instruct the jury in effect that if the owner of goods makes a contract with a warehouseman for storage he warrants the soundness of the goods and is under an obligation to state every material fact which may affect the question of damages in case the warehouseman is negligent.

In considering the charge it must be remembered that the defendant's contract was not to keep the eggs sound, but to keep them on "cold storage," and the breach alleged is not the failure to preserve, but the failure to furnish cold storage, whereby they were lost. So long as defendant kept his contract, the plaintiff took the risks of injury from decay or like causes. As the goods were, therefore, to be at plaintiff's risk, so far as ordinary decay was concerned, he was not bound to examine them at all. In any event, he would not have been obliged to increase the risk of decay by opening every barrel. He was under no duty to defendant to examine the goods, nor did he warrant their soundness. Nor was the fact of the previous storage of the eggs a material fact, so long as defendant kept his contract.

Mr. George S. Graham, for defendant in error:

It is certainly true that when plaintiff brought his eggs to plaintiff's warehouse to be stored, he impliedly warranted them to be sound. This was an essential element of the contract, and especially so when the eggs were concealed from view, and not subject to inspection by defendant.

The damage to be recovered must always be the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of.

Sedg. Dam. 3d ed. 65.

It is an ancient and universal rule, resting upon obvious reason and justice, that a wrong doer shall be held responsible for the proximate, and not the remote, consequence of his actions.

2 Pars. Cont. 455; Jones v. Gilmore, 91 Pa. 313.

Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may be fairly considered as arising naturally from such breach, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it.

Jones v. Gilmore, 91 Pa. 313.

The damage alleged is the decay of the eggs. The plaintiff must connect the condition of the eggs with the act of the defendant, and show satisfactorily on his part that the condition is the result of defendant's act.

To do this it became absolutely necessary to establish that these eggs were good and fresh, and that, while in his possession he kept them in such a way as to properly preserve them; hence, the inquiry into the conditions in which the eggs were kept in plaintiff's own ice house became material; and the concealment of the true history of the eggs was an element of bad faith.

Per Curiam:

There is technical error in that portion of the charge covered by the fifth assignment of error, but in view of other portions of the charge and the whole evidence, no injustice was done to the plaintiff. No error is found sufficient to demand a reversal of the judgment; substantial justice was done by the verdict and judgment thereon.

Judgment affirmed.

Henry S. RHEIN, Exr. of Henry E. Rhein, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

Rebecca S. MILLER, Exrx. of Margaret Rhein, Deceased.

A bequest: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Margaret, all my finished cabinet ware, on hand at the time of my decease, all my certificates of loan of the City of Reading, all my bonds and notes and all other evidence of indebtedness to me, that I have or may have at the time of my decease; and I also give and bequeath to my said wife, Margaret, all my household furniture and goods, of whatever kind or nature soever, of which I may die possessed of, for her use for and during her natural life, and after her death the same to go to my son," etc.,—is an absolute gift of the cabinet ware, certificates, bonds, notes and other evidence of indebtedness, to the wife.

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 371, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Berks County, dismissing exceptions to an adjudication and awarding distribution. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the audit of the second account of Henry S. Rhein, executor of Henry E. Rhein, deceased, before SCHWARTZ, J., are thus stated in the adjudication:

"The decedent died testate in 1873, leaving to survive him as heirs at law: a widow, Margaret Rhein, and three children, namely: Henry S. Rhein, Rebecca S. Miller, who is also executrix of the said widow, now deceased, and Amelia S. Duth.

"Testator in his will first explains that he is of sufficient mental capacity to make a will, and that he had therefore provided for his children by transferring to each of them certain of his properties in lieu of their and each of their respective share or shares of their inheritance. After which he proceeds in language as follows:

"'Therefore I make this my last will and testament in manner following, to wit: and first, I direct that my body be decently buried and that my funeral be conducted in a manner corresponding with my estate and my situation in life; and I direct that all my just debts and funeral expenses be fully paid and satisfied as soon as conveniently may be after my decease. Item —I give and bequeath to my wife, Margaret, all my finished cabinet ware, on hand at the time of my decease; all my certificates of loan of the City of Reading, all bonds and notes and all other evidences of indebtedness to me that I have or may have at the time of my decease; and I also give and bequeath to my said wife, Margaret, all my household furniture and goods of whatever kind or nature soever, of which I may die possessed of, for her use for and during her natural life, and after her death the same to go to my son, Henry S. Rhein, if he be then living, and if he is not living the same shall go to the heirs of my said wife.'

"He also gave and devised to his said widow a lot of ground in the City of Reading. The residue of his estate he gave to his son Henry and appointed him executor of his said will and testament.

"The fund for distribution before us arose out of the bequests to his widow under the clause of finished cabinet ware, city certificates, bonds and other evidences of indebtedness.

"The principal contention is whether she had an absolute or only a life estate in said legacies.

"The chief object of the testator appears to have been to provide for the comfortable support of his widow.

"Henry S. Rhein contended that the widow had only a life estate in the bequests. In support of this proposition he further contended that the semicolon used in decedent's will between the words 'finished cabinet ware,' etc., and the words 'household furniture and goods,' constituted no part of decedent's will, and that in the construction of wills all punctuation should and must be eliminated. This proposition is not sustained by law. It is, however, true that punctuation must give way, wherever it interferes with a proper and reasonable construction of a will; but it is also equally true that when it aids, as in this case, to discover the intention of a testator, it takes hold for such purpose. Wigram, Wills, p. 29.

"Henry S. Rhein also offered considerable testimony to establish the intent of testator by and through surrounding family circumstances. He proved that he was a bachelor at the execution of the will and at his father's death. He also showed that for a number of years he managed and conducted his father's business and that the estate was mainly accumulated through his industry and management. No express contract is shown to have existed between the father and the son. The son resided with the father and conducted his affairs. Neither the will nor the evidence to establish the circumstances surrounding the family disclosed anything from which to find that the testator intended to give his widow a life estate.

"The terms of the will disclose that his sole object was to provide for the comfortable support of his widow. It is written in clear and proper English. The language used in bequeathing the cabinet ware, bonds, etc., is precise and admits of but one interpretation, namely: an absolute gift to her; nor is there anything in the testimony offered from which a contrary intent can be gathered.

"A testator's intention must principally be ascertained from the four corners of his will. It will not do for courts to permit a testator's neighbors and acquaintances through bias, interest or sympathy to make it for him after his death, or to assist the court to find his intentions. Rebecca S. Miller, as executrix of her mother, filed exceptions to the filing of the account, to the allowance of credit for compensation, counsel fees, bond assigned to her and mortgage assigned to her sister, Amelia S. Duth.

"The court, in a former proceeding, on the petition of said executrix, awarded her a citation upon the accountant to show cause why he should not pay over to her $8,895.61, it being the balance admitted to be in his hands by his account as filed on March 19, 1874, with all interest in his hands; or, in case the said balance consisted of the original evidences of indebtedness as composed by the inventory on said estate, or of other securities in their place, to assign and transfer the same to the petitioner, and also to show cause why he should not file a detailed statement of said balance, showing where it is deposited if in cash, or the character, date and amount of the several securities if the same be invested, together with the names of the persons to whom the same were loaned. Upon the hearing of the above citation the court discovered that it would be almost impossible to get at a correct result so far as the amounts in accountant's hands were concerned. We also did not feel at liberty to go into the inquiry necessary to solve the questions raised by the citation. It, therefore, ordered the filing of an account.

"The former account had been filed for more than ten years at the time of granting said citation. During the mother's lifetime all parties treated it as a life estate. The executor retained the corpus of the estate, with the consent and wishes of his mother. He paid her the interest regularly, as often as he received the same. He was for many years the main stay of the family. It was his energy, industry and business capacity that created the principal part of the estate in controversy.

"The dispute between him and his sisters sprang from his marriage. The sisters, after the dispute between them, submitted the will to counsel for interpretation, and, having learned its import, induced their mother to make her will in their interest. The executrix, after her mother's death, caused said citation to issue, and indirectly endeavored to inquire into matters and things which could not be inquired into under the ordinary practice of law.

"Accountant in his second account took credit for $2,000 for services rendered as accountant and $300 for professional services, both of which are objected to. The accountant in his first account did not ask for credit for compensation or counsel fees, to both of which he was entitled. He should, therefore, be allowed his reasonable commission for settling of the estate, as also reasonable compensation for the service he rendered his mother in the management of her said estate. His proper and ordinary compensation in the settlement of his father's estate is $475, and his services as rendered to his mother in the collection of her interest and the management of her estate is worth $697. * * *

"Upon proceeding to the examination of the account, the same was found to be correct, except as modified by the foregoing.

"Balance due the estate, as per account filed, $4,763.61.

To which add surcharge on account of compensation $828.00.

Balance in accountant's hands $5,591.61.

For which deduct register's cost for citation and recording report $6.35.

For distribution to estate of Margaret Rhein, deceased, $5,585.26.

"Decree nisi accordingly."

To this adjudication exceptions were filed by the accountant which specified the action of the court in not dismissing the citation issued upon the petition of Rebecca S. Miller; in ordering and decreeing that the accountant should make and file an account; in deciding that under the will the testator bequeathed to his widow an estate absolute in all his finished cabinet ware on hand at the time of his decease, all his certificates of loan of the City of Reading, all bonds and notes and all other evidences of indebtedness to the testator; in not deciding that by said will said widow was entitled only to the interest during her lifetime of the personal estate above mentioned; in not deciding that by said will testator bequeathed to the accountant all his personal estate absolutely, to take effect after the death of his widow; in not making an order and decree that said Henry S. Rhein was entitled to the balance in his account filed, of $4,763.61, absolutely, etc., and in not allowing the whole amount of the compensation claimed by the accountant as executor.

The court subsequently filed the following opinion:

"The question raised by the exceptions of

Henry S. Rhein is the construction of the will, whether the clause 'for her use for and during her natural life, and after her death the same to go to my son, Henry S. Rhein, if he be living; and if he is not living the same shall go to the heirs of my said wife, share and share alike,' relate to and qualify all the bequests made in this item preceding this limitation, viz.: 'I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Margaret, all my finished cabinet ware on hand at the time of my decease, all my certificates of loan of the City of Reading, all bonds and notes and all other evidences of indebtedness to me that I have or may have at the time of my decease; and I also give and bequeath to my said wife, Margaret, all my household furniture and goods of whatever kind or nature soever of which I may die possessed of;' or whether it simply relates to and limits the bequest of the household furniture, made in and by the following clause, viz: 'and I also give and bequeath to my said wife Margaret all my household furniture and goods of whatever kind and nature soever, of which I may die possessed of.'

"These two sentences are separated by a semicolon. Each sentence is complete and perfect by itself. Separately read they make sense, the former constituting an absolute bequest and the latter a life estate. Neither is dependent upon the other, to render either intelligible or to get at the meaning and intention of the testator. In both the pronoun representing the testator, the verbs expressing his act and will, and the name of the legatee, are contained. And these two sentences are complete, perfect, intelligible and expressive of the meaning and the intention of the testator, whether they are separated by a semicolon, period or comma, or whether punctuation be entirely absent or now eliminated.

"Were the pronoun 'I' and the verbs 'give and bequeath' wanting, so that the second sentence read, 'and also to my said wife Margaret all my household,' etc., or were also the name of the legatee not expressed and the sentence read 'and also all my household furniture,' etc., then the second sentence would become a clause and a part of the first sentence and be meaningless without reference to it, and the whole bequest possibly limited to a life estate.

" 'It is only where the first sentence is complete and the other imperfect, or vice versa, so as not to be intelligible without referring to the first or the one that is complete in order to supply the defect, that the word "also" can ever have the meaning of the words "in like manner" given to it or in causing the one clause to govern and direct the other.' " Evans v. Knorr, 4 Rawle, 66.

"In such case the word also is used as a mere copulative. In the will drawn it is evidently used to point out a new bequest. It imports no more than the word 'item,' which Judge Agnew says is 'an usual word in a will to introduce new distinct matter.' Horwitz v. Norris, 60 Pa. 282.

"Notwithstanding the able argument for the exceptant in his behalf, and the sympathy for him heretofore expressed the rules relative to the construction of wills constrain me to leave the adjudication undisturbed.

"The exceptions in this behalf are, therefore, dismissed.

"All other exceptions, after due consideration, are also dismissed and the decree heretofore made allowed to remain."

This action by the court was assigned as error.

Messrs. B. T. Shearer, S. L. Young and F. R. Schell, for appellant:

Was the bequest of finished cabinet ware, loans, bonds, etc., to Margaret Rhein, the widow, absolute or for life only? The intention of the testator must govern. The whole will must be taken together, and effect given to every part.

The circumstances of the testator, his family and the amount and character of his property shall be taken into consideration.

Dwar. Stat. 178; 1 Redf. Wills, 503, Prop. V. Postlethwaite's App. 68 Pa. 477.

Every interpretation that leads to an absurdity ought to be rejected.

Dwar. Stat. 128.

The testator begins his will by declaring that he has conveyed real estate to each of his children, naming them. After this, in the disposing part of the will, the daughters are not mentioned, showing that they were not in his mind when he came to determine who should have the property he then owned. The widow and his son Henry only were mentioned. It is clear, therefore, that he intended that his widow and his son should have all his estate. This is the general intent, and no particular part of the will taken alone must be construed, as the appellee claims, so as to defeat it.

The words "for and during her natural life" apply to the whole bequest preceding those words.

Where a testator divides his will into sections, numerically arranged, and in some instances places the words of limitation at the end of each section, it seems they will be considered as applicable to the several devises contained in that section and not be confined to those in immediate juxtaposition.

2 Jarm. Wills, 74, 75, ed. of 1880.

"And" is a connective conjunction. It signifies that a sentence is to be added to what precedes. The fact that the will was written by a lawyer is important.

Sheet's Est. 52 Pa. 257; Ulrich's App. 86 Pa. 386; Zerbe v. Zerbe, 84 Pa. 147.

Written or printed words represent sounds, and thereby convey ideas; punctuation marks do not.

Punctuation is a modern contrivance introduced during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Acts of Congress and of State Legislatures are not punctuated.

Punctuation marks are intended to represent or indicate the pauses in the sentences uttered by the speaker.

When the words used are plain and the meaning clear, punctuation is of no assistance and can give no aid in construction. Only in cases where there is an ambiguity, punctuation may aid.

In the interpretation of a will, punctuation may perhaps be resorted to when no other means can be found, of solving an ambiguity; but not in cases where no real ambiguity exists except what punctuation itself creates. A single dot over a comma, so easily inserted by mistake or design and so difficult, if not impossible in most instances of proof or disproof, can never be allowed thus to overturn the natural meaning of the written words, whether taken by themselves or in connection with the whole instrument.

Arcularius v. Sweet, 25 Barb. 403.

The will in our case was dictated by the testator to the lawyer who wrote it. No direction was given as to punctuation. When finished it was read to him. He heard the words only, and he heard these, "for her use for and during her natural life." But the punctuation he did not hear, knew nothing of it, and it forms no part of the expression of his intention.

If that paragraph of the will be read regardless of punctuation, the meaning of the words is plain, clear, free from all ambiguity, and punctuation is not needed to ascertain the intention of the testator. It was so understood by him, and he intended to give an estate for life only to the widow.

The principle of estoppel applies. The widow construed the will so that after her death Henry should have the whole estate. He had a right to act upon this, to arrange his business and domestic matters accordingly, which no doubt he did, for the orphans' court says: "The dispute between him and his sisters sprang from his marriage." Had he remained single no dispute would have occurred, for then his sisters would have expected to inherit, not only what Henry received from his father but also what he since earned and accumulated himself. The daughters are bound by the acts of the mother. If she acted so as to be estopped from claiming the principal, they cannot claim it.

Horwitz v. Norris, 60 Pa. 282, has no application to our case. In that case the will was divided into paragraphs, each separate and complete in itself. Each paragraph commences with the word "item." The court says "Item is the usual word in a will to introduce new matter."

All contained in one item is therefore to be taken together; and none of it considered as new matter. In our case the whole bequest is in one item and the household furniture is not introduced as new matter under a separate item.

Messrs. H. D. Green and A. G. Green, for appellee:

The will gives the widow an absolute estate.

This view is consistent with the several rules of construction recognized as applicable to the interpretation of wills. It allows the intention of the testator to govern and to be gathered from the four corners of the will.

Provenchere's App. 67 Pa. 463.

It sustains the general intent, which is to provide for the wife.

Schott's Estate, 78 Pa. 40; Hitchcock v. Hitchcock, 85 Pa. 393; Doebler's App. 64 Pa. 9.

It takes into account the circumstances surrounding the testator at the time of making the will.

Postlethwaite's App. 68 Pa. 477.

It leads to no absurdity, and moreover works no injustice or inequality to Henry S. Rhein, the appellant. And lastly, the construction for which we contend is assisted by the punctuation, without the punctuation producing any ambiguity.

Per Curiam:

We think the learned judge gave a correct construction to the will of Henry E. Rhein. It follows that there was no error in decreeing the appellee the sum found to be in the hands of the appellant as executor. He has no just cause to complain of any part of the decree.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphan's Court of Berks County, dismissing exceptions and awarding distribution. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in Rhein v. Miller, ante, 490.

The exceptions filed by Rebecca S. Miller to the adjudication were as follows:

1. The law does not warrant the executor in filing a second account in the register's office, of the same assets as are contained in his former account. Such a proceeding subjects an estate to double costs and charges, delays its settlements and answers no legitimate or proper purpose.

The exceptant, therefore, objects to the second account as filed on account of its irregularity, and asks the court to rescind its former order, directing the filing of such second account and set aside the same.

2. The court erred in allowing the executor $475 as commissions, he having by his original account inferentially disclaimed compensation for the settlement of the estate, which involved no particular labor or trouble, and consisted, so far as appears, of filing an inventory and account on the same day, and of the payments in said account.

3. The court erred in allowing the executor $697 for services rendered as trustee or agent for the widow of the decedent, in paying the interest due her annually.

4. The court erred in allowing the executor $300 for money paid to counsel, not for services rendered for the estate, but in defending the executor's claim to the reversion, he alleging that the estate given to the widow by the will was his, subject to the interest to the widow for life.

5. The court erred in not surcharging the executor with interest on the amount on his hands from October 1, 1883, beyond which time no interest was paid, although the fund has been and is now on interest, either in loans or in real estate, bought by him in his own name.

The court dismissed the exceptions, and confirmed the adjudication.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in dismissing the exceptions, and in finding, in the opinion of the court adjudicating upon the second account, the following facts:

1. That the executor retained the fund, with the consent and wishes of his mother.

2. That he paid the interest to her regularly —as often as he received the same.

3. That he was for many years the mainstay of the family.

4. That it was his energy, his industry and business capacity which created the principal part of the estate in controversy.

5. That the dispute between him and his sisters sprang from his marriage.

6. That the sisters, after the dispute between them, submitted the will to counsel for inspection, and having learned its import, induced their mother to make a will in their interest.

7. That the executrix, after her mother's death, caused said citation to issue, and indirectly endeavored to inquire into matters and things which could not be inquired into under the ordinary practice of law.

Per Curiam:

Although, in an opinion just filed on an appeal by the present appellee from this same decree, we have held that he put a wrong construction on the will of his father, yet he appears to have acted in good faith, and, with the assent of the widow and all the heirs, for some ten years performing useful and valuable services. Such being the undoubted facts, we think it would now be inequitable and unjust to deprive him of the reasonable compensation awarded by the orphans' court.

The specifications of error are not sustained.

Error to the Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendants in an action of ejectment. Reversed.

The opinion states the facts.

Messrs. Sharp & Alleman, and J. S. Freeman, for plaintiff in error:

In order to convert a deed absolute on its face into a mortgage, by parol evidence, such evidence must be clear, explicit and unequivocal; and the parol defeasance must be shown to be contemporaneous with the deed. A deed absolute on its face may be shown to be in reality a mortgage, not only by direct evidence but also by facts and circumstances from which such a result may be inferred. The facts and circumstances must be clearly inconsistent with the deed being an absolute conveyance.

Burger v. Dankel, 100 Pa. 113; Plumer v. Guthrie, 76 Pa. 441.

In this case there is not only direct evidence of a contemporaneous parol agreement that this deed was to be simply security for a loan, but also a series of corroborating circumstances which can only be explained upon this theory.

The proof is clear, explicit and unequivocal.

If land be conveyed in consideration of a preexisting debt due from the grantor to the grantee, and it is the understanding of the parties that the debt shall survive, the deed is but a mortgage; and this understanding may be proved by parol. The retention of possession by the grantor is a circumstance of great weight in determining whether a conveyance absolute in form was intended to pass the estate, or to be only a security for the debt.

A chancellor will not decree a deed absolute on its face to be a mortgage on proof of the mere verbal declaration of the parties; but facts and circumstances must be shown inconsistent with the idea of an absolute purchase.

The existence of such facts may be shown by the admission of the grantor; but it is the facts, not the admissions, which raise the equity.

Mr. Edwin S. Dixon, for defendants in error:

The law in this State is too well settled for discussion, that where the grantee has power to sell the transaction cannot be a mortgage.

Lance's App. 8 Cent. Rep. 622, 112 Pa. 468.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 7th of April, 1870, the plaintiff, George Pearson, owned and occupied a lot of ground, situated at the northwest corner of Vine and Sixtieth Streets, in the City of Philadelphia. On this lot Pearson had previously erected two houses, in one of which he resided with his family; and at the time above mentioned he had commenced the erection, on the same lot, of several other houses.

At the date stated he, the said Pearson, executed and delivered to Joseph F. Heathcote, whose executors are the principal defendants in this case, a deed in fee for the premises above described, which, on the trial of this case in the court below, was interposed as a complete defense to the plaintiff's action. To rebut this defense the plaintiff offered evidence to prove that this deed, although absolute on its face, was in fact but a security for money advanced by Heathcote to Pearson, and that he had been reimbursed by rents received from the property; but the court below, being of the opinion that in this particular the plaintiff had failed to establish what he proposed, directed a verdict for the defendant.

We are not satisfied with the rectitude of the conclusion thus adopted by the learned judge who tried this case. While we admit all that has been said in Plumer v. Guthrie, 76 Pa. 441; Berger v. Dankel, 100 Pa. 113, and other similar cases, concerning the character of the evidence that must be adduced in order to establish a parol defeasance, yet we are not to ignore the well established doctrine, supported not only by the cases cited, but many others, that although a deed may on its face appear to be indefeasible, an oral defeasance may, by proper proof, be established. That is to say: the conveyance may be shown to be a mere security for money advanced, or for the performance of some definite obligation.

We do not, indeed, understand the doctrine here stated to be denied; on the other hand, the rule being admitted, it is denied that the evidence produced by the plaintiff is sufficient to bring his case within the rule. We are, however, of a different opinion. A very careful examination of the proofs and offers convince us that the deed of the 7th of April, 1870, was executed by Pearson to Heathcote for the purpose of security only. On this point two witnesses are especially clear; they are Christian Kneass, the scrivener under whose supervision the deed was prepared, and Annie E. Walls, a niece of the plaintiff. The first of these speaks positively of the deed as intended by the parties as security for money advanced by Heathcote to Pearson. He says, when speaking of what occurred at the time of the preparation of the conveyance:

"From what I can recollect of the interview, Mr. Heathcote said he wanted a deed drawn for the property at Sixtieth and Oregon (Vine) Streets. He stated that Mr. Pearson was a drinking man, and he did this because he wanted to protect Mr. Pearson. No money passed between them in my office at the time the deed was executed. Mr. Heathcote had advanced Mr. Pearson some money. He, Mr. Pearson, was indebted to Mr. Heathcote. This deed was made for the purpose of of protecting Mr. Pearson. It was also made because Mr. Heathcote had advanced Mr. Pearson some money. The principal reason was to secure himself, because Mr. Pearson's habits were bad."

It will be observed from this testimony that the parties did not intend a purchase and sale of the property, and that the deed, according to the express declarations of Heathcote, was intended as security for the money which he had advanced; and it is further to be noted that no money was paid, no obligation given, no price fixed upon the property, nor was there anything else done which would have given the matter the appearance of a sale. So far, then, as this testimony goes it is express and positive, and leaves no room for doubt or hesitation; and had it gone one step farther, and revealed the fact that Heathcote was to reconvey on receipt of his advancements, no one could hesitate to pronounce the transaction a mortgage. But Annie E. Walls, the other witness whom we have mentioned, supplies what is wanting for the perfection of the plaintiff's case. She details with particularity the transactions which led to the making of the deed, and says:

"It was finally agreed between Heathcote and Pearson that Pearson should deed this lot to Joseph F. Heathcote, as security for the money advanced and to be thereafter advanced for the purpose of erecting buildings on this lot, and when the amount loaned by Heathcote to Pearson was paid, with interest, Heathcote agreed to reconvey and redeed this lot back to the plaintiff, Pearson; and if Pearson did not or could not pay Heathcote his money with interest, at a favorable time the lot and buildings were to be sold, and the proceeds taken first to pay Heathcote the amount due him, and balance to go to and be paid to Pearson."

She further testifies that subsequently she frequently heard the parties say, in her presence and in the presence of each other, that the property had been conveyed solely for the security of the grantee, and was to be reconveyed to Pearson as soon as Heathcote was paid. If this witness is to be believed, a parol defeasance is established; and were we to adopt the judgment of the court below, we must in effect anticipate the operation of the Act of June 8, 1881, which, when the deed in controversy was executed, was not yet enacted.

But beside the evidence to which we have adverted, there were offers of testimony ruled out which, as corroborative of the preceding evidence, were relevant and important. These offers embraced the letter signed "Sister Mary;" the evidence of John W. Neilds, William Suplee, Christopher Grimes, Thomas Carr, Patrick McDonald, Mrs. Appleton, Robert Pearson, Alfred Pearson, Kate R. Wilson, James Sharkey and Thomas Clegg. All these proposed to show the continued possession of Pearson, and the position of Heathcote as a mere mortgagee; all were designed to exhibit such circumstances, conditions and declarations as were inconsistent with the idea of absolute title in Heathcote.

It is urged, however, that from the testimony of Mrs. Walls it is obvious that Heathcote had, even by the oral arrangement, the power to sell; and that, hence, under the rule as stated in the cases of Todd v. Campbell, 32 Pa. 255, and Lance's App. 3 Cent. Rep. 622, 112 Pa. 456, the transaction cannot be regarded as a mortgage, but rather as an oral trust which the Act of 1856 avoids.

But we cannot see the applicability of the cases cited, to the facts developed in the present contention. In Todd v. Campbell the facts were not sufficient to raise a trust of any kind; while in Lance's Appeal the evidence as well as all the circumstances showed clearly that it was not otherwise intended from the beginning, than that Bonnell, Lance's vendee, was to have the power to sell, not only for the purpose of paying the indebtedness of Lance to himself, but also in order to relieve the property from its liens. Here, on the other hand, there is nothing of the kind; for it is obvious that the parties, being ignorant of the legal effect of their own arrangement, assumed that Heathcote possessed that power, although both were aware that when his advancements were paid his right in the property ceased. Moreover, it does not follow, that even had he possessed that power it was not to be exercised only by way of foreclosure and if so, the parol defeasance would not be thereby affected.

What we had said sustains all the exceptions of the plaintiff in error; and, as a consequence, we reverse the judgment of the court below and order a new venire.

SUPERVISORS OF SAUCON TOWNSHIP, Plffs. in Err.,
v.
Charles BRODHEAD.

SAME v. SAME.

1. A writ of certiorari to review a decree confirming a report of viewers laying out a public road, taken more than two years after the final confirmation of the report, will be quashed.
2. A writ of error to review an order granting a writ of alternative mandamus, is premature, and will be quashed.

JANUARY Term, 1887, Nos. 320, 315, E. D. Certiorari to the Quarter Sessions of Northampton County, to review a judgment confirming the report of viewers; and error to the Common Pleas of Northampton County, to review a judgment granting a writ of alternative mandamus. Writ quashed.

Some of the inhabitants of Saucon Township, particularly of the University District, deeming it necessary to have a well defined public highway to lead from the southern line of the Borough of South Bethlehem at Birch Street westwardly, to a point on the line of Chestnut Street, known as the western terminus of Packer Avenue, petitioned the court of quarter sessions on June 2, 1884, to appoint proper persons to view and lay out the same according to law.

Charles Brodhead was not a petitioner for the road.

An order appointing viewers was accordingly made.

The viewers reported as follows:

"That they gave due written notice to the owners of the lands through which the proposed route was intended to pass, of the time and place of meeting to perform the duties of their appointment, as appears by the hereunto attached affidavit.

"That on Saturday, June 14, 1884, at 2.30 in the afternoon, in accordance with said order and notice, the viewers met on the premises in Saucon Township for the purpose of performing the duties imposed upon them by the said order.

"That the following named persons were present, to wit: Howard Knecht, William Henn, James Bœhm, James R. O'Brien, W. A. Wilbur.

"That, after having been duly and severally sworn according to law, proceeded to view the premises and assess the damages; and, after having carefully viewed the same, we find and report that there is occasion for a public road, to be located in the manner described in said order, the courses and distances to be as follows: commencing at a point the southeastern extremity of Birch Street, being in the southern line of the Borough of South Bethlehem, then south eighty-eight degrees, west, 1,132 feet, thence south 75¼ degrees, west 468 feet, to a point known as the western terminus of Packer Avenue, as will more fully and at large appear by the annexed map or plan of said road, as laid out by the undersigned viewers.

"That the said viewers having decided in favor of locating said road, in manner as aforesaid, endeavored to procure from the persons over whose lands such location was made, releases for damages arising from the opening of said road, and were refused by said owners, and therefore failed to procure such releases.

"That thereupon the said viewers proceeded to view the said premises and assess the damages which the said persons who refused to release as aforesaid, will sustain by reason of the opening of said road. The viewers aforesaid find that by reason of said opening it will take and occupy portions of lands belonging to the Lehigh University, and portions belonging to Charles Brodhead, and that the said University and the said Charles Brodhead therefore sustain damages as follows, to wit: Lehigh University $100; Charles Brodhead $136.50."

The report was presented and confirmed nisi June 16, 1884. It was confirmed absolutely September 1, 1884; and the court directed the road to be opened thirty feet wide and according to the report.

On December 15, 1884, the Supervisors of Saucon Township obtained a rule to show cause why the confirmation of the report should not be stricken off, and the report set aside.

On July 25, 1885, upon discharging the rule the court, SCHUYLER, P. J., delivered the following opinion:

This report is palpably defective in that it does not state affirmatively, as required by the rule of court, that notice had been given to the Supervisors of the Township of the intended view; and if an exception to this effect had been filed in proper time it would have been our plain duty to have set the report aside. But this was not done. The report was confirmed absolutely September 1, 1884. Two days thereafter an order to open the road was issued and promptly served on the supervisors. In pursuance of this order the Supervisor in whose district the road was located proceeded in the following month of October to open the road with a force of twenty men. The petition on which the present rule is grounded was not presented until December 15, 1884. This, we think, in the absence of any excuse for delay, was clearly too late. It is true as argued by the learned counsel for the rule, that the Supervisors have had no day in court; but the answer is that they might have had, if as soon as they heard of the proceedings, they had moved to have them set aside. Vigilantibus, non dormientibus, leges subveniunt.

The objection that the report does not show that the road is laid out over the lands, of Charles Brodhead and of the Lehigh University is at variance with the fact. This sufficiently appears from the draft which is a part of the report. Road in Bart Township, 13 Serg. & R. 84.

It also sufficiently appears, we think, that the road is in Saucon Township. The viewers report that "they met on the premises in Saucon Township." The order to open the road was directed to the Supervisors of that Township, and the road was actually opened by one of their number. It is true, according to the draft, that the viewers in running the line of the road adopted the southern line of the Borough of South Bethlehem for a considerable distance. Ordinarily the line returned by the viewers is to be regarded as the center line of the road; but evidently the Supervisors did not so regard the present line, for it is not pretended that any part of the road actually opened by the Supervisors is within the corporate limits of the Borough of South Bethlehem. Under no circumstances, therefore, can that borough be held for any part of the damages.

On August 10, 1885, Charles Brodhead presented to the Common Pleas of Northampton County a petition in which he recited the proceedings in the quarter sessions to the assessment of damages to him, and alleging that the Supervisors of Saucon Township had failed and refused to pay the damages, prayed that a mandamus might issue commanding them to pay.

The common pleas granted a rule to show cause why a writ of alternative mandamus should not issue as prayed.

The Supervisors filed the following answer:

"First, Lower Saucon Township is not liable to make payments of said damages because no road damages have been assessed by the viewers laying out the road mentioned in said petition against said Township. Neither the petition for the appointment of the viewers to lay out the public road therein mentioned, nor the report of the viewers, does locate said road in said Township. The petition states 'to lead from a point the southeastern extremity of Birch Street, being the southern line of the Borough of South Bethlehem, thence westwardly along what is known as the western terminus of Packer Avenue,' and the report of the viewers laying out said road states, 'commencing at a point the southern extremity of Birch Street being on the southern line of the Borough of South Bethlehem, thence south eighty-eight degrees, west 1,132 feet, thence south 75¼ degrees, west 468 feet, to a point known as the western extremity of Packer Avenue.' The report does not state that the road is laid out through lands of Charles Brodhead.

"Second, because the draft attached to the report of viewers shows that the road is not laid out through the territory of Lower Saucon Township. It exhibits the fact that the road is laid out on the borough line. It does not show that it is the dividing line between the Borough of South Bethlehem and Lower Saucon Township.

"Third, because the road as laid out, the report shows, passes entirely over and upon the road bed known as Packer Avenue, being over and upon another road bed; and the law prohibits laying a new road upon the road bed of another road already opened or along the line of such a road.

"Fourth, the Supervisors of said Township never had any notice of the time of the meeting of viewers who laid out said road."

On January 24, 1887, the rule was made absolute and a writ of alternative mandamus issued.

On February 12, 1887, the Supervisors obtained a certiorari to review the proceedings in the quarter sessions, and a writ of error to review the proceedings in the common pleas.

Upon the former writ the assignment of error specified the action of the quarter sessions: 1, in confirming the report of the viewers, because it did not affirmatively set forth that notice of the view had been given to the Supervisors of Saucon Township, wherein the proposed road was to be located; 2, in not referring the report back to the viewers, and in not granting a review; 3, in assuming jurisdiction of the petition and proceedings for laying out a road on, along, or at the side of Packer Avenue, a street already dedicated and opened of the width of sixty feet; and 4, in confirming the report of viewers at the same term of their appointment, and in not quashing the proceedings for the road, because they were illegal.

Upon the latter writ the assignments of error specified the action of the Common Pleas in awarding the mandamus, and in subsequently overruling a motion to quash the mandamus.

Mr. A. S. Knecht, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. J. Davis Brodhead, for defendant in error:

The writ of certiorari in this case was taken more than two years after the report of the viewers was confirmed, and more than two years after the road was actually opened by the plaintiffs in error, and should be quashed.

Act of April 1, 1874, P. L. 50; Re Road in Wilkins Township, 5 Cent. Rep. 701.

Further, there were no exceptions filed to the report of viewers; and none of the assignments of error were properly "presented to the consideration of the court below, and for that reason will not be noticed here."

The Supervisors petitioned the court not only to strike off final confirmation, but also for a review. They were entitled to a review under Act of June 13, 1836, P. D. p. 1510, § 103.

The rule was dismissed July 27, 1885, for application of review. The certiorari taken February 12, 1887.

A final decree is that which ends a case in the court below.

Act of March 16, 1868, § 1, P. L. p. 46; Hilbish v. Catherman, 60 Pa. 444.

The case was not decided finally in the court below until July 27, 1885, when the court discharged the rule.

The rule entered December 15, 1884, to strike off final confirmation of the report and grant a review suspended the decree of confirmation, which did not become final until July 27, 1885, when the rule was discharged.

Per Curiam:

These cases were argued together. The certiorari issued more than two years after the final confirmation of the report of the viewers; and there is no final judgment in the case in which the writ of error issued. Neither writ can be sustained, therefore.

Writ in each case quashed.

Sarah WELSH'S APPEAL,
Wesley BOWMAN'S APPEAL,
ESTATE OF Moses EVERETT.

1. Nothing less than clear and undoubted evidence should be held sufficient to extend the lien of debts against the real estate of a decedent.
2. In this case conversations between an administrator d. b. n. and the widow and heirs, held, too indefinite to amount to a waiver of the limitation of the Act of February 24, 1834.

(Argued March 2, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 205, 206, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Appeals from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Columbia County, confirming an auditor's report with modifications, and awarding distribution. Affirmed.

Moses Everett died July 8, 1877, leaving to survive him a widow, Letitia Everett, and six children, viz.: T. V. Everett, James, Henry C., Albert, Mary M. and Clara J., intermarried with one Melick. A few days after his death letters of administration were granted to T. V. Everett and H. R. Kline. Mr. Kline was the active administrator in settling the personal estate. Both T. V. Everett and Kline died before filing an account. J. Howard Kline, administrator of H. R. Kline, filed the account of the latter as administrator of Moses Everett, which account was finally confirmed December 10, 1881, showing a balance due accountant of $148.48.

In this account credits are claimed for payments made on two notes drawn by Moses Everett to Sarah Welsh dated respectively, April 15, 1873, and April 18, 1874, each for the sum of $100, by H. R. Kline, subsequent to the death of Moses Everett and prior to the death of H. R. Kline, last payment being made March 28, 1881, and indorsed on the notes.

Letters of administration, d. b. n., in the estate of Moses Everett were granted to J. Howard Kline December 2, 1881. On December 13, 1884, said administrator d. b. n. presented his petition to the orphans' court praying for an order for sale of real estate for payment of debts. The schedule of debts attached to the petition contained among others the claim of Sarah Welsh. Sale was ordered, and on January 27, 1885, the real estate was sold for the sum of $2,497 and report thereof confirmed by the court February 7, 1885.

The accountant filed his first and final account to September Term, 1885, No. 25, to which three exceptions were filed September 30, 1885, in substance claiming that accountant had not charged himself with all that had come into his hands or that he should have received. Subsequently, by leave of court, another exception to the accountant's charge for commission of $126.30 and counsel fee of $80 was filed.

William Chrisman, Esq., was appointed auditor on exceptions, and to make distribution of the balance in accountant's hands. Before the auditor no evidence was given in regard to matters in the three exceptions first filed; and the surcharge therein claimed was disallowed by the auditor, and his finding confirmed by the court. The exception as to commission and counsel fee was overruled by the auditor, but the report of the auditor was modified, by the court deciding that $125 was a liberal allowance for the compensation of the administrator and the attorney, and surcharged accountant with the difference of $81.30.

In the matter of the distribution among other claims presented for payment out of the fund for distribution was that of Wesley Bowman, on book account, amount, $39.08, and Sarah Welsh, being the balance of the two notes above named.

First note due April 18, 1874, amount $100; payments made by the administrators, April 16, 1879, $30, and March 28, 1881, $40. Second note due April 15, 1875, amount, $100; payments made by the administrator, April 16, 1879, $31 and March 28, 1881, $40. Balance found due by audit on both notes at time of distribution, $184.55.

The auditor found as facts that the claims presented and allowed by the auditor were known to the widow and heirs, and the correctness of the same acknowledged by them before the Statute of Limitations could have been pleaded against any of them, as was also their expressed desire to have them paid, coupled with which was their request to have proceedings to sell real estate postponed to enable them to raise the money to pay the debt. This request was first made of J. H. Kline, the present accountant, prior to July 8, 1882, and repeatedly from that time forward, both before and after the sale of real estate was ordered. That claimants had not been guilty of laches, and that under the circumstances in this case they were not barred by the Statute of Limitations, and allowed the claims so presented, among them that of Sarah Welsh and Wesley Bowman, rejecting only one, and that because it had been barred prior to the death of Moses Everett. Counsel for widow and heirs objected to the allowance of all accounts and claims presented by the several creditors as being barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The auditor's first report was presented and confirmed nisi by the court upon February 13, 1886, and without any expression of opinion of the court, was, upon the first day of April, 1886, referred back to the auditor with directions to receive further testimony upon two points: first, the time when the administrator d. b. n. paid any debt due from the estate of the intestate for which he claimed credit or to be allowed in distribution; second, when as near as can be ascertained, did conversations take place between the widow of Moses Everett and his heirs, and the administrator d. b. n. in reference to the debts and postponing the time of sale of real estate? Which of the heirs, if any, were present and took part in such conversation? Which of the heirs assented to a postponement of the time of sale of real estate to a time later than the 8th day of July, 1882, and in what way such assent was given.

He reported the testimony of J. Howard Kline as to two conversations had with the widow and two of the five heirs, prior to July 8, 1882.

Some time in December, 1881, according to his testimony "I had a conversation with Mary, Henry and the widow. Henry and the widow said the debts should or ought to be paid, but they didn't know how to pay them. * * * They had no money then * * * they said they ought to be paid, but they did not say we will pay them * * * said they ought to be paid but did not promise to pay them. * * * At that time we talked of the real estate and I said the real estate would have to be sold unless they could negotiate a loan,—no day at that time fixed for selling the real estate."

"About July or August, 1882, I next had a conversation with the heirs, the same ones as before, Mary, Henry and the widow. About the same talk was brought over at that meeting. Nothing new from what took place before," except that "I began to ask them about the claims and they said they were correct."

The auditor's second report was confirmed nisi May 8, 1886.

Same exceptions were filed to both reports and both argued and disposed of by an opinion and decree of court filed July 5, 1886, modifying the report of the auditor by the rejection of certain claims of creditors presented to the auditor, among them that of Sarah Welsh and Wesley Bowman and the surcharging accountant with $81.80 on account of charge in account by administrator for services and counsel fee, as above stated.

In the course of the opinion the court said: "All of the claims presented before the auditor for distribution were simple contract debts, and were all due at the time of the death of Moses Everett, and several of them some years before. At the time of the sale of the real estate they were all barred by the six years' Statute of Limitations. Payments made by an administrator, on a debt due by the decedent, do not keep alive or renew a debt against the estate; nor do promises or admissions made by him have that effect. Giving notice of the claim by a creditor and making demand of payment, or placing the evidence of the claim in the hands of the administrator does not stop the running of the statute.

Steel v. Steel, 12 Pa. 66; Fritz v. Thomas, 1 Whart. 66; Clark v. McGuire, 25 Pa. 259; Sarett's Estate, 1 Pa. C. C. R. 600.

"These debts had each and all of them ceased to be a lien on the real estate of the decedent at the time of the sale. After a lapse of five years by the twenty-fourth section of the Act of February 24, 1834, all debts cease to be a lien on the land of a decedent unless an action be brought within that time or a copy of the claim be filed in the office of the prothonotary as therein required.

"Notice of the claim amounts to nothing. In Bindley's App. 69 Pa. 295, it was held that presentation by a creditor of his claim before an auditor making distribution under a previous sale and the receipt of a dividend did not continue the lien. The leaning of the court, says Sharswood, J., through the whole current of the numerous decisions upon the subject, has been to favor the heir and to require of the creditors the vigilant prosecution of their demands in the mode pointed out. It is evident that no admission, however solemn, will dispense with an action.

"Even where an action is brought within the five years, yet if the land is not taken into execution within that time the lien is gone. So, if the five years expire between the time when the sale is ordered by the orphans' court, and the day of sale, the lien is gone as against the heirs.

Maus v. Hummel, 11 Pa. 228; Bindley's App. supra.

"It does not appear that the heirs or any of them said anything to any of their creditors to induce them to forbear filing a lien. None of them made any promise to any of these creditors to pay them, or that the lien of debts should remain.

"The fact that they had communication with the administrator in 1881, and afterwards, in which they expressed a desire if possible to save the farm from sale, and that they made ineffectual efforts to raise money, did not continue the lien. And if they had made individual promises to pay the debt of any person, the only fect would have been to hold the person so promising and not the estate.

"Giving to the loose conversation between the administrator and the widow and some of the heirs all the weight they are entitled to, they do not amount to a waiver of the provisions of the Act of 1834, limiting the lien of debts against the real estate of a decedent. It is possible that such a waiver may be made, but as was held in Wallace's Appeal, 5 Pa. 106.

"'But although the power to postpone the operation of the statute by parol must be asserted, it should not be forgotten that the proof showing an exercise of this power ought to be clear and undoubted. An agreement to the effect averred here ought to be incontrovertibly shown by the party who sets it up before the antagonist party be held bound by it.'

Wallace's App. 5 Pa. 107.

"The law clearly pointed out the remedy for securing the debts of their creditors. They knew in 1881 that the personal estate had been exhausted. It must be presumed that they knew that unless they brought an action or filed a copy of their claim as required by the statute, they would have no lien upon real estate. Having failed to avail themselves of the plain provisions of the law and lost their lien by their own laches, they have no claim on this fund and no ground for complaint. Now, July 5, 1886, the exceptions to the report of the auditor allowing to John Stiner and others in the list of creditors, Nos. 1 to 12 inclusive, amounting to $385.40, is sustained and the report in respect thereto is set aside."

Mr. C. W. Miller, for Sarah Welsh, appellant:

The Acts of 1797 and 1834 are not enlarging but restraining Acts. That they were enacted to set dead men's estates at rest, and enable heirs and others interested to measure with certainty the value of property inherited has been decided. In the presentation of claims against decedents before an auditor, on distribution in the orphans' court, claimants are no better off so far as being required to comply strictly to the requirements of the Act of Assembly limiting liens and actions, than in actions at law, is now well settled; and it can no longer be argued with propriety that administrators and executors as such are invested with such power and authority as to breathe new life into dead claims. But the appellant in this case claims relief from a different source.

While the Statute of Limitations can be pleaded, and when pleaded is a bar to recovery in the orphans' court as well as in suits at law, it need not be pleaded by parties interested, but if waived by the parties interested, it is binding upon them, and not in their power to wait until the time has passed when the creditors could have put themselves upon record as the law compels them to do, and say to them: "I did not mean to waive any legal right I had; you have been guilty of laches, and now I want the money. If you were too easy, and lacked a knowledge of business and the law, you must suffer."

Wallace's App. 5 Pa. 105.

From the time of the decision in Wallace's Appeal in 1847, up to McClintock's Appeal (29 Pa. 360) in 1857, the matter of waiving the limitation by heirs does not appear to have been raised, and from 1857 up to Yorks' Appeal there was no occasion for raising the question. The decision in Yorks' Appeal (1 Cent. Rep. 354, 659) was to protect creditors and heirs from wrongs that might be practiced upon them, certainly not to enable them to do injustice to others.

The nature of the exceptions filed to the administrator's account clearly shows that the position taken by the widow and heirs in the distribution by the auditor was an after thought. That the heirs were acting in concert in the matter and for mutual benefit in having the sale postponed, and in their endeavors to raise the money to pay the debts and secure it by mortgage on the premises clearly indicated that it was a family arrangement. Arrangements of this kind should be favored for the same reason that the court in Shartel's Appeal, 64 Pa. 25, held that "All compromises and settlements by families are maintained not only as beneficial in themselves but as conducive to peace and harmony, where it especially ought to exist." The auditor's finding was a rational conclusion from all the facts submitted to him, and should not have been disturbed by the court below.

Messrs. E. R. Ikeler and Grant Herring, for appellees.

Per Curiam:

These cases were argued together. They are from the same decree. The court correctly held that all the evidence was insufficient to prove a waiver of the limitation of the Act of 1834. Nothing less than clear and undoubted evidence should be held sufficient to extend the lien of debts against the real estate of a decedent. The assignments of error are not sustained.

Decree affirmed in each case, and the appeals dismissed, at the costs of the respective appellants therein.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 64, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Chester County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendants in an action of trespass. Affirmed.

This was an action by James E. Neall against Albion W. Hart and Charles M. Griffith, to recover damages for illegal arrest and false imprisonment.

At the trial before FUTHEY, P. J., the following facts appeared:

In May, 1886, James E. Neall, the superintendent of the Pennsylvania Granite Company, purchased from Albion W. Hart a quantity of curbing. He failed to pay for the curbing and Hart, on May 18, 1886, made complaint before Charles M. Griffith, a justice of the peace, charging "That James E. Neall, by misrepresentation and trickery, has defrauded me in the sale of curbing stone and has appropriated the same to his own use."

Upon this complaint the justice issued a warrant for the arrest of Neall. The warrant charged Neall with "defrauding him (Hart) of moneys due for labor and stone." On May 19, 1886, Neall was arrested and brought before Griffith, and in default of $400 bail was committed to the jail of Chester County. The constable came to West Chester with Neall, and an application was made to the court, and Neall was discharged from custody about 9 o'clock in the evening, on the ground that the complaint and warrant charged no offense known to the criminal law.

Nothing further was ever done by the justice in the criminal proceeding and it was never returned to the quarter sessions. Neall then brought this action of trespass against Hart and Griffith.

The defendants proposed to show the statements that Hart made to the justice upon which he issued the warrant. Objected to by the plaintiff, as being irrelevant, the offense charged not being a crime at law, and it being immaterial whether there is probable cause or not, as it would not be justification. Objection overruled. Exception. First assignment of error.

The defendants proved also, under objection and exception, the price paid by the Granite Company for their property. Second and third assignments of error.

The court charged, inter alia, as follows:

The foundation of the present action is that 'Squire Griffith had no authority to issue a warrant for the arrest of the plaintiff. It is admitted as being the law that if the justice acted within his jurisdiction, he is not liable, unless malice should appear. There is no evidence in the case that would impute dishonest or wrongful motives on the part of either the justice or the prosecutor. The justice appears to have fairly and deliberately heard the case, and determined it according to the best of his judgment.

The question therefore resolves itself into one of jurisdiction. If it is shown that the justice had jurisdiction of the matter, the plaintiff cannot recover.

Justices of the peace are entrusted with certain duties of a limited character; and in viewing their proceedings it is well, perhaps, not to be too hypercritical. In this case it appears that Albion Hart made certain statements to the justice, constituting what is termed the information; that upon this information the justice issued the warrant of arrest; held the hearing; and, in default of bail, committed the plaintiff to jail.

The language of the affirmation made by Hart is that "James E. Neall by misrepresentation and trickery has defrauded me in the sale of curbing stone and appropriated the same to his own use."

The language of the warrant, based upon this affirmation, is not quite as full as that of the affirmation itself; but the two papers must be taken together, in order to clearly understand the nature of the case that was heard by the justice.

The commitment of the justice has not been produced; but in its absence the presumption arises that it substantially followed the language of the statement given to the justice, upon which the information was based, and that the plaintiff was committed for the offense therein charged against him.

These papers are not drawn with the skill of a lawyer, or one especially familiar with such matters; but, after a careful examination, I instruct you that they substantially charge an offense against the criminal law; that [a fair reading of these papers does charge a crime against James E. Neall—the offense of obtaining possession of the property of Albion Hart by means of false pretenses; that he appropriated the proceeds of the same to his own use, and that a fair reading also charges him with embezzling moneys belonging to Albion Hart, one of the defendants in this action.] * * *

It is your duty to consider the circumstances under which this stone was purchased. [Was it a mere debt? If a mere debt was incurred by Mr. Neall, or the company he represented, the justice would have had no authority to institute a criminal proceeding. It becomes important to ascertain whether the stone was taken away before Mr. Neall complied with his part of the contract, in respect to the payment in cash. If it was, then it was removed against the will of Mr. Hart, and would be a misappropriation of his property;] but if not, and the agreement was that it should be paid for at some future time, the relation of creditor and debtor was simply established between the parties, and it would not have been a misappropriation of Mr. Hart's property.

The stone belonging to Mr. Hart was shipped to Philadelphia, and subsequently sold with other property belonging to the Pennsylvania Granite Company. Mr. Hart testified that he repeatedly asked Mr. Neall for payment, but that the reply always was that he had not received the money.

You will determine whether the fact stated by Neall: that he had not received the money from the sale of the stone, is of any importance, if you believe Hart's testimony that the payment was to be cash on the delivery of the stone.

If you find that Neall did receive the money from the company, the question arises as to whom it belonged. [Whose money was it? Was it Mr. Hart's money he received? If it was Hart's money that Neall received from the company, and refused to pay to Hart, when Hart learned the fact of its receipt and demanded payment, then Neall would be guilty of embezzling money to which Hart was entitled.]

You will therefore determine from the evidence in the case whether the relation of creditor and debtor existed between the parties, or whether the criminal law was violated. In order to ascertain this fact, you will ascertain whether Nr. Neall removed Hart's property, contrary to the provision of their agreement; that it was to be paid for in cash on delivery. If so, the stone still remained Hart's property, and the proceeds of its sale, when received by Neall, should have been paid to Hart; and, under these circumstances, failing to make the necessary payment, Neall would render himself liable to a prosecution for embezzlement.

In this view of the case [the next question for you to determine is whether there were such circumstances surrounding the transaction as warranted the prosecutor in making the complaint, and the justice in issuing the warrant of arrest, thus placing the plaintiff in the position of a criminal.]

In cases where the facts are not disputed, the court determines whether they are sufficient to constitute probable cause; but where the facts are in dispute, it is the duty of the jury to ascertain what the facts are, and then the court decides whether or not, under a given state of facts, probable cause is shown to have existed at the time of the arrest.

I instruct you that if you find the stone was sold to the Pennsylvania Granite Company, or Mr. Neall, as its representative, or individually, and the relation of creditor and debtor was created between the parties, the action would have been simply on a debt, and the justice would have had no jurisdiction to entertain criminal proceedings against Mr. Neall; but if you find that the stone was to be paid for in cash, and that it was removed without payment being made, the stone, or its proceeds, still remained the property of Mr. Hart; and if the money was received by Neall and not paid to Mr. Hart, then the prosecutor was warranted in making the complaint, and the justice authorized to issue the process and hold Neall for trial in default of bail.

The question as to whether Neall could have been convicted on the charge in court is not material; because juries decide the guilt of a defendant from all the evidence in the case, and a defendant may be acquitted, although there may be ample evidence to justify a prosecution.

The jurisdiction of the justice is the only question involved in the case. If it was simply a debt between the parties, the justice would have had no jurisdiction to institute a criminal proceeding. If he did so, under such circumstances, he would be a trespasser in law; and those who made the complaint would be placed in the same position. If, however, it was a case where the criminal law had been violated, so far as it could be made prima facie to appear, neither the prosecutor nor the justice could be held liable to damages in an action for false imprisonment; and there would be nothing in the case to warrant the conclusion that they had acted in a wanton or wrongful manner.

This is the case you have been called to try. It is simply a question of jurisdiction. If the justice had no jurisdiction, under the principles of law, as I have explained them, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

[If you find the facts to be as I have stated that the defendants contend, I instruct you that there was probable cause for the prosecution, and the plaintiff cannot recover.]

In cases of this kind the damages are compensatory or such as will compensate the plaintiff for any loss he may have sustained; nominal damages, for some trifling sum, and exemplary damages, which are usually given for the purpose of setting an example to others.

[If you render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, there is no evidence to warrant your giving him exemplary damages.] The circumstances, as developed by the evidence, would warrant simply either nominal or compensatory damages, but ordinarily compensatory damages are allowed in such cases.

Verdict and judgment were for the defendants.

The remaining assignments of error specified the portions of the charge included in brackets. The answers to the points raised substantially the same questions.

Messrs. John Sparhawk, Jr., R. Jones Monaghan, and J. Frank E. Hause, for plaintiff in error:

Trespass is the proper remedy where an arrest has been made on a warrant which charges no crime.

Maher v. Ashmead, 30 Pa. 344; Baird v. Householder, 32 Pa. 168; Kramer v. Lott, 50 Pa. 495.

The distinction is between irregular process, or that which is absolutely void, and process erroneously issued, but not void.

The general rule is that false imprisonment lies for arrest under process irregularly issued, but not for arrest under process erroneously issued. It seems, however, that the irregularity must have been apparent upon the face of the process itself, or upon inspection of the record. There is an important distinction between erroneous process and irregular process. The first is the act of the court; and even after it has been set aside or reversed, whatever was done under it while in force may be justified. But irregular process is the act of the prosecutor, and when once set aside is considered as having been a nullity from the beginning, and forms no justification to him for anything done under it. In some instances process is on the face of it, to all intents and purposes, a nullity; as, where it issues in a case plainly out of the jurisdiction of the court or magistrate issuing it.

1 Waterman, Trespass, § 307.

A justice of the peace and his jurisdiction are creatures of statute. A justice's court is not one of general, but of special and limited jurisdiction.

In such case there are no presumptions in favor of jurisdiction; but such jurisdiction must appear on the record.

It is a general rule that whenever a person justifies under any authority whatever, he must show every matter and part of the authority under which he justifies. This rule is especially applicable to persons whose powers are solely derived from statute. If they proceed in a matter not within their cognizance, or without having acquired jurisdiction over the party in the forms prescribed by law, any judgment which they may render will be absolutely void. This doctrine is not peculiar to courts held by justices of the peace in civil cases, but applies to all courts and officers exercising a special and limited jurisdiction. They must pursue their authority, or their acts will be void.

The principal distinction between courts of general and those of limited jurisdiction is that in the one case jurisdiction will be presumed until the contrary appears, while in the other no such presumption is indulged; but they must show their authority in every case.

In pleading the judgment of a superior court, it is enough to say that judgment was rendered: and it will lie on the other party to show a want of power. But in pleading the judgment of an inferior tribunal, the authority to decide, as well as the judgment, must be alleged.

Id. § 54.

Whenever any persons assume to act under a special and limited power conferred by law, their doings may be avoided by showing that they had no jurisdiction, or that they exceeded the limits of their authority, and that they thereby became trespassers.

Id. § 56.

When a magistrate or other officer, having a special and limited jurisdiction, issues a warrant to take the person or property of another, he must show upon the face of his proceedings that he has jurisdiction; nothing will be intended in his favor; and it must appear that he has jurisdiction over the subject matter, the person and the process.

Id. § 359.

Every person who interferes with the liberty or property of another is prima facie a trespasser, and is liable to an action unless he can show legal justification for his act.

Dicey, Parties, 450.

In a proceeding which is entirely illegal and void the magistrate is clearly liable.

1 Waterman, Trespass, §§ 57, 362, 364.

Where a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction whatever, and undertakes to act, his acts are coram non judice and void, equally so as if he were not a justice. If he has jurisdiction, but errs in exercising it, then his acts are not void but voidable only. In the former case he is personally liable, in the latter not.

3 Wait, Act. & Def. 316; Hill v. Bateman, 1 Str. 711.

The defendant, Hart, is clearly liable, as well as the justice.

Although the making of an affidavit upon which the plaintiff was unlawfully arrested, will not render the defendant liable, if he made it without knowing or having any intention that it should be so used; yet, if the imprisonment be the necessary or probable consequence of orders given by the defendant, he will be liable therefor, although he did not directly order it, or contemplate the possibility of its occurrence.

1 Waterman, Trespass, § 302; Parsons v. Lloyd, 2 W. Bl. 845.

If the warrant be set aside, the attorney who procured it, and his client who authorized him to procure it, will be liable for false imprisonment, as was held in the principal case.

Bigelow, L. Cas. Torts. 279.

The tort consists not in any immediate violence to the plaintiff's person, but in communicating an improper direction to the process of the law. The defendant is liable in trespass if he direct the constable to make the arrest, or if he come armed with void process, for that is as none.

1 Smith, L. Cas. 557.

Neither the information, warrant, nor evidence, discloses a case amenable to the criminal law pending before the justice when the arrest and imprisonment occurred.

Messrs. Chas. H. Pennypacker and D. Smith Talbot, for defendants in error:

The question as to what occurred at the office of the justice was an important one. The statements of the parties were essential to an understanding of the case. Their intent and meaning may not be clearly expressed in the papers, but, taken with them, they import an offense against the criminal law, of which the justice had jurisdiction. An offense was substantially charged upon the face of the papers. A failure to sustain the charge upon a hearing had does not render the defendants liable. As it is the duty of every citizen to aid in enforcing the criminal laws of the State against those by whom they are willfully disobeyed, so it is the business of our courts of justice to see that the person thus undertaking to vindicate the law shall not suffer in consequence of such an attempt, even although it may have proved abortive. So where it appears that the defendant acted merely through mistake, or where the prosecution resulted from the mistake of the justice of the peace before whom the information was made, the action cannot be maintained.

Gilliford v. Windel, 108 Pa. 145.

The law favors honest efforts to bring the guilty to justice; and where a citizen proceeds by complaint before a magistrate, although the prosecution be unwarranted in fact, if his motives were pure, he will be protected.

McCarthy v. De Armit, 99 Pa. 70.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

Several exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court below on the admission and rejection of evidence, and are here now assigned for error. We cannot sustain them. "The gist of false imprisonment is unlawful detention; and the general rule is that malice will be inferred from the want of probable cause, so far at least as to sustain the action." Mr. Justice Trunkey in McCarthy v. De Armit, 99 Pa. 68.

From what is here said it is obvious that Neall's action was open to defeat by proof of probable cause for the prosecution; and further, that even in the absence of probable cause, it was important to disprove malice in fact, and that if for no other purpose than in mitigation of damages. Hence, the statements made to the justice by the prosecutor, and by which he was induced to issue the warrant were relevant. As to the assignments embracing the rejected offers: inasmuch as we cannot perceive how the price paid by the Granite Company for its property could possibly affect the case trying, we cannot sustain them.

The remaining exceptions relate to the charge of the court and its answers to the points and, although numerous, may all be considered under two general heads:

1. Was the court right when it said to the jury: "The next question for you to determine is whether there were such circumstances surrounding the transaction as warranted the prosecutor in making the complaint to the justice in issuing the warrant of arrest, thus placing the plaintiff in the position of a criminal?"

We are constrained to answer this interrogatory in the affirmative. A justice of the peace is not to be presumed to be learned in legal technicalities; hence, if the information set out a cheat of any kind, it was sufficient on which to ground a warrant. But that information alleged "that James E. Neall, by misrepresentation and trickery has defrauded me in the sale of curbing stone, and has appropriated the same to his own use." This charge, as here set forth, is not very definite, forasmuch as it is difficult to say whether it was intended to charge embezzlement, or obtaining goods on false pretenses; but that a cheat of some kind is thereby charged, no one, we think, will deny; and if so, it was sufficient to warrant the justice's action, and it was the business of the prosecuting officer when the case reached his hands to determine what should be the character of the indictment.

2. Was the court right in its instruction to the jury, that if the stones were to be paid for in cash before removal, they continued the property of Hart, although Neall had possessed himself of them, and their sale by the latter, and appropriation of the money arising therefrom to his own use, would constitute such a fraud as justified Hart in making the complaint on which the arrest issued? This in effect raises the question of probable cause which, as we think, was properly submitted.

If the testimony of Hart and J. W. Morgan is to be believed, there was such cause for the prosecution if nothing more. The plaintiff obtained a delivery of the curbing on the cars, under a contract to pay when so delivered, and then, taking advantage of the defendant's performance, he shipped the curbing to market, under the pretense that he would pay the next day, but instead of doing so he sold the curbing, and refused payment altogether. Let it be that this was not embezzlement in its technical sense, yet were the prosecutor's goods gotten under pretense of a contract and through a lie.

In the case of Commonwealth v. Burdick, 2 Pa. 163, Mr. Chief Justice Gibson makes use of the following language: "But I think it, at least, doubtful whether a naked lie, by which credit has been gained, would not, in every case, be deemed within our statute, which declares it a cheat to obtain money or goods by any false pretenses whatsoever."

If, then, so great a jurist as the one cited was inclined to the opinion that a deliberate lie would support an indictment charging a false pretense under our statute, we may well excuse a layman and a country justice for coming to a like conclusion. In other words, on the strength of such authority, we may well conclude that Hart and Griffith had probable if not actual cause for what they did.

The judgment is affirmed.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 96, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Berks County, dismissing a petition for a citation. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared by the petition, answer and depositions, were as follows:

William Trout, of Maidencreek Township, Berks County, by a codicil to his will dated December 20, 1863, and proved January 7, 1864, provided as follows: "It is my will and I order that my son David, my dwelling and piece of land, containing about twenty-six acres, more or less, as his own property, but (aber) my said son David shall keep my dear wife as long as she lives, or pay to her annually seven-two (72) dollars, and my said son David must after my wife's death, pay to my daughter $1,200 as follows: $500 one year after my wife's death, and then $100 annually with interest."

In his will dated May 17, 1862, he had previously provided, inter alia, as follows: "I devise to my son David the house, garden, containing 146 perches; further, it is my will that my dear wife Maria shall have the right to live in my house wherein we now live, as long as she lives, on the twenty-six acres, but my son David shall farm the land, and pay all the taxes and expenses from * * * the same as long as she lives, and shall haul her wood and coal for fuel to her house as much as she needs; * * * further, it is my will, that if my said wife shall not or does not wish to stay in the said house or place, then my son David shall pay to her annually the sum of 150 dollars, out of the 26 acres of land; * * * further, it is my will that my son David, after the death of my wife Maria, can have the first opportunity to accept the twenty-six acres of land, more or less, according as he desires."

He then appoints his son David executor.

On May 2, 1878, David Trout made a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, to James W. Schmeck, by which the twenty-six acre tract, inter alia, was conveyed to the assignee, who, under an order of court, pursuant to the Act of February 17, 1876, sold all the assignee's real estate, including the twenty-six acre tract, devised to him by his father's will, to Charles Levan, for $2,500. There was no reservation of dower or legacy in the deed of the assignee to Levan, but Esther Schmehl, the daughter mentioned in the will caused the following notice to be read at the sale:

Notice to Purchasers:

Notice is hereby given that the real estate about to be sold by James Schmeck, assignee of David Trout, was devised to the said David Trout by his father, William Trout, subject to a testamentary charge, or ausbehalt, of $72 per year, payable to Maria, widow of said William Trout, deceased; also subject to the payment of $1,200 to Esther, wife of Jacob F. Schmehl, after the decease of the said Maria; and that the said charge of $72 per year for the past three years is now due and owing to the said Maria Trout, widow of William Trout, dec'd.

Esther Schmehl.

After Levan became the owner of the premises, February 12, 1879, he paid the arrears of dower due the widow of William Trout, under her husband's will, and also continued to pay the sum of $72 annually to her as long as he continued to own the property. When he sold it to his daughter, Malvina Bickel, the respondent, October 6, 1881, who accepted the deed, and is now in possession under it, the grantor inserted in said deed that the conveyance was "in consideration of the sum of 5,675 dollars, less a dower of 1,200 dollars," etc., and in the latter part of said deed that it was "subject nevertheless to the payment of a dower of $1,200, the interest thereof to be paid to the widow of William Trout, during her natural life, and after her death the principal to the heirs and legal representatives of the said deceased." The deed is recorded in Deed Book Vol. 140, p. 650.

On the 6th of April, 1883, Maria Trout, the widow of William Trout, died; and on the 17th of May, 1883, Esther Schmehl, with her husband, Jacob F. Schmehl, presented their petition for a citation, after a request to pay the legacy and arrears had been met with the reply on the part of the respondents that they were in nowise liable to do so, as the claim was no charge on the land under this will.

As the codicil to the will provided that of the $1,200 directed to be paid to Esther Schmehl, $500 should be paid "one year" after the death of the testator's wife, the present proceeding was commenced a year too soon, owing to the omission in petitioners' copy of the will of the words "one year." But as both parties desired at the time to have the question, as to the liability of the respondents to pay, judicially determined, they agreed in writing to waive the irregularity, and that the proceeding should go on as if the claim was then demandable.

Upon dismissing the petition, SCHWARTZ, J., after stating the facts, filed an opinion as follows:

"The question raised by the pleadings is, Did the testator charge the legacy of $1,200 to testator's daughter, Esther Schmehl, upon the above mentioned lands devised to David Trout?

"In this case, as in Cable's Appeal, 91 Pa. 327, there is no express charge. It is, however, contended that a charge is necessarily implied from the words of the devisor already quoted. It is a settled rule that in order to create a charge upon lands there must be express words or a necessary implication from the whole will, that such was the intention. There is nothing in any part of the will from which such an implication can arise. The direction of the testator to pay the $1,200 to his daughter, Esther Schmehl, is simply a personal obligation on the part of the devisee, arising upon his acceptance of the devise of the land.

"It has, however, been further contended that the legacy to Esther Schmehl should be held to be a charge upon the land: first, because when this property was sold by the assignee for creditors of David Trout, notice was given to purchasers that it was subject to the charge of said legacy of $1,200; second, because Charles Levan, the purchaser at assignee's sale, when he conveyed to Malvina Bickel, the respondent, sold subject to the charge of said legacy.

"The jurisdiction of the orphans' court is confined to charges created in last wills and testaments. And as I have already stated that this legacy, in my opinion, is not a charge of the lands under the provisions of the will of William Trout, deceased, the orphans' court cannot entertain the matter in controversy. This is all that the court decides in these proceedings. I express no opinion as to whether or not the respondent can be compelled to pay the legacy by proceedings in the court of common pleas. The proceedings are dismissed, at the costs of the petitioners."

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in dismissing the appellants' petition for a decree as therein prayed for; in deciding that the $1,200, which David Trout, the devisee, was directed to pay to Esther Schmehl by the codicil to this will of William Trout was no charge on the land devised, and that the orphans' court had no jurisdiction; and in not making a decree for the payment of the $1,200 to Esther Schmehl, as directed by said codicil.

Messrs. Rothermel Bros. and A. G. Green, for appellants:

In Ripple v. Ripple, 1 Rawle, 386, a testator had devised three fourths of a tract of land to his son followed by the directions: "My son Philip is to keep and provide for my beloved wife and my eldest daughter during their natural lives." It was held that, although that land devised is not expressly charged with the maintenance of the wife and children; yet if such intention can be clearly collected from all the parts of the will considered in reference to the testator's circumstances, the charge will attach to the land.

In Hoover v. Hoover, 5 Pa. 351, a devise by a testator to his son, "yielding and paying out of the same $7,250, was held to charge the land."

In Swoope's Appeal, 27 Pa. 58, a devise to a son, "he paying thereout unto my other children" certain sums of money, was likewise held to be a charge on the land devised.

In Hart v. Homiller, 20 Pa. 248, after giving his son Samuel the use of certain real estate during the life of his wife, and upon her death devised to Samuel at a valuation to be made—testator directed this valuation to be included in the rest and residue of his estate, which he devised to his six children, Samuel being one, held, to be a charge on the land.

In Gilbert's Appeal, 85 Pa. 347, a devise to a son at $33 per acre, the proceeds thereof to be divided into eight equal shares distributed equally to her children, was held to be a charge.

To the same effect are McFait's App. 8 Pa. 290; and Drake v. Brown, 68 Pa. 223.

As to preference in favor of wife, see McGlaughlin v. McGlaughlin, 24 Pa. 22; Clery's App. 35 Pa. 58; Field's App. 36 Pa. 11.

Mr. Cyrus G. Derr, for appellant:

A devise with directions that a devisee shall pay certain sums to legatees does not create a charge on the land.

Wright's App. 12 Pa. 256; Miltenberger v. Schlegel, 7 Pa. 241.

Such direction imposes but a personal obligation upon the devisee.

Walter's App. 95 Pa. 305; Brandt's App. 8 Watts, 198.

Following a devise were the words: "But the said John and Edward Cable is to pay;" it was adjudged by this court that no charge was created.

Cable's App. 91 Pa. 327.

The language in this case "And my son David must after my wife's death pay" etc., is not stronger than that in Cable's Appeal. Between the language "he is to pay" and "he must pay" there is no material difference.

If, however, the said legacy of $1,200 should be adjudged to have, by the terms of the said will, been charged upon the said land, yet the assignee's sale, pursuant to an order of the court issued under the Act of February 17, 1876, devested the lien thereof and passed the property to Charles Levan the purchaser at the said sale unincumbered thereby. The language of the said Act is: "Which sale or sales after being confirmed by said court shall discharge all liens against the real estate so sold, excepting that where the lien of a mortgage upon real estate is or shall be prior to all other liens * * * the lien of such mortgage shall not be destroyed."

The lien of a legacy charged upon land is discharged by a judicial sale of the land, although the legacy is payable by installments, some of which are not due at the time of the sale.

Hellman v. Hellman, 4 Rawle, 440; Loback's Case, 6 Watts, 167; Barnet v. Washebaugh, 16 Serg. & R. 410.

The legacy in question not having been made a charge on the land by the said will, or if so, then, having been discharged by the judicial sale aforesaid, the orphans' court has no jurisdiction of the matter; for that court has no jurisdiction of a proceeding for the recovery of a legacy, unless the same is charged on realty. Section 59 of the Act of February 24, 1834, provides that "When a legacy is or shall be hereafter charged upon or payable out of real estate, it shall be lawful for the legatee to apply, by bill or petition, to the orphans' court having jurisdiction of the accounts of the executor of the will by which such legacy was bequeathed; whereupon, such court, having caused due notice to be given to such executor, and to the devisee or heir, as the case may be, of the real estate charged with such legacy, and to such other persons interested in the estate, as justice may require, may proceed according to equity, to make such decree or order touching the payment of the legacy, out of such real estate, as may be requisite and just."

Galloney's App. 6 Pa. 37; Hamilton v. Porter, 63 Pa. 332; Walter's App. 38 Legal Int. 241.

The orphans' court has no jurisdiction, except such as is expressly conferred by statute; and as there is no statute authorizing the said court to decree the payment of a legacy by a devisee when such legacy is not charged upon the land, the court had no jurisdiction in this case.

Per Curiam:

It is clear that the legacy in question was not charged on the land, either by express words or by necessary implication. It follows that the orphans' court had no jurisdiction, and the proceedings were properly dismissed.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

The THOMAS IRON CO.

The purchaser of iron ore, under a contract by which he retains part of the price and promises the vendor to pay it to a third person, not a party to the contract, if such third person owned the land from which the ore was taken, but if not then to have nothing to pay, is not thereby estopped from setting up his own title to the land as a defense to an action of assumpsit by the third person for the sum so retained.

(Argued Feb. 28, Decided March 14, 1887.)

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

At the trial before SASSAMAN, J., the following facts appeared:

By deed of November 18, 1860, Tilgham Schaeffer granted to the Thomas Iron Company the exclusive right to all the iron ore contained in a certain tract of land containing ten acres, more or less, situate in Maxatawny Township, etc., at a royalty of twenty-five cents a ton. March 25, 1861, Samuel Thomas (in behalf of the Thomas Iron Company) contracted in lieu of royalty to pay him a round sum of $1,500 for all the iron ore in the tract.

After the sale and transfer of the iron ore Schaeffer's interest in the premises was sold under proceedings in the orphans' court, and purchased by Seth K. Grim and Daniel Clader. They believed that through this sale they acquired a good title to the iron ore, as well as to the surface. In 1869 they brought ejectment against Thomas et al. for the iron ore.

The case was tried in 1875, and resulted in a verdict for the defendants. The supreme court affirmed the judgment. Clader v. Thomas, 89 Pa. 343.

April 7, 1879, Seth K. Grim made a lease of the iron ore under a small corner of this tract to one Jonathan Baer. Subsequently Baer began to mine iron ore, and sold some of it to the Thomas Iron Company. Before it was all delivered, and before the time for payment, the Thomas Iron Company discovered that it had been mined on a corner of the Schaeffer tract, the iron ore of which belonged to them. They then made an agreement with Baer "that they would retain the royalty of the ore, and if Grim owned the land they would pay him, if not, they had nothing to pay."

Grim claims that the title to the tract belonged to his father's estate, and brought this suit in the name of Seth K. Grim, to the use of his brothers and sisters and himself, for, as stated in the narr. "the price and value of iron ore mined upon the premises of the plaintiffs for the royalty of the same."

The only evidence offered to sustain the suit was the lease of Grim to Baer, evidence of the quantity sold by Baer to the Thomas Iron Company, and their agreement that "they would retain the royalty, and if Grim owned the land they would pay him, if not, they had nothing to pay."

Baer in this lease covenanted to render an account of iron ore received at the expiration of six months, and thereupon "agree to pay for each and every ton of said iron ore the sum of fifty cents gross weight (2240) pounds for each and every ton of iron ore which is taken out; as ground leaf they agree to fifty cents as before mentioned and payable every six months at the furnace where said ore ship there to, that the said Seth K. Grim to draw the money as ground leaf from said furnace."

Under objection and exception the defendant was permitted to prove by a witness "That he knows the tract; lives there upon it; is sixty-two years old; was born there; his father owned it before him; that the place where Baer mined ore was part of the Schaeffer tract, and was always in their possession, to be followed by evidence of a recorded grant of ore to Samuel Thomas. This for the purpose of showing that the title to the tract is in Samuel Thomas and not in the plaintiff, and that the royalty is not payable to the plaintiff."

The defendant asked the court to direct a verdict in its favor.

The charge of the court was as follows:

"I can readily see how the title to lands can be questioned in an action of ejectment with an issue joined on a plea of not guilty, or in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit on an issue joined by the plea of liberum tenementum. In the determination of such an issue many questions for mesne profits or damages may settle injury to lands, either by acts of trespass or mere acts of use and enjoyment, in violation of the rights of him who has the right of title and possession.

["This is an action of assumpsit, to recover money assumed to be due for royalty arising out of the working of an ore lease to which the plaintiffs were neither party nor privy, while the title and the royalty is claimed by other parties, which I believe to be fatal to plaintiff's claim here. These views lead us to affirm the defendants' point; and by this affirmation, your verdict is directed in favor of the defendant."]

The assignments of error specified the admission of the testimony mentioned, and the portion of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. James H. Marx and Frank R. Schell, for plaintiff in error:

The promise of the defendant need not be made immediately to the plaintiff himself; for if made to one person for the benefit of another, the latter may, notwithstanding, maintain the action.

2 Lev. 210; Cowp. 437; Wynn v. Wood, 97 Pa. 216.

This court has uniformily discountenanced all proceedings in equity to try the title to lands.

Meck's App. 97 Pa. 313; Richards v. Cherrington, 12 W. N. C. 140; Long's App. 92 Pa. 171.

According to the evidence of the plaintiff, he, through his tenant, Baer, was in the undisturbed, peaceable possession of this land. That adverse possession under the rulings of this court operated as a disseisin against all other claimants. The evidence further established the fact that the Thomas Iron Company, before any ore was shipped to it, agreed to retain the royalty and pay the same to Grim. Upon the faith of this contract, Baer went to work and delivered the ore. Every principle of an estoppel should prevail against the defendant and prevent the setting up of title in itself.

Lehman v. Kellerman, 65 Pa. 489.

It would be monstrous to allow such evidence to be given in an action of assumpsit. The plaintiff comes into court seeking to recover a debt due him. Without any notice, the defendant sets up title to itself, and that too in a personal action.

Messrs. Jeff. Snyder, and Geo. F. Baer, for defendant in error:

Baer's occupancy was a mere trespass. The defendant had that constructive possession which the law casts upon the owner—the only kind of possession which can well be taken where the surface belongs to another. It could have maintained trover or replevin for any ore taken away; for it has been decided that such "an action does lie in favor of the owners in possession actually or constructively, against a tort feasor, or one who has no right of possession, who enters casually or temporarily."

Brewer v. Fleming, 51 Pa. 102.

If we had been suing to recover the royalty, it would have been necessary under the ruling of Clement v. Wright, 40 Pa. 250, to show title, not for the purpose of trying it but to show the constructive possession which flows from it. It was therefore clearly competent to defend a suit by showing our title and possession.

But it is said the question should have been submitted to the jury. There was nothing for the jury to pass upon. The plaintiffs never had possession and showed no title. Baer's entry under the Grim lease was a trespass. If they have a title to the iron ore, they must bring ejectment and get its value in the form of mesne profits.

Per Curiam:

It is true there is a class of cases in which a third person may maintain an action on a promise made to another. Hence, it has been held if one deliver money or personal property to another, under the promise of the latter to deliver it over to a third person who has a beneficial interest therein, or to convert it into money and pay him the proceeds, the third person may maintain an action therefor against the promisor. Wynn v. Wood, 97 Pa. 216.

That, however, is for a breach of the contract, according to its terms. Here the attempt is to maintain an action on a conditional contract, according to the terms of which, and under the unquestioned facts, the defendant is not liable to any person. There was, therefore, no error in giving binding instructions to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

Cephas GEHR et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
Amanda MILLER et al.

One verdict and judgment in ejectment, obtained on the ground of the relationship of the successful party to the person last seised, is not a bar to a subsequent ejectment by the unsuccessful party, or conclusive evidence of the fact of relationship.

(Argued March 4, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 19, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiffs in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before ERMENTROUT, J., were as follows:

Catharine Gehr died in 1877, intestate, unmarried and without issue, seised of a tract of 231 acres of land situate in Maxatawny Township, Berks County. Her next of kin surviving her, of the blood of her father, the first purchaser, were Baltzer Gehr, of Crawford County, nephew and namesake of her grandfather, Baltzer Gehr of Berks County, and Hannah Nicely and Maria Rothermel, nieces of her grandmother. Her real estate descended to these three persons, related to her in the same degree.

Hannah Nicely and Maria Rothermel died shortly after Catharine Gehr; and their representatives took possession of the tract of land and denied the relationship of Baltzer Gehr. In order to establish the relationship, Baltzer Gehr brought ejectment against the Nicely and Rothermel representatives. The sole question in the suit was whether the plaintiff, Baltzer Gehr, of Crawford County, was the nephew of Baltzer Gehr of Berks County, as he claimed to be. The verdict and judgment established the relationship (Sitler v. Gehr, 105 Pa. 604), and put the plaintiff in possession of an undivided one third of the land.

The Nicely and Rothermel representatives thereupon brought an ejectment against the heirs of Baltzer Gehr (who had in the meantime died), for the same undivided third, and on the trial proved their relationship. The defendants then offered the record of the former ejectment, accompanied by the charge of the court, for the purpose of showing that the verdict and judgment in that case established the fact that Baltzer Gehr of Berks County was the uncle of Baltzer Gehr of Crawford County, as conclusive of that fact between the same parties in the pending action. The court admitted the record, simply as persuasive evidence in a second ejectment, but refused to permit the plaintiffs to show the main point of their offer, namely: that the fact of Baltzer Gehr's relationship was established by the former proceeding between the same parties.

Upon discharging a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted the court below filed the following opinion:

"Neither plaintiffs nor defendants filed any exceptions to the charge of the court. The previous verdict and judgment were competent evidence, and the effect of this verdict of the jury as 'persuasive evidence' was correctly stated in the charge. During the course of the trial it was repeatedly stated to the jury that by the previous verdict the jury then trying found from the evidence then given that Baltzer Gehr of Berks County was the uncle of Baltzer Gehr of Crawford County. We see no reason why the parties plaintiffs to this action are concluded from denying the fact of such alleged relationship, or producing evidence to show that such relationship did not exist. We do not see how the former charge of the court was admissible for such purpose, or how it could have such an effect.

"It is the province of the jury and not of the court to pass upon and settle the weight of testimony and credibility of witnesses. Under the testimony submitted the jury found that the alleged relationship between Baltzer Gehr of Berks, and Baltzer Gehr of Crawford County, had no existence.

"We do not consider it right to disturb their finding."

The assignment of error specified the rejection of the defendant's offer (the record of the former ejectment having previously been admitted in evidence) to prove, by the charge of the court in the former ejectment, that the verdict and judgment in the case establish the fact that Baltzer Gehr of Berks County was the uncle of Baltzer Gehr of Crawford County, whereby the parties to this action are concluded from denying that fact in this proceeding.

Messrs. John F. Smith, Isaac Hister, and Humes & Frey, for plaintiffs in error:

Whenever ejectment is a substitute for another form of action, one verdict and judgment have the same conclusive effects as would follow a final decree in such other action.

One verdict and judgment are conclusive in equitable ejectment, because that ejectment is merely a substitute for a bill in equity which would be conclusive.

The plaintiff having a remedy, either by bill in equity or by ejectment, cannot by the selection of his remedy have one or two chances of recovery at his option. If he select ejectment, it will simply be regarded as a substitute for the other form of action.

Seitzinger v. Ridgway, 9 Watts, 496; Peterman v. Huling, 31 Pa. 433; Meyers v. Hill, 46 Pa. 11; Trefts v. Pitts, 74 Pa. 343; Winpenny v. Winpenny, 92 Pa. 440.

It cannot be said that the conclusiveness of one equitable ejectment depends upon the fact that originally we had no separate court with chancery powers, and that therefore a plaintiff invoking the equitable powers of the court, was of necessity driven to ejectment. If that were the true reasoning, the effect of investing our courts with separate equity powers would have been to take away the conclusive effect of one equitable ejectment.

Church v. Ruland, 64 Pa. 440.

A controversy which involves the relationship of parties claiming real estate, as next of kin to a decedent, is determinable either in ejectment or upon an inquiry in the orphans' court on a petition for partition.

The orphans' court is by statute clothed with authority to distribute the estates of decedents. Among the persons entitled to the same, and by these terms are embraced, creditors, heirs, next of kin, and legatees.

Kittera's Est. 17 Pa. 416; Ashford v. Ewing, 25 Pa. 213.

The orphans' court has authority to determine the title of contesting parties as an incident of distribution.

After a partition proceeding erroneously instituted, ejectment cannot be maintained.

Seider v. Seider, 5 Whart. 222.

Even parties claiming as widow and heirs of a decedent cannot maintain ejectment against each other, but must in the first instance resort to partition in the orphans' court or in the concurrent jurisdiction of the common pleas.

Gourley v. Kinley, 66 Pa. 270.

It follows that as the ejectment involved simply the relationship of the plaintiff to the decedent, one verdict and judgment are conclusive of that controversy between the parties, and that the plaintiff is entitled to an undisturbed partition with his coheirs.

It was proper for the defendant to put in evidence the charge of the court in the former ejectment, for the purpose of showing on what point the case was decided.

Meyers v. Hill, 46 Pa. 9; Trefts v. Pitts, 74 Pa. 343.

The Act of Assembly of 1807, providing that two verdicts shall settle the right, has nothing to do with this contention, because only applicable to that class of cases wherein ejectment is purely a possessory action; and not where it is a substitute for another method of trial.

The question here raised was long since settled in Mehaffy v. Dobbs, 9 Watts, 363.

If a party having no title under the Intestate Act petition for an inquest, his allegation of title as a tenant in common, if disputed, must be first established by ejectment in the common pleas; but if admitted, the decree founded on it is conclusive.

Herr v. Herr, 5 Pa. 428.

From these authorities it is evident that Baltzer Gehr could not apply to the orphans' court to have a disputed question of relationship determined. His only remedy was a common-law action of ejectment, in which, under the statute, two verdicts are necessary to settle the title. The reason why one verdict is conclusive in an equitable ejectment is that the question to be decided by it arises out of a contract relation between the parties or their privies. In all other cases to establish a complete title to land, two concurrent verdicts are necessary.

Per Curiam:

This being an action of ejectment, one verdict and judgment thereon is not conclusive on the parties. It was not brought on a legal title to enforce specific performance of a contract. It therefore has not the legal incidents pertaining thereto. It follows the plaintiffs below were not precluded in this case, from controverting the evidence on which a recovery was had in the former trial.

Judgment affirmed.

Jonathan HORN, Admr. of George Buck,
Deceased, Plff. in Err.,
v.
James Monroe BUCK.

In assumpsit by an executor for the unpaid balance of purchase money of land conveyed by the testator to his son, the question whether the son was to pay the full money consideration mentioned in the deed or was to have the land partly as a gift, is a question for the jury.

(Argued March 2, Decided March 14, 1887.)

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

The facts as they appear at the trial in the court below were stated in the charge to the jury, which was as follows:

"This action is brought by Jonathan Horn, administrator of George Buck, deceased, against James M. Buck, to recover from him the purchase money of a farm, for which a deed was given on the first of April, 1881, to the said George Buck, for the sum of $5,818.44.

"The evidence discloses that in 1879 the defendant James Buck, came to Jacob A. Fister, who was then a justice of the peace in Albany Township, requesting him to draw a deed from his father, George Buck, to himself, for the farm on which they were then living, at the rate of some $45 an acre.

"Such a deed was drawn, and was taken by Fister over to old Mr. Buck, and there are two different statements in regard to what occurred there. Fister stated that the old man said he was not ready to sign the deed yet; there was no bond or mortgage there. The daughter says that the old gentleman declined to sign it because he said it was too dark. At all events it was not signed at that time. The matter was then postponed, and it was not until the first of April, 1881, when James M. Buck, the defendant, came to Fister and told him that they were now ready to have the deed executed. They went over to see the old man, and then some conversation took place between the old man and the young man in the presence of Fister. Fister saw no money on that occasion, nor is it claimed upon the part of the defendant that the money was paid down at that time. It seems that there was a claim of one Beaver, from Kutztown, a judgment of some $697, away back in June, 1876. Precisely what took place in the conversation between the old gentleman and James is not very definitely sworn to except as to a part of it; but the young man said if the deed was fixed, he could raise the money to pay the claim, and if it was not fixed the sheriff would come. Then the old gentleman said: 'If that is so it must be fixed;' and the deed was then signed.

"This is the testimony given by Mr. Fister, and from this the plaintiff claims that there was no money paid, and that the son was bound to pay the consideration money of this property at some future time. He gives in evidence, as a matter of corroboration, the judgment which was held by Joshua Beaver against George Buck, of what is known as June Term, 1876, for $697.40. That judgment was satisfied on the 8th of April, 1881, shortly after this deed was given. There was a mortgage given on the 5th of April, 1881, by James Buck, the son, to Jeremiah S. Trexler, of Kutztown, for $900. It is claimed upon the part of the plaintiff that the proceeds from the mortgage went to pay the judgment of Beaver's. Now that is not all the testimony that is submitted upon the part of the plaintiff to show that the defendant in this case is responsible for the consideration money of that deed. He gave in evidence the inventory that was taken after the old man's death, which showed an estate of only $5.63; in other words, that the old gentleman left no estate. He claims that there were no other debts, which he knew of, that the old gentleman owed, and that there was no other money paid by the defendant except the $900, which it was necessary to raise for the purpose of paying off the claim of Beaver.

"The defendant presents as it were two grounds of defense: the first is that he has actually paid for this land, the payments running through a number of years. His daughter, Isabella, was present when the deed was signed, as she is one of the witnesses to the deed; and she states that at that time her grandfather said: 'Now this land belongs to you. Now take care of it. You have paid more than this.' She says her grandfather had a book. Her father had paid him money some three or four times that she had seen. They had a settlement together a few days after this deed had been executed, and the old gentleman's remark at that time was: 'Now you take care of this land. You have paid more than this for it,' and that the book with other papers was thrown into the fire and burned after that. That is her statement in regard to it.

"William Miller was called. He says: 'I knew George Buck, the father of the defendant. Soon after the defendant had bought the property he said I should buy a piece of this land from Monroe, that the land was his and he could pay what he owed Beaver. I knew that Monroe had bought half a year, or a year, or a month after Monroe had bought the property. I bought from Monroe and paid him cash for it. I bought and paid him $1,000.'

"Now this was offered for the purpose of showing that the old gentleman said to William Miller that the land was his son's, and that the son still owed some debts or had some obligations to pay, and that by his purchasing this property, the son could 'pay off his indebtedness.' Daniel Miller, who was the brother-in-law of the defendant, and who was the administrator of his father, says that he paid sone $1,700 to Buck's wife, who was his sister, less $500, which had been advanced previously. This was offered for the purpose of showing that there was money in the possession of the son and his wife, from which they could have made advancements to the old gentleman.

["Maria Wharton was also examined. She says that she knew George Buck, that is the old gentleman; saw him often about a year before he died, and had a talk about the farm. He said Monroe had bought the farm. He did not say what he paid. He said he gave it to them, it was all their's. Now that testimony is offered for the purpose of showing that the old gentleman gave the farm to the son and that the deed was the conveyance of a gift. That is, it gave the title by giving the deed and the possession of the property; that it was a gift of this property to his son.]

"John Kemp was called, who was once tax collector, and he said he had a talk with the old gentleman about the tax, and the old gentleman said to him that he had sold to Monroe.

"Rebecca Miller was examined. She says that she knew the old man, and had heard him say: 'I gave my house to Monroe;' and that he was to pay his debts, and if he did not take care of it he could not help it. He always said it was his. He said Monroe had to pay his debts.

"Now that is all that there is in this case. You start with this deed. [There is a receipt in the deed acknowledging the receipt of the consideration money of this property. That, in the first instance, would be regarded as proof that the money had been paid, or if not paid, that the party had actually given the property and made use of this deed as the means of effecting that gift.] Then you have the testimony of the others to whom I have referred, the daughter, and these other witnesses whose testimony I have read to you, and you are to consider the whole evidence and find this fact: Did Monroe pay for this property? Has the plaintiff shown you such evidence as would induce the jury to believe, that at that time when this property was conveyed to Monroe the old man intended this as a sale of the property, for the full consideration mentioned in this deed, and taking into consideration the other evidence, the evidence of Fister, was that to be paid by Monroe?

["Or, taking into consideration the other evidence in the cause, did the old man give this property to Monroe by this deed? Did he intend it, beyond the payment of his debts, as a gift to Monroe? Now just as you find these facts, so your verdict will be. If you find that Monroe was to pay the full consideration as mentioned in this deed, and if you find that he did not pay it, then for such sum as he did not pay the plaintiff will be entitled to a verdict with interest from the first day of April, 1881. On the question whether the old gentleman intended that Monroe should pay his debts, and that through this deed this property should be given to Monroe, you will take into account all the evidence to which I have referred, and any other evidence in the case which the jury will remember, to which I have not referred. If you find that the old gentleman intended to give this property to his son, James M. Buck, then your verdict will be in favor of the defendant."]

Verdict and judgment were for the defendant.

The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. D. N. Schaeffer and Geo. F. Baer, for plaintiff in error:

The consideration mentioned in the deed, as already stated, is a money consideration. Mrs. Wharton's testimony was not offered to show that this money consideration mentioned in the deed was a mistake, and that the old gentleman intended that the conveyance should be for another consideration, nor does her testimony warrant any such instruction.

The court had no right to instruct the jury, because she testified that the old gentleman said that the property belonged to Monroe, that they could find that the conveyance was a gift of the farm to the son. If any part of the consideration in the deed was for natural love and affection, that could have been shown by parol evidence. But the defendant offered no such testimony. He, however, could not show by parol evidence that there was no consideration of money, as that would be in direct contradiction of the deed.

Hayden v. Mentzer, 10 Serg. & R. 333; Lewis v. Brewster, 57 Pa. 410; Buckley's App. 48 Pa. 491; Taylor v. Preston, 79 Pa. 436.

A receipt in a deed can only be either an acknowledgment of the payment of the consideration, or, after being varied or explained, the passing of a gift. It cannot be both. It must be the one or the other. A receipt is, like any other parol admission by the party, open to contradiction, explanation or correction. It may be shown that it was given under a mistake, either of fact or law.

Moore v. Commonwealth, 8 Pa. 260; Bell v. Bell, 12 Pa. 235; Russell v. First Presb. Church, 65 Pa. 15.

The same liberty extends to receipts indorsed in deeds.

Whart. Ev. § 1065.

The court should therefore have instructed the jury that the receipt was only an acknowledgment of the payment of the money therein stated; and that having been rebutted by the plaintiff, the court should not have instructed them, without proof contradicting or explaining its contents, that they could also find that it was evidence of a gift of the property to the son.

Messrs. J. H. Marx and Garrett B. Stevens, for defendant in error:

A conveyance made by deed of bargain and sale, although purporting to be for a consideration of money, may be shown to have been in part thereof intended and given as a present from father to son. Such evidence would be in necessary contradiction of the deed.

Hayden v. Mentzer, 10 Serg. & R. 333, decides merely that one cannot show that there was no consideration of money, as that would annul the deed. Such would, however, not be the case where the consideration proved is merely different from the one expressed in the deed.

See also Jack v. Dougherty, 3 Watts, 151.

In Lewis v. Brewster, 57 Pa. 410, the consideration expressed in the deed, was $300. The grantee was permitted to show that there was no money paid, that it was a gift to her, a daughter-in-law. The court said: "Evidence may be given of a consideration not mentioned in a deed, provided it be not inconsistent with the consideration expressed in it. If the deed appears to be a voluntary conveyance, a valuable consideration may be proved by parol. And there seems to be no reason why what appears to be a valuable consideration should not be proved by parol to be a gift for a good consideration."

It is always esteemed unfair to select a single sentence or two in a charge and insist on it as error, without reference to other portions which explain its meaning and exhibit its bearing. We must look at the state of the case before the jury to determine its effect.

Watts v. Cummins, 59 Pa. 88.

It is neither analysis nor criticism, but rude surgery—mere amputation.

Reeves v. Delaware etc. R. R. Co. 30 Pa. 454.

It would be treating the courts of common pleas and their suitors with great unfairness if we should take a detached sentence without reference to other parts of the charge, and the testimony in the case.

Kerr v. Sharp, 14 Serg. & R. 399; Carothers v. Dunning, 3 Serg. & R. 373.

The court is responsible for the general effect of the charge, on the minds of the jury; and this is to be judged of, not by sentences culled here and there, but by salient points of the charge, and the thoughts that permeate it through and through. If as a whole the charge was calculated to mislead the jury, there is error on the record; if not, there is none.

Reeves v. Delaware etc. R. R. Co. 30 Pa. 454.

Per Curiam:

The uncontradicted evidence is that the defendant paid no money to his father at the time the deed was executed. The contention is whether he was to pay the full consideration mentioned thereafter, or was the land a gift to the son. This is purely a question of fact for the jury, to which it was properly submitted.

Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL of Salmon B. ROWLEY et al.

1. In an action to compel a company defendant to recognize plaintiff as a stockholder, and to give him a certificate for stock subscribed for by him, an answer by a defendant who is president of the company that plaintiff agreed that his subscription should be for the use and benefit of said defendant and that he would transfer the same to him and that plaintiff was never the real owner of any shares, is responsive to the bill.
2. An affidavit by such defendant that the statements made in the charter of the company was true, annexed to such charter which contained plaintiff's name as a subscriber and stated the number of shares subscribed for by him, is sufficient corroboration of plaintiff's testimony to overcome the answer.
3. The charter itself, as against him who made oath that the statements therein are true, is written evidence of a high character to repel an allegation which is irreconcilable with those statements.

(Argued Jan. 10, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 168, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Common Pleas No. 2 of Philadelphia County, in favor of complainant in a bill in equity to enforce recognition of complainant as a stockholder in respondent corporation. Affirmed.

Bill in equity filed by William Tillyer against Salmon B. Rowley, Francis W. Kennedy and the Hero Fruit Jar Company. Heard on bill, answer, replication and proofs taken by a master.

The facts appear from the following opinion by MITCHELL, J.:

The bill sets out the incorporation of the respondent company; that complainant was one of the original corporators and subscribed for 100 shares of stock; that he has tendered the amount of the subscription already due, and is ready and willing to pay the rest; and that in violation of his rights respondents refuse to receive his subscription and issue his stock. The bill also set out that complainant was a director and was excluded from his proper rights to examine the books, etc. This part of the bill, however, is not now pressed, as the term for which complainant was elected a director has expired since the bill was filed.

The three respondents filed separate answers, that of Kennedy disclaiming any interest in the suit and any personal knowledge of the plaintiff's title to the stock claimed. The answer of the other respondents, the Company by Rowley as president, and Rowley for himself, are in substance the same. They do not deny that complainant was an original subscriber to stock, but set up an agreement with Rowley, Kennedy, and four others (among whom complainant is inferentially included, for it is not in any place categorically averred that he was one of the four), by which the whole of the stock was to belong to Kennedy and Rowley, who were to be the Company, and the other four were to be mere figure heads, without any rights of their own, and put up merely to make an apparent compliance with the requirements of the statute under which the Company was to be incorporated.

The case having gone to an examiner, the complainant put in evidence the charter of the Company, and testified to the facts substantially as set forth in his bill, and also explicitly denied being a party to or having any knowledge of the agreement set up in the answers. The respondents offered no testimony, but rested on their answers.

Upon the case, as thus presented, we find the following facts: the complainant was a subscriber to 100 shares of stock in his own name and his own right; that he has tendered the amount of his subscription due at the time of filing his bill, and therefore that, upon payment of that installment and anything that may become due since the filing of this bill, he will be entitled to a certificate or other proper evidence of his ownership of the stock, and all the other rights of a stockholder.

1. The complainant's case is made out prima facie by his testimony. The answers do not deny the facts of subscription, tender, etc., as averred in the bill, but set up a certain agreement between complainant and others which alters complainant's rights, as they would be on the facts on the bill. It is not, therefore, a denial by answer responsive to the bill, entitled to the weight of such answer in equity, but new matter in confession and avoidance, putting the burden of proof of the agreement on those averring it.

2. Even if the answer should be treated as a denial responsive to the bill, we think the complainant's testimony is supported by such corroborative evidence as to overcome the answer even under the strictest rules of equity practice.

The certificate of association for the purpose of obtaining a corporate charter sets forth, inter alia, that, "The undersigned, having associated themselves together for the purpose of manufacturing and selling glass," etc., "and desiring that they may be incorporated," etc., "do certify * * * that the names and residences of the subscribers and the number of shares subscribed by each are as follows: * * * William Tillyer, 100 shares."

This certificate was signed by six subscribers, including the respondents, Rowley and

Kennedy, three of whom, again including the respondents, Rowley and Kennedy, made affidavit before the recorder of deeds "that the statements made in the foregoing instrument are true."

This was a statement under oath by the respondents, in a solemn instrument required by law for the purpose of obtaining a charter. The Governor's order was based upon it, and recites that "Having examined the within application and found it to be in proper form," etc., he directs letters patent to be issued thereon according to law.

We regard this as ample corroboration of the facts, as they are set out in the bill and testified to by the complainant.

3. So far we have considered the answers as they stand, but we are also of opinion that the defense set up by them, even if clearly made out, could not be permitted in a court of equity. The Act of April 29, 1874, grants certain privileges to five or more persons associated for any of the purposes named in the Act; and the certificate of the respondents already referred to sets forth the names, etc., of six persons as actually associated for the formation of the defendant corporation. The answers aver boldly that this was done "in order to comply with the requirements of the Act of Assembly," and go on to say that complainant (and the three others in like situation) "had no right or interest in the said shares" subscribed for, and "simply consented to the use of his name." The use of his name for what? To make a sham compliance with the requirements of the Act.

This defense, if true, was a plain fraud on the law. If the facts as now alleged by the respondents had been truly set forth in their application, the Governor would not have granted them a charter. By joining in an application which set forth the complainant and others as corporators according to law, the respondents estopped themselves from contesting the truth of that fact.

It is of no avail to say that many corporations are formed where a few leading corporators hold practically the whole stock. The law does not fix the amount of stock which each must hold, but it does fix explicitly the number who shall unite in the association. By the Act of May 13, 1876, three persons may form a banking company; by the Act of May 1, of the same year, it requires ten to form an insurance company. The Act of 1874, under which defendant company was chartered, requires five.

It is not for the court, still less for these respondents, to say that these requirements are mere formalities, and that a mere nominal compliance will be sufficient. The law fixes the number plainly and imperatively, and although the interest of some of them may be small, it must be real. Even, therefore, if the agreement set up in the answers were fully proved, the respondents could not be permitted, against the policy of the law, to make it available as a defense.

On each of the above grounds there must be decree for the complainant.

And now, April 25, 1885, this cause came on to be heard on bill, answer, replication, and proofs, and was argued by counsel; whereupon, on consideration by the court, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows:

1. That the said Hero Fruit Jar Company, defendant, be required to receive from the plaintiff the sum of $2,000, and to execute and deliver to him a certificate or other proper evidence of his ownership of 100 shares of the stock of the said Company, and the said payment to be made and received as an installment of 20 per cent on the said 100 shares of stock subscribed for by the plaintiff, and mentioned in the bill, said amount to be paid to and received by the said Francis W. Kennedy, or whoever may now be treasurer of said Company defendant.

2. That the said Hero Fruit Jar Company, and the said Salmon B. Rowley, president, and Francis W. Kennedy, treasurer thereof, and the officers, agents, and employees of the same be, and they hereby are enjoined and perpetually restrained from refusing to recognize the plaintiff as the owner of said 100 shares of stock in said Corporation, and from refusing to pay him any dividends which may have been heretofore, or may hereafter be declared thereon, and from interfering with his rights and privileges as such owner, in any way whatsoever.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court:

1. In finding that the complainant was a subscriber to 100 shares of stock in his own name and in his own right.

2. In finding that the answers of the defendants the Hero Fruit Jar Company and S. B. Rowley were not responsive to the bill.

3. In finding that the complainant's testimony was supported by such corroborative evidence as to overcome the effect of the answer.

4. In finding that the certificate of incorporation was ample corroboration of the statements contained in plaintiff's bill.

5. In holding that the transaction stated in defendant's answers was a fraud in the law.

6. In directing the defendant, the Hero Fruit Jar Company, to receive from the plaintiff the sum of $2,000, and to execute and deliver to him a certificate or other proper evidence of his ownership of 100 shares of the stock of said Company, said payment to be made and received as an installment of 20 per cent on the said 100 shares of stock subscribed for by plaintiff.

7. In directing the defendants to recognize the plaintiff as the owner of 100 shares of stock, and to pay him such dividends as may be declared thereon.

8. In not dismissing the plaintiff's bill with costs.

Messrs. John G. Johnson and Samuel Dickson, for appellants:

An answer which is limited to stating the whole transaction is as truly responsive as one which is limited to a categorical denial of the plaintiff's averments.

Eaton's App. 66 Pa. 483; Cresson's App. 91 Pa. 168; Burke's App. 99 Pa. 350; Audenreid's App. 89 Pa. 114; Campbell v. Patterson, 95 Pa. 447.

There is nothing in the transactions stated in the defendant's answers which is contrary to public policy.

The defendants do not deny that six persons associated themselves together to form a corporation, the Hero Fruit Jar Company, under the provisions of the Act of April 29, 1874, and that each one of the six is liable to the full extent of his subscription, and that in all matters relating to the relations of the Corporation to the Commonwealth, and to creditors and other persons dealing with the Corporation, the defendants are estopped from denying the relations established by the certificate of incorporation; but in the present case the Commonwealth, creditors and parties dealing with the Corporation, upon the faith of the articles, are not interested. The question simply is whether, as between the parties themselves, any agreement which affects no persons other than themselves shall be enforced according to its terms, or whether the plaintiff, under a plea that an agreement which he has made is a fraud upon the statute, shall obtain the aid of a court of equity to enforce a right which only finds its existence in the repudiation of the solemn agreement of the parties. It cannot be pretended that Rowley could not have purchased Tillyer's stock after the Company was organized; and if so, how is any public policy infringed by enforcing an antecedent contract to sell?

Messrs. Geo. Tucker Bispham and Wayne MacVeagh, for appellee:

I. It will be seen from the decisions that when the plaintiff in his bill alleges the existence of certain facts, everything in the answer is responsive which denies or otherwise calls in question those facts.

Eaton's App. 66 Pa. 483; Cresson's App. 91 Pa. 168; Burke's App. 99 Pa. 350; Eberly v. Groff, 21 Pa. 251; Pusey v. Wright, 31 Pa. 387.

The decisions are not authority for the position that when a plaintiff states his case upon certain facts, the defendant may obtain the advantage of a responsive answer by alleging the existence of other facts, and connecting them with the facts averred by the plaintiff merely by the statement that they are part of the transaction to which the plaintiff in his bill refers.

II. But it is not at all necessary to the appellee's case to rely upon the above position that the answers are not responsive. Even though their responsiveness be conceded, still the testimony of the appellee, abundantly supported as it is by corroborative circumstances, must prevail.

III. The vice of appellants' argument is that it first assumes the existence of the agreement, and then affirms that the appellee attempts to repudiate it. But the fact is the alleged agreement had no existence, excepting so far as it is possible to establish it by the answers. The bill ignored it, and the testimony of the appellee denied it. The bold demand of these appellants, then, is, after acknowledging themselves parties to a fraud, that they be permitted to establish by their testimony the fact of the fraud, in order to avail themselves of the benefit of it, as a defense to an honest and legitimate claim of the appellee. They practically concede the righteousness of the appellee's demand by their assertion that "each one of the six is liable to the full amount of his subscription;" for it is elementary corporation law that when the corporation may enforce the subscription, the subscriber has a right to his shares; this right of the subscriber constituting in the main the consideration by virtue of which the corporation may enforce his subscription.

Taylor, Corp. § 40, note.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill sets forth, among other things, that the capital stock of the company consists of 5,000 shares of the par value of $100 each; that the plaintiff as one of the original stockholders, subscribed for 100 shares, and that the defendants have refused to give him a certificate and have confederated to deprive him of his rights as a shareholder.

With reference to that, in the answer, Rowley denies that the plaintiff was ever the real owner of any shares, and says that the plaintiff consented to the use of his name as subscriber for 100 shares of stock under an agreement that upon demand he would transfer and assign the same to said Rowley as the true and equitable owner, which he has since refused to do.

The answer shows that at the time the plaintiff subscribed he agreed that his subscription should be for the sole benefit of Rowley. Admitting the act of subscribing, it declares that the act was accompanied with an agreement that the subscription was wholly for the use of one of the defendants. This is not subsequent matter alleged in avoidance; if true, it is a material portion of the facts in the case of the plaintiff, which he accidently omitted. We think the answer is responsive. Eaton's App. 66 Pa. 483; Burke's App. 99 Pa. 350.

We are of opinion that the learned judge of the common pleas rightly ruled that "The complainant's testimony is supported by such corroborative evidence as to overcome the answer, even under the strictest rules of equity practice."

In pursuance of the statute, the charter of the intended Corporation was subscribed by six persons, and in it were written the names and residences and the number of shares subscribed by each, and the number and names of the directors for the first year. Rowley, Francis W. Kennedy and Henry H. Kennedy deposed that the statements made in the charter are true. How could they have made the affidavit if they knew or believed that four of the persons were not good faith subscribers, that in fact Rowley and F. W. Kennedy owned the entire stock, and that three of the five directors named owned no stock and had no interest in the Corporation.

The charter, with the requisite affidavit, is in evidence. That oath was essential in obtaining the charter. The statements, acknowledgments and affidavit, prescribed by law, are not formal and idle. Although the burden is on the plaintiff, the testimony of one witness has corroboration fully equal to the testimony of another. Indeed, the stronger evidence is the charter itself. As against him who made oath that the statements therein are true, it is writen evidence of high character, to repel an allegation which is irreconcilable with those statements.

It being determined that the plaintiff is a stockholder as alleged in the bill, we express no opinion on the question raised in the fifth assignment of error.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at costs of appellant.

PHŒNIX IRON CO. et al., Pffs. in Err.,
v.
Lawrence LEWIS et al.

1. In an action of ejectment to recover possession of the underlying mineral ore, from the owner of the surface, the defendant claimed title to the ore under a release alleged to have been executed by a former owner of the mineral right to a former owner of the surface, nearly forty years before suit brought, and lost or destroyed. Held, on the facts of the case, that secondary evidence offered to prove the contents of such instrument was properly rejected.
2. Where the plaintiff in ejectment for unmined mineral ore shows title to the mineral right, the fact that defendant, who is entitled to the surface, has been in possession of the land for any length of time, without taking possession of the mineral by mining it, cannot constitute an adverse possession in his favor as against the owner of the mineral right.

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiffs in an action of ejectment to recover possession of iron ore in a tract of land in possession of defendants. Affirmed.

This action was brought by Lawrence Lewis and others against the Phœnix Iron Company, Daniel K. Hagy and others. The plaintiffs at the trial in the court below, before HAGENMANN, J., offered in evidence a deed dated December 7, 1772, from Thomas Rutter and wife and Samuel Potts and wife, to Henry Stauffer, which conveyed the premises of which the tract in question is a part, reserving to the grantors the iron ore contained in said tract. Plaintiffs showed title, by divers mesne conveyances and descents cast from said Rutter and Potts, to the entire ore reserved in such tract of land including the ore under the tract in controversy. Defendants showed a clear title by divers mesne conveyances from Henry Stauffer, to the surface of this tract of land and claimed title to the underlying ore under the following alleged facts:

In 1847, when Robert M. Lewis and Lawrence Lewis were the owners of the mineral reserve, and Henry Boyer was the owner of the surface of the land, the former, as alleged by defendants, released the mineral reserve for valuable consideration to said Boyer. March 1, 1854, Boyer, being then the owner of the surface and minerals made a lease of the surface and iron ore for twenty-eight years and nine months to one Buck who, February 2, 1857, assigned the same to the Phœnix Iron Company.

In 1857 Henry Boyer died, and in the following year his executors, acting under the direction of his will, sold the tract of land in question and assigned the lease made to Buck to Daniel B. Boyer and Charles Hagy. In 1868 Daniel B. Boyer sold his interest in the tract to Charles Hagy. In 1875 said Hagy died, leaving a widow and children, defendants in this suit, who in July, 1883, renewed the lease with the Phœnix Iron Company for thirty years from the date of its expiration.

The lease from Henry Boyer to Robert S. Buck was duly recorded in Berks County, as was also the lease from the Hagy heirs to the Phœnix Iron Company. During the entire period covered by these leases, the tract has been assessed for taxation, exclusively, to Henry Boyer and his successors, including the Hagys.

Defendants further allege that after the death of Charles Hagy, the title papers of the tract, comprising the deeds of Charles Hagy and the alleged release of the mineral reserve given by the Lewises to Boyer and the lease from Boyer to Buck, were left with Levi Koons, a justice of the peace of Boyertown, Berks County, where the mines are situated, Koons being the agent of the Hagy heirs for the collection of the royalty on the lease for the ore mined by the Phœnix Iron Company.

Koons died September 25, 1882; and upon searching for the title papers of defendants in this action, the only paper which could be found was the lease from Henry Boyer to Buck.

It was admitted that defendants had been in possession of the surface of the whole tract since 1847, but denied that they had mined any coal out of the bed in question, except just previous to the commencement of this suit.

The defendants offered to prove by Walton K. Hagy, one of the defendants, that he saw a release, signed, or purporting to be signed and sealed, by Robert Lewis and Lawrence Lewis, dated about the year 1847; that he saw the paper last with the title papers of this ore tract at Boyertown in the month of July, 1882; that the papers, that is to say, the deed from the executors of Henry Boyer to Charles Hagy and Daniel Boyer, the lease which is in evidence, and the said release were then in the possession of Levi Koons, who was at the time the agent of the heirs of Charles Hagy to collect the royalty accruing upon the lease of the mineral tract in suit here, from the Phœnix Iron Company, one of these defendants and the lessee of the Hagys; that Levi Koons died in the month of September, 1882, and that the witness called upon the widow of the said Levi Koons for the papers and caused a thorough search for them to be made; and that the deed and the release, together with some papers belonging to other third parties, were not to be found; and that the only paper which he received was the lease which has been offered in evidence; this to be followed with the evidence of other witnesses in proof of the same facts.

The plaintiffs objected: 1, because the witness is incompetent, being a party to the record and in interest, and Lawrence Lewis and Robert Lewis, the persons named, being dead, and their heirs at law and devisees being plaintiffs in this action; 2, before the loss of a deed can be shown and secondary evidence of its contents offered, there must be previous proof of its due execution, which includes proof of its delivery; 3, that since the passage of the Act of 1866, whereby the Acts of 1793 and the Act of 1786, have been made perpetual, the evidence of lost deeds and their contents must be obtained and given in accordance with those Acts; and that this is exclusive of all other ways, because it is the best evidence.

The Court: Counsel for defendants asks the court to make a ruling upon the offer as presented as a whole; as a whole it is overruled, and exception noted for defendants. First assignment of error.

The defendants offered to prove by Harriet Koons that she is the widow of Levi M. Koons, late of Boyertown, Berks County; that he died in September, 1882; that immediately before his death, and at the time of his death, he was the agent of the Hagy heirs, the defendants in this suit with the Phœnix Iron Company, for the collection of rent or royalty accruing upon a lease of the minerals or iron ore on the tract in dispute in this case, said lease having been made by Henry Boyer to Robert S. Buck, March 1, 1854, it being in proof in this case that the rights thereunder have devolved upon the Phœnix Iron Company as assignee of the lessee, and the Hagys as assignees of the reversion; that the title papers of the Hagys to the mineral tract in dispute here were in the possession of her said husband as their said agent; that among the title papers was a release, old in appearance, and dated in 1847, and signed and sealed by Robert Lewis and Lawrence Lewis by which release the said Robert Lewis and Lawrence Lewis released and conveyed to Henry Boyer all their right, title and interest in the iron ore in the tract described in the writ in this case, and which right or interest to said iron ore had been reserved in a deed from Thomas Rutter and Samuel Potts to Henry Stauffer, in 1774; that the paper was without any erasure or alteration; that it was light blue in color; that it had the appearance of old age; that it was with the title papers of the Hagys; that she heard it read in the month of July, 1882, w en it was in the possession of her husband, ar that she personally read it, and from the rusal of it became acquainted with its c ents; to be followed with proof that in , Henry Boyer, the releasee, was the owne the land described in the writ, and that f the time of the execution of the release, enry Boyer and his assignees, up to this ti , have been in possession of the minerals in he tract described in the writ, and have leased the same, the same having been taken out and mined by their lessees, and they having paid the taxes on the same continually and exclusively during the entire period from the execution of the said release up to the present time.

Objected to by the plaintiffs: 1, because the witness is incompetent to testify as to the purpose for which the parties came there to see her husband. If what was said and done there is pertinent to the issue now trying, she might testify as to what was said and done, but she cannot testify as to the purpose of the parties who participated in that transaction; 2, it is proposed to prove by this witness that one of these papers was a release. Now, as to whether an instrument is a release, a bond or other legal instrument, is a matter of inference to be drawn from the language of the paper by the court, and not to be testified to by witnesses. The offer, therefore, is not to prove contents, or the language, or the language as near as the witness can recollect it, but to prove the legal effect and consequence of the paper; 3, it is proposed to prove that Robert Lewis and Lawrence Lewis executed the paper in question, by showing, by the witness, merely that the paper purported to be a paper signed by them, whose only knowledge as to the paper is, according to the statements in the offer itself, her having heard it read and having read it herself in July, 1882, after the decease of the parties who are said to have been designated therein, the relators, and in the absence of the plaintiffs in this case, and in the absence of all other persons whose acquiescence or consent might be held lawfully to be binding upon the plaintiffs; 4, there is no proof of the genuineness of the instrument which it is proposed to show that the witness saw; 5, the preliminary proof of loss and of search does not fulfill the requirements of the law and is not such as will warrant the court in admitting secondary evidence of the contents of the alleged paper in question, or pretended release; 6, that the testimony is generally incompetent, inadmissible and irrelevant.

The Court: It is not pretended by the defendants that the witness on the stand saw the execution of this instrument, nor does she know of its delivery, nor is she acquainted with the handwriting of the releasors.

Defendant's counsel: That is all true.

The Court: We will permit you to show by the witness what paper she saw there in July, 1882, of which you propose to prove the contents.

Defendant's counsel: The defendants desire to add to the offer that the release, the contents of which are now offered to be proved, is the same release testified to by Mrs. Koons as having been in the possession of her husband Levi M. Koons, together with a deed and a lease, and letters testamentary and a will, as the agent of the heirs of Charles Hagy, deceased; and we also propose to prove by her that she, having read the said release, as stated in our offer, recollects its contents.

The Court: The defendants request the court to give a ruling to their offer in the whole; as it stands, the offer is overruled, and exception noted for defendants. Second assignment of error.

The defendants offered in evidence a lease, dated the first day of July, 1852, between Robert M. Lewis and Lawrence Lewis, lessors, and David Reeves, Robert S. Buck, Samuel J. Reeves and R. C. Nicholls, recorded, etc., which lease refers to a plan or plot of lots embraced in the lease; and the lease itself states that it grants the right of the lessors to the minerals in the mines in Colebrookdale, Berks County, and the plot shows the lots in which they claim to have a mineral right in Colebrookdale.

Objected to by the plaintiffs: 1, because the evidence of a lease by the Messrs. Lewis, of mineral rights other than those which constitute the subject matter of this action, does not legally or logically prove or conduce to prove that they had no title in the ore which forms the subject matter of this action; 2, because it is generally irrelevant and incompetent.

Offer overruled; exception for defendants. Third assignment of error.

Defendants offered to prove that for the last thirty years and upwards the reputed ownership of the minerals in the lot described in the writ was in Henry Boyer and those claiming under him (that is, Charles Hagy and Daniel Boyer, and later Charles Hagy, and since his death his heirs) for the purpose of proving an element of adverse possession.

Plaintiffs objected: 1, because the offer does not prove an element of adverse possession; 2, because a reputation which may have been created by Henry Boyer as against the real owners of the minerals, who reside at a distance from the neighborhood, and may have been so created by design, cannot be used in a court of justice for the purpose of assailing the title of the rightful owner; 3, because the evidence of reputation of ownership is not competent testimony in this case as against the plaintiffs; 4, because it is generally irrelevant and incompetent.

Objection sustained; exception for defendants. Fourth assignment of error.

Defendants proposed to prove that the tract described in the writ was sold by the executors of Henry Boyer; and the announcement was made at the sale that it was clear of everything, that it was without any reservation of any kind, and that the whole thing, including the mineral, was sold.

Objected to by plaintiffs: 1, because the title which passed by executors' sale must be measured by the title which Henry Boyer owned at the time of his disease, and cannot be enlarged by anything that the executors of Henry Boyer may have said or done at the time of the sale of the property; 2, no declarations made by the executors, or their agent, or by any other person at the time of the sale of the said property, and in the absence of the ancestors of the plaintiffs, who then owned the mineral right, can be given in evidence as against the title of the plaintiffs; 3, the testimony is generally incompetent and irrelevant.

Offer overruled, and exception noted for defendants. Fifth assignment of error.

Defendants offered in evidence the deposition of Charles K. Hagy, taken on the 21st day of April, 1885, at the office of Charles VanWert, in the City of Minneapolis, and State of Minnesota, by a virtue of a commission issued from the Court of Common Pleas, of the County of Berks, to Charles VanWert, and on file in this case; offered for the purpose of showing that his father, Charles Hagy, and Daniel Boyer, and the heirs of Charles Hagy, were the owners of the minerals described in the writ, from 1858 up to this time, and that they have been in actual possession of the said minerals during that time—for the purpose of proving adverse possession.

The portion of the deposition relied on is the following: "The tract adjoins what is known as the old mine hole, in Boyertown, and from 1858 up to the time of my father's death, was in his possession, the mines being operated by his tenants during that period; he paid the taxes during that period; and since his death his heirs have been in possession by tenants and paid the taxes."

That part of the deposition offered was objected to by the plaintiffs: 1, because the testimony of the witness was not responsive to the questions which he was answering; the question did not indicate to the plaintiffs or give them any notice that such an answer would be made; and therefore it was impossible for the plaintiffs to frame a cross interrogatory in order to elicit the extent of the witness' knowledge of the matter concerning which he was testifying; 2, the testimony in itself indicates that the witness was not speaking from actual knowledge of the matter concerning which he was testifying; 3, it appearing that the witness had for a number of years been residing in a remote State, many hundreds of miles removed from the locality of the subject matter of this action, it is manifest that he can have no personal, actual knowledge concerning the matter to which he testifies; but that he must be testifying from hearsay, if his testimony has any foundation whatever; 4, the testimony is also objected to on the ground that the witness is an interested witness, and a party to the record, and therefore is incompetent to give the testimony in question; 5, the matter is generally irrelevant and incompetent.

Offer overruled; exception noted for defendants. Sixth assignment of error.

The defendants offered in evidence a deed, dated the 15th day of October, 1847, from Henry Boyer, of Boyertown, to Robert M. Lewis and Lawrence Lewis, both of the City of Philadelphia, recorded in deed book 54, p. 91, for 145 perches of land; consideration, $400.

To be followed with proof that this 154 perches is part of the tract which in 1801 was acquired by Henry Boyer.

The purpose of the offer is that the deed, from Henry Boyer to Robert Lewis and Lawrence Lewis, making no reference to any reservation of ore or mere surface right of Henry Boyer, but purporting to convey a fee simple to the lot and everything that it contains, is evidence tending to negative the claim of the plaintiffs that in 1847, Robert and Lawrence Lewis were the owners of a right to the ore in the tract contained in the deed, which is part of the Henry Boyer tract, the remainder being the land described in the writ.

Plaintiffs objected: 1, because the offer is irrelevant; 2, because under the terms of the deed of Stauffer to Rutter and Potts, September 24, 1774, Rutter and Potts and their heirs and assigns covenanted to pay and make good any damages to Stauffer, his heirs and assigns, which might at any time be caused by digging, searching for, or breaking the ground, or hauling away ore, should any be discovered, and the purchase from an assignee of the Stauffer title of the strip of ground referred to was not and could not be an admission of want of title in the purchasers to the iron ore, and is not inconsistent with the title shown by the plaintiffs, to wit: the title to the iron ore and minerals under the tract.

Offer overruled; exception noted for defendants. Seventh assignment of error.

Defendants, inter alia, presented the following point:

1. If the jury believe that in 1854, and from that time up to the bringing of this suit, Henry Boyer and those claiming under him, including the heirs and devisees of Charles Hagy, deceased, the defendants here, were the owners of the tract of land on which the ore in suit here is situated, and claimed to own not only the surface but the ore likewise; that they leased the ore to Robert S. Buck, March 1, 1854, in good faith, claiming to be the owners thereof, and that the lease was recorded; that the claim of ownership by Henry Boyer, the lessor, and his successors in title, was a matter of general reputation in the neighborhood of the tract during all that time; and that the said lessee and his assignees entered into the possession of said tract in pursuance of said lease, and held exclusive, peaceable, hostile, notorious, visible and continuous possession from 1854 to the present time, the defendants have shown a good title by adverse possession, and the verdict should be in favor of the defendants.

The court in the charge to the jury answered the above point of defendants as follows:

"We then proceed to consider the second ground upon which a defense can be set up. Have the defendants shown a right by adverse possession? The court says to you that there is no evidence in this cause to show that there has been an adverse possession taken by any one for a period of twenty-one years, from 1774 down to the bringing of this suit. The lease given in evidence made by Henry Boyer to Robert S. Buck in 1854, and entered of record, is not such adverse and hostile possession as will devest the rights of the plaintiffs in the iron ore contained in this tract of land. One person may be the owner of the surface of the land, and another may be the owner of the mineral right; and the fact that the person who is entitled to the surface is in possession for any length of time, without interfering and taking possession of the mineral right, does not give him a right by adverse possession. The possession of the owner of the surface may run with his land; and until he has in some way taken possession of the mineral, and he can only take possession of it by mining, or doing some act in the way of mining, that will interfere with the owner of the mineral right, he cannot be said to be in possession adversely to the owner of the mineral right.

There being, therefore, no right shown by the defendants under a grant, nor any evidence in the case which would justify the court in submitting to you the question of adverse use or occupation of the iron ore right, the verdict of the jury will have to be for the plaintiffs; and this is a full answer to defendants' first point." Eighth assignment of error.

The court directed a verdict for plaintiffs, and defendants took this writ assigning errors as above noted.

Messrs. J. H. Jacobs, B. Frank Dettra and H. Willis Bland, for plaintiffs in error:

I. The release was an ancient document, and its due execution was not necessary to be proved.

When ancient instruments are more than thirty years old, they prove themselves.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 21.

A deed thirty years old, accompanied by possession, proves itself, and is regarded as an ancient deed.

Bowser v. Cravener, 56 Pa. 132.

If a deed is thirty years old, it may be admitted in evidence without any further proof of its execution.

1 Phil. Ev. p. 404.

Ancient writings which are proved to have been found among deeds of evidences of land may be given in evidence, although the execution cannot be proved.

1 Phil. Ev. p. 404.

Some account ought to be given of the place where the deed was found; and the finding of it among deeds of evidence of land is a presumption that they were fairly and honestly obtained, and preserved for use, and are free from suspicion of dishonesty.

1 Phil. Ev. p. 404.

Where proof of execution would have been dispensed with, in case the original had been produced, proof of execution is unnecessary.

Goodier v. Lake, 1 Atk. 246; 1 Stark. Ev. 392.

In McReynolds v. Longenberger, 57 Pa. 13, the proposition was to prove ancient receipts appearing to be more than thirty years old, accompanying the muniments of title, to the land, and found with them by the witness when he received the title papers, and which were retained by him until his house was burned; the court below held this not sufficient proof of execution to admit secondary evidence, and the supreme court in reversing, through Judge Thompson, says: "They would have been evidence without preliminary proof of execution, had they been produced and offered as such in court, and for the reason that they were ancient receipts."

If the instrument is lost, the party is required to give some evidence that such a paper once existed, although slight evidence is sufficient for this purpose, and that a bona fide and diligent search has been unsuccessfully made in the place where it was likely to be found.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 558.

It must appear that the instrument comes from such custody as to afford a reasonable presumption in favor of its genuineness.

1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 21, 142; 1 Phil. Ev. p. 404.

If a document has been placed in the hands of a custodian, he must be required to make due search; and the fruitlessness of such search must be shown, before secondary evidence can be let in; and where such person is dead inquiry must be made of his legal representatives.

1 Whart. Ev. § 144; Krise v. Neason, 66 Pa. 253.

It is plain that the proof of loss of a document necessarily involves some descriptive proof of the document itself, although not to the degree of precision subsequently necessary in order to establish a title under it; and a strong probability of its loss has been held sufficient to let in secondary evidence of its contents.

Bouldin v. Massie, 7 Wheat. 122, 154, 155 (20 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 414, 422 and editorial note).

If the ground for admitting the secondary evidence is that the original has been lost, it ought to be shown that every reasonable inquiry has been made; and the last person in whose possession it is traced should be called to give some account of the instrument.

1 Phil. Ev. p. 399; Caufman v. Presbyterian Cong. 6 Binn. 59.

It is sufficient if the party has done all that could reasonably be expected of him under the circumstances of the case, in searching for the instrument.

Kelsey v. Hanner, 18 Conn. 311.

The degree of diligence in the search depends much upon its peculiar circumstances; and it is a question for the court as to whether the loss of the instrument has been sufficiently proved to admit secondary evidence.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 558.

The party is expected to show that he has in good faith exhausted, in a reasonable degree, all the sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case would naturally suggest and which were accessible to him. But the object of the proof is merely to establish a reasonable presumption of the loss of the instrument.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 558, p. 645.

It is sufficient if the party offering parol proof show such diligence as is usual with good business men under the circumstances.

1 Whart. Ev. § 142. See cases cited, note 1.

Where a document is lost or destroyed without any suspicion of spoliation attaching to the party offering to prove it by parol evidence, then such parol evidence is admissible to prove its contents, it appearing that due but fruitless efforts have been made to produce it in court.

Enders v. Sternbergh, 2 Abb. App. Cas. 31; McReynolds v. Longenberger, 57 Pa. 13; Kaul v. Lawrence, 73 Pa. 410; 1 Whart. Ev. § 129.

The court must be satisfied that original writing is not producible and would be evidence if produced in order to give secondary evidence of its contents.

1 Whart. Ev. § 141; Caufman v. Presbyterian Cong. 6 Binn. 59.

The witness must have read it or heard its contents from its author, and be able to speak at least to the substance of such contents.

1 Whart. Ev. § 140; Cox v. England, 65 Pa. 212.

It is not necessary that the witness should testify to the provisions of the lost instrument; it is presumed to have been in the usual form.

Emig v. Diehl, 76 Pa. 359; Brown v. Day, 78 Pa. 141.

If an ancient deed, is found in the proper custody and is corroborated by evidence of ancient or modern corresponding enjoyment, or other equivalent acts, it is to be presumed that the deed constituted part of the actual transfer of property therein mentioned.

1 Greenl. Ev. p. 144; McReynolds v. Longenberger, 57 Pa. 13; Bertie v. Beaumont, 2 Price, 303.

II. A party to a suit is a competent witness, at common law, to prove to the court that an instrument which it is necessary to produce at the trial is destroyed or lost, so as to let in secondary evidence; and there in no distinction in this respect between cases where the action is upon the instrument, and those where the question arises indirectly; and it is of no importance in the order of exhibiting the evidence, which fact is first proved, whether that of the existence and contents of the instrument, or the fact of destruction or loss.

Fitch v. Bogue, 19 Conn. 285; 1 Greenl. Ev. 14th ed. 1883, § 349; Robinson v. Freeman, 13 W. N. C. 565.

III. The offer covered by the fourth assignment of error, to prove the reputation in the neighborhood, of the ownership in the mines, was clearly competent. When a party sets up a title to ownership by adverse possession, he must prove such a state of things as would be likely to give notice to any other person whose title is to be affected by his adverse holding. As an element of this kind of proof, reputed ownership in the adverse holder is admissible.

William B. BRICKELL et al., Piffs. in Err.,
v.
C. R. EARLEY.

1. A constructive or a resulting trust can arise only when title has been obtained by fraud or purchased with the money of another.
2. No part of a parol trust can be left to inference, the proof to establish it must in all particulars be clear and specific.
3. A, B and C, by conveyances which excepted certain lots, became the tenants in common of a large tract of land which, for the purpose of clearing up the title, A afterwards, by agreement with B and C, permitted to be sold for taxes, and bought in in his own name for the benefit of all. Still later both this tract and the excepted lots were again sold for taxes, and were bought by D. The excepted lots were not redeemed, and D conveyed them to A. B and C thereon brought ejectment against A for an undivided two thirds of the lots. Held, that in the absence of fraud or the use of their money in purchasing the lots by A, they could not recover. Held also, that evidence on the part of B & C was inadmissible to prove: 1, that A had employed, to survey the tract owned in common, a surveyor who had included the lots within the tract; or 2, that A represented to them that there were a number of tracts the title to which was in doubt which he could perfect by purchasing at tax sale, to be followed by A's letters showing he was pursuing a policy as to obtaining tracts at such sales which he had told them could be accomplished when they made the purchase; or 3, that A had written to them a letter by which as they alleged he had said D would assign the tax deeds at any time the purchase money was paid; or 4, that before and after his purchase A declared that the sale was for the joint benefit of the parties to perfect their joint title.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 105, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Elk County, to review a judgment of compulsory nonsuit in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

This was an action by W. B. Brickell and P. Y. Hite, against C. R. Earley, for an undivided two thirds of forty-one lots of land in the Townships of Benzinger and Fox and the County of Elk.

At the trial the following facts appeared:

By deed dated October 13, 1859, Jesse Landis conveyed to H. G. O. Ramberger, Edwin Jefferies and Richard J. Byrnes, a large number of tracts of land, situate in Elk County. The several tracts were described by metes and bounds, and included within the boundaries and number of acres given a large number of farm lots which had before that time been surveyed and offered for sale; a considerable number, among which were some of the lots in controversy in this suit, had been sold.

For the years 1858 and 1859, these lands, which were all unseated, were assessed with the usual taxes, and on the 11th of June, 1860, were sold to one Sarah A. Byrnes for taxes and costs. None of the farm lots were then assessed separately, but a few of the purchasers paid taxes or redeemed from the sale.

Ramberger, Jefferies and Byrnes continued to make sales and conveyances of the farm lots until April 1, 1861, when they sold the remaining lands to one William C. Black. In this conveyance the lands were again fully described, and included within the bounds all the farm lots which had been so conveyed; and the grantors excepted, by the names of purchasers and the numbers of the lots, with the number of acres, the lands sold by them.

Among the lots so excepted were Nos. 3, 5, 6, 7, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 34 and 37, in the precipe.

On the same first of April, 1861, Black bought from Mrs. Byrnes and her husband, Timothy Byrnes, all the rights that Mrs. Byrnes had acquired by the treasurer's sale. This purchase was evidenced, not by assignments of the treasurer's deed, but by a conveyance, complete in itself, and which is of record, and was given in evidence at the trial.

Black sold and conveyed some more lots, among others Nos. 35, 38, 39, 40 and 41, in precipe, and on the 12th of August, 1862, conveyed to S. B. Coughlin. This deed does not describe the lands in full, but refers to deed from Ramberger et al., and recites that deed and its exceptions, and after thus describing the land, excepts about 1,170 acres sold by grantor. The taxes of 1860 and 1861, on all the lands, were paid in full by Coughlin, as were the taxes of 1862 and 1863.

For 1860 and 1861, lots were assessed to William Shanahan and M. Shanahan (29 and 30, Chestnut Road, Nos. 17 and 18, in precipe), and were bid in at treasurer's sale by Coughlin and the taxes paid by him for 1862 and 1863.

Coughlin also made sales or conveyances, and among others Nos. 1, 2, 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 30, 31, 33, 19, 22; all but the two latter being to John Jamieson, by deed dated January 15, 1864. Jamieson never paid a cent of taxes and never had the lands assessed to himself. On the 16th of January, 1864, Coughlin, by a deed which from its contents appears to have been indorsed upon the deed from Black to him, conveyed to Josiah Caldwell, with a further exception of 1,907 acres conveyed by Coughlin to sundry persons.

On or about the 11th of June, 1866, the lands were again sold for taxes, and those tracts in Benzinger Township were bid in by Albert Willis, and those in Fox Township by L. H. Eicholtz. Afterwards, and near about the 5th day of June, 1868, the treasurer's deeds were assigned to Mr. C. W. Huntington.

In 1873, the plaintiffs, with one J. D. Baldwin and the defendant, agreed to buy the body of lands, and on or about the 15th of August, 1873, the defendant, Earley, received from Huntington a deed for the lands he held under the treasurer's sales of 1866. This deed was dated February 27, 1873, and was recorded August 20, 1873. Afterwards, the defendant received a deed from Josiah Caldwell "for all the lands described in a mortgage from C. W. Huntington to Benzinger & Eschbach, 25,000 acres, more or less," and also a confirmatory deed from Geo. P. Sanger and Thomas J. Lee, surviving trustees under a conveyance from Caldwell.

By various subsequent conveyances between Earley, Jacob H. Walter, Brickell, Hite and Baldwin, the title was supposed and intended to have vested one third each in Brickell, Hite and Earley. There was some question among the parties as to the titles; and it was agreed to let the lands again go to sale, and be bid in by Earley for all parties in interest. The farm lots which were the subjects of this suit were in many cases separately assessed.

In pursuance of this agreement, the land having been sold in 1872, Earley took assignments of the treasurer's deeds from the various purchasers. In 1874 the lands were again allowed to go to sale for the taxes of 1872 and 1873, and were bid in by Earley under said agreement, together with a number of the lots which were separately assessed.

In 1878 all the lands in controversy, as well as the lands of which plaintiffs and defendant were tenants in common, were sold for taxes; all were bought by John G. Hall. The lands in controversy were not redeemed, and on December 20, 1880, after the titles had become absolute, Hall conveyed them by assignment to Earley.

The plaintiffs made the following offers of testimony:

"We propose to prove by the witness on the stand, Mr. Willard, that he was employed as a surveyor by Dr. Earley, with general authority to make an examination of the lines and the records, and prepare a statement for Earley, Brickell and Hite: that pursuant to that employment he did make and prepare a statement which he now has, and that he furnished a copy of that statement to Dr. Earley, and that the lands in controversy were within the bounds of the survey made by him at that time or within the bounds of a paper description which he had before him, and that all was done at the request of Dr. Earley for Earley, Brickell and Hite." Overruled. First assignment of error.

"Plaintiffs counsel offered to prove by the witness on the stand (Brickell) that Dr. Earley, the defendant, represented to them at the time of the purchase, and subsequently, that there were a number of those tracts or parts of tracts the title to which was in doubt, and to which he could perfect the title by purchasing the same at treasurer's sale; and that an agreement was entered into between them that he should do so; and that that agreement was part of the orignal transaction; and that it was on the faith of those representations and believing that they would thus acquire a larger tract than expressed in the deed that they went into the purchase with Dr. Earley; to be followed by letters from Earley showing that he was pursuing a line of policy in regard to obtaining the tracts at treasurer's sales which he had stated to them could be accomplished at the time they made the purchase." Overruled, except as to the letters. Second assignment of error.

Among the letters then read in evidence was the following, known as Exhibit 11.

Ridgway, Elk Co., Pa., June 26, 1878.

W. B. Brickell, Esq.,

My Dear Sir: Yours at hand. Mr. Hall will assign deeds at any time if money is paid at once; but if he pays out or has to raise the money, we must pay the 25 per cent. I have not seen Mr. Wilson since your letter came to hand. We cannot use the timber this winter, and we cannot sell the bark this year. As to 6 per cent for roads, etc., that should be in case of whole warrants. I see this warrant was put in net, and there was a piece sold, and I think there is no doubt that it has been reclaimed by tax titles; but we may have a suit about it and therefore if I take property without warrantee, I would not like to pay for that amount. You have the description then and if you are satisfied with the proposal you can send back if not all right; I am not particular, I have Wheeler & Woodward estimating pine on 4,877 and 4,889. Mr. Hyde offers to pay it. Have not been able to get 4,116 estimated yet. Can we do any better as to Fox?

Yours Truly,

C. R. Earley.

The plaintiffs then made the following offers of evidence:

"Plaintiffs' counsel now propose to prove by Mr. Brickell that the letter of June 26, 1878, being 'Exhibit No. 11,' in evidence, which recites the fact that Mr. Hall will assign deeds at any time if money is paid, etc., relates to the lands in controversy so far as the same were purchased by Mr. Hall, and for the purpose of showing a recognition on the part of C. R. Earley of the plaintiffs' right to participate in the benefits of that tax sale, and for the further purpose of showing in connection with other evidence and letters that the sale and purchase was in fact in the interest of all the tenants in common." Overruled. Third assignment of error.

"Plaintiffs' counsel offered to prove now by parol testimony that both before and since this tax sale took place, at which Mr. Hall became purchaser, Dr. Earley declared to the parties in interest, the plaintiffs, the purpose for which the sale was conducted, and that the purpose was the joint benefit of all, and to perfect the title in the interest of all." Overruled. Fourth assignment of error.

The court entered judgment of compulsory nonsuit, and subsequently refused to take it off. This also was assigned as error.

Messrs. Geo. A. Rathbun and J. McF. Carpenter, for plaintiffs in error:

If Earley purchased the lands originally for the joint benefit of all, he could not set up an adverse title to any of the lands as against the person in whose interest he bought. He was the recognized agent of all the purchasers. The measure of his duty was fidelity. How far he came up to this measure is shown by his present attitude toward the plaintiffs.

Having conveyed or purported to convey the lands in controversy to plaintiffs, he cannot now be permitted to set up title subsequently acquired, to defeat the title of his vendee.

If authority be deemed necessary in support of so plain a proposition, we cite: Banks v. Ammon, 27 Pa. 172; Washabaugh v. Entriken, 34 Pa. 78; and Clark v. Martin, 49 Pa. 289.

The court below seemed to lose sight of the fact that plaintiffs were not setting up a claim of title hostile to defendant, but were simply demanding the right to share with him, as tenants in common.

If one has died in possession, and his possession has descended to his heirs, whether his title was perfect or not is not a subject of inquiry in an action by one of the heirs against another heir who claims to have purchased a perfect title from a third party.

Keller v. Auble, 58 Pa. 412.

As vendor of the title Earley was bound to defend it, and could not acquire any title outstanding when he conveyed, as against his vendees. Both as grantor and tenant in common he was bound to protect the plaintiffs.

Weaver v. Wible, 25 Pa. 272; Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. 389; Lloyd v. Lynch, 28 Pa. 419; Davis v. King, 87 Pa. 261.

The plaintiffs made out or offered by competent evidence to make out a prima facie case.

We offered to show that, when the original purchase was made, Dr. Earley represented that as to certain portions of the land there was some cloud on the title; and that as an inducement to the purchase by plaintiffs he (Earley) undertook and agreed to have the doubtful titles perfected; and that relying on this agreement plaintiffs purchased. This offer was refused, except so far as shown by letters; and as to these letters, the court refused to allow any explanation, restricting us to what was expressed therein. Surely it needs no citation of authority to show that parol evidence is admissible to show facts, which induced the parties to enter into the agreement.

Parol evidence is admissible to explain and define the subject matter of written agreements.

Gould v. Lee, 55 Pa. 109.

Messrs. John G. Hall and C. H. M'Cauley, for defendant in error:

By the plaintiffs' own showing the parties never were tenants in common. In the deeds on which the tenancy in common was founded these lands were excepted out. They did not, by such deeds, get any title to these lands, perfect or imperfect; they were not conveyed to them because they had been previously conveyed to other parties. There was, therefore, no relation between these parties that forbade Earley from purchasing these tracks for his own benefit.

But even if there had been a cotenancy between the parties, that was dissolved as to these lands when the tax titles became absolute in John G. Hall. After that Earley could buy for himself.

Reinboth v. Zerbe Run Improvement Co. 29 Pa. 139.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

Admittedly the plaintiffs have no title to the lands in dispute, unless they succeed in establishing a resulting trust arising from the fraud of Dr. Earley, the defendant. While the plaintiffs and defendant were tenants in common as to several tracts of land, yet as to the lots in dispute they were not such, for these lots were expressly excepted out of the conveyances to them; so that nothing can be predicated of that relation in favor of the contention of the plaintiffs. As to these lots, either of the parties was at liberty to act for himself; he might buy one or all of them at treasurer's sale, or otherwise, as he saw fit, without consulting his fellows, since his act in this particular could not affect their rights.

How then does Dr. Earley become the trustee for Brickell, and Hite? How does this alleged resulting trust arise? In order to sustain a proposition of this kind, the plaintiffs are bound to show that Earley obtained his title in fraud of their right, or that their money was used in its acquisition. Blyholder v. Gilson, 18 Pa. 134; Cross' App. 97 Pa. 471.

But there is not even an offer to prove that so much as a dollar of the plaintiff's money went into the purchase of the lands in controversy. Then again; when we turn to the charge of fraud, it is unsupported by a shadow of proof. On this head it is complained that the court overruled an offer to prove that Earley had employed Willard to make an examination of the lines and records of the company lands; that he did make such an examination and that "The lands in controversy were within the bounds of the survey made by him at that time, or within the bounds of a paper description which he has before him, and that all was done at the request of Dr. Earley, for Earley, Brickell and Hite." But we are as obtuse as the court below in perceiving how this, if proven, would have manifested the fact that the defendant acquired title to these lands as a cotenant or trustee. A fatal defect in the offer is that it does not propose to show anything as to the manner of the acquisition; and failing this it fails altogether. Cross' App. supra.

The next assignment is to the refusal of the court to permit the plaintiffs to prove "by the witness on the stand (Brickell) that Dr. Earley, the defendant, represented to them, at the time of the purchase and subsequently, that there was a number of those tracts, or parts of tracts, the title to which was in doubt, and which he could perfect by purchasing at treasurer's sale; and that an agreement was entered into between them that he should do so; and that that agreement was part of the original transaction; and that it was on the faith of those representations, and believing that they would thus acquire a larger tract than expressed in the deed, that they went into the purchase with Dr. Earley; to be followed by letters from Earley, showing that he was pursuing a line of policy, in regard to obtaining the tracts at treasurer's sale, which he had stated to them could be accomplished at the time they made the purchase."

It is enough to say with reference to this offer, that it is too indefinite, in not specifying what those tracts or parts of tracts were. No part of a parol trust can be left to inference; the proof to establish it must in all particulars be clear and specific. Moreover, there is nothing in the offer to show that the parties ever did come to any definite agreement concerning the matter. The offers in the third and fourth assignments are as ineffective as are the others.

Admitting that Earley's letter (Exhibit 11) referred to these lands when it stated the fact, "Mr. Hall will assign deeds at any time if the money is paid," yet, as there is no offer to show that they did pay the money to Mr. Hall, or that he did assign, the proposition comes to nothing. So, there was no significance in the fact that both before and after the sale to Hall, the defendant declared that the sale was for the joint benefit of the parties and to perfect their title. Earley could not thus compromise Hall; and when the treasurer's title was complete in Hall, he could sell to whom he pleased, and Earley, even though he had been a tenant in common with the plaintiffs in these very lands, could take from him a perfect title, excluding his cotenants. Lewis v. Robinson, 10 Watts, 354; Kirkpatrick v. Mathiot, 4 Watts & S. 201.

Nor can Earley's case be weakened by the showing that the plaintiffs had notice of Hall's purchase. Parol trusts are not favorites, and unless the proof of them is clear and specific they will not be entertained. In the case in hand, assuming, as we must, the correctness of the plaintiffs' offers and proofs, and there is nothing in them that is distinct and definite. No specific tracts are defined, but "there were a number of those tracts, or parts of tracts, the title to which was in doubt;" and for that reason they were allowed to go to sale, and were to be bought in by Dr. Earley.

Indefinite as this statement is, yet it is very clear that no reference could have been had to the lots in controversy; for as they had no pretense of title, of that fact there could been no doubt. So, with reference to Earley's letter of June 20, 1878, it is not only not certain that the land in controversy is referred to, but the contrary. Mr. Hall had purchased, not only these Earley lots, but also the lands belonging to the company; and it is evident that reference is made to the latter when it is said: "Mr. Hall will assign at any time if money is paid at once; but if he pays out, or has to raise the money, we must pay the 25 per cent." This language refers to a redemption, and not to a purchase of property not theretofore belonging to the company.

But it is useless to dwell upon this fruitless matter, for there is nothing in the case which tends to raise a resulting trust.

The judgment is affirmed.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 30, E. D., before Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of assumpsit to recover an unpaid balance to a subscription to capital stock. Reversed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before ARCHBALD, A. L. J., are stated in his charge to the jury.

The defendant offered, inter alia, to show by a witness on the stand and by other witnesses that John B. Gillespie subscribed for 100 shares of the capital stock of the Bank in question; that he paid the first call of 10 per cent on said subscription for stock, also the second call for 40 per cent, and that afterwards, after the organization of the Bank and while the Bank was doing business, he transferred thirty of said shares to the defendant, and that the stock now standing upon the books of the Bank in the name of the defendant is the stock which was subscribed for by John B. Gillespie and transferred by him to the defendant.

*See McKim v. Glenn (Md.), 5 Cent. Rep. 776.

Counsel for the plaintiff objected to the offer as irrelevant and incompetent; that it was no answer to the subscription of the defendant to the capital stock of the Bank already given in evidence, and that it was immaterial whether a certificate for such subscription had actually been issued to him, that by the subscription he became liable to pay the amount thereof to the Bank, and that any unpaid amount he was liable to pay to the assignees.

Counsel for defendant proposed to follow this offer by evidence that the defendant never had any other stock in the Bank, or that any other stock was ever alloted to him by said Bank, except that which was transferred to him by John B. Gillespie.

Objection overruled. Exception. Seventh of assignment of error.

The court under objection and exception permitted the defendant's counsel to ask plaintiff's witness, on cross examination, the following questions:

Q. Mr. Kennedy, who do you consider good, of the original subscriptions; do you know Henry O. Silkman?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you consider him good?

A. I consider him good for the amount of this subscription here.

Q. I am asking now about the original subscription, the charter organization of this Bank? Do you consider H. O. Silkman good?

A. I cannot tell you whether he is good or not.

Q. What is your judgment?

A. My estimate was made from the other, not from that.

Q. How much do you think you could collect from him providing he subscribed?

A. For all I know he could pay that.

By the Court: How much is that?

A. Twenty thousand dollars.

Q. Don't you consider H. O. Silkman is good for $20,000?

A. He may be.

Q. You don't know anything to the contrary, but he would be able to pay, that he is a man of property?

A. I don't know that he has got real estate.

Q. Do you know anything about him?

A. I consider him good for this amount here, $2,500.

Q. How much would you consider H. O. Silkman worth?

A. I don't know.

Q. What is he considered to be worth up in that community where he lives?

A. I don't know that I ever heard.

Q. Now if he subscribed for $20,000, as that purports to show, he is good for half of it, isn't he?

No answer.

Q. Whether you consider him good for $10,000.

A. No, I don't know as I do.

Q. Well, how much do you think could be collected out of him?

A. He wouldn't want to pay it, even if he had to pay it.

Q. I want to know whether you think you could not collect $10,000 if you had a judgment against Mr. Silkman, don't you think you could collect it of him?

A. For aught I know we could; I don't know anything about it.

Q. What is your judgment about it?

A. If it was an ordinary case, I should say we could, but I wouldn't unless.

Q. You think being a subscription to bank stock, you could not do it?

A. Having lost half he didn't want to lose any more.

These questions and answers formed the subject of the ninth assignment of error.

Counsel for plaintiff also offered in evidence a citation issued out of this court in No. 779, May Term, 1879, to W. D. Kennedy and F. B. Silkman, setting forth among other things that they had neglected to collect the unpaid subscription to the capital stock of the Bank,—asking for their removal on that ground.

By the Court: By whom was that?

Counsel for plaintiff. This was a petition by T. Von Storch, J. Von Storch, G. Von Storch, and William Von Storch.

Petition for citation filed January 14, 1882, upon which citation was issued the 27th of January, 1882. Answer of W. D. Kennedy and F. B. Silkman filed February 6, 1882, setting forth among other things that the question whether or not there should be an assessment for the unpaid subscription to the capital stock of said Bank has been submitted to this court and still remains undecided; that they at all times heretofore have been and now are desirous to follow the directions of the court in this matter, etc.

Then in connection with that the order of Judge Handley, August 7, 1882: "On consideration of the petition of the assignees of said Bank, said assignees are authorized and directed to collect the unpaid subscription to the capital stock of said Bank, and they are authorized to receive in payment of the unpaid subscription any just and legal claims against the Bank." (Signed) John Handley, President Judge.

Entitled in this case, filed February 7, 1883.

To be followed by proof that a petition was duly presented to the court previous to the time of this citation (and that the same cannot be found) by the assignees, for leave to collect, setting forth that the assets were not sufficient in their hands to pay the liabilities; that it was necessary to collect the unpaid subscriptions in order to pay depositors and creditors, and asking the direction of the court, and that in pursuance of the petition (which has been lost from the files and cannot now be found) Judge Handley made that order upon that petition, and that this order was made previous to the commencement of this suit.

Objected to as irrelevant and immaterial, and because the record was between other parties and is not binding upon this defendant. So far as the record is a record of any proceeding, it is inter alios acta.

Objection sustained. Exception. Twelfth assignment of error.

The court charged the jury as follows:

This is an action brought to recover the unpaid balance of an alleged subscription to the capital stock of the Citizens & Miners' Savings Bank & Trust Company of Providence. It is brought in the name of the Bank to the use of Messrs. Kennedy and Silkman, the present assignees, to whom all the property and assets of the Bank have been transferred for the benefit of the creditors of the Bank.

The action proceeds upon two grounds: 1, that the defendant, Gillespie, is not only a stockholder of the Bank, but that he has subscribed to the capital of the Bank, upon which a balance remains unpaid; and 2, that that balance is necessary in order to enable the assignees to meet the liabilities of the Bank which are still due.

It appears from the evidence that this Bank was organized in April, 1873, under an Act of the General Assembly of this State, passed a year before that. The Bank began business in July, 1873, and continued in business until April, 1879, when, being unable to meet its obligations, an assignment was made to Dr. Roberts and Mr. Kennedy; and Dr. Roberts having subsequently resigned, Mr. Silkman was duly appointed in his stead. These assignees gave bonds, qualified and entered upon their duties. In August, 1882, they made a demand upon the several stockholders of the Bank, and among others upon this defendant, for the balance, which they claimed to be then due, upon unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock. No more than 50 per cent of this stock was paid in by the stockholders prior to the failure of the Bank.

[The main questions at issue, to wit: whether the defendant was a stockholder, who had subscribed for capital stock of the Bank, and whether this balance of unpaid stock is fully necessary to meet the liabilities of the Bank, are both denied by the defendant. These raise the issues then, upon which you are to pass; and according as you determine these, so your verdict will be for the plaintiff or the defendant, as I shall explain to you.]

[The first question then for you to determine is whether the defendant is a subscriber, or was a subscriber at the time of the failure of this Bank, to the capital stock of the Bank; now this is not simply whether he held stock in the Bank, because of that there is no dispute; at the time of the failure of the Bank, he held thirty shares, and still holds them, upon which one half, 50 per cent had been paid; but the question is whether he subscribed for this stock.]

[The minutes of the organization of this Bank in 1873 have been put in evidence before you. By the recitals contained in them, it appears that the corporators, or a majority of them, having met, subscriptions were made to the capital stock of the Bank, to the extent of $125,000. While this may not be sufficient evidence to hold the parties who are recited in these minutes to a subscription, if they were contesting their position as original subscribers, still, under the evidence as it has been presented to you, I must hold, and so instruct you, that the original subscribers to the stock of the Bank were the parties who are named in these minutes.]

This, then, excludes the defendant from being held as an original subscriber. His name is not recited there; and he does not appear therefore to have been one of the parties who subscribed to the original stock of the Bank.

The method in which he actually acquired his stock is disclosed to you by the evidence; and there appears to be no particular dispute in regard to this.

One of the parties who subscribed to this $125,000 of original stock, was the brother of the defendant, Mr. John B. Gillespie. He subscribed for 100 shares, or at par value of $100, $10,000 of this $125,000, and subsequently he transferred of this 100 shares, thirty shares to the defendant. This transfer was made about the second of December, 1878, as I remember the evidence; and at that time Mr. John B. Gillespie marked upon the certificate which had been made out to him for his original subscription, an assignment of thirty shares covered by that original subscription to the defendant, and upon the certificate back, which has been presented to you here, a regular transfer of thirty shares of that 100 was made to the defendant, and a stock certificate issued to him for it.

[Now, then, if the case stopped there, the defendant would be virtually a transferee of stock, as it is called, that is, a person to whom, either immediately or through other intervening parties, stock has been transferred from a person who originally subscribed; and a simple transferee is not liable to the corporation for any balance that might be unpaid upon it as a subscription.]

But at the time of receiving this certificate for thirty shares of stock the defendant was called upon to sign a book, which has been put in evidence here; and in compliance with that requirement of the Bank he did sign that book. He signed his name under the following head: "We, the undersigned, do hereby subscribe for the amount set opposite our respective names of the capital stock of the Citizens & Miners' Savings Bank & Trust Company, incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, approved April 18, 1872, and we do hereby agree to pay the amounts subscribed at such times, and in such manner, as the board of directors of said Corporation may from time to time order and direct." "Providence, Pa., Saturday, April 12, 1873."

Then follows a long list of names with the amounts set opposite them, in a column arranged for that purpose, and among others, the name of the defendant, James W. Gillespie, with the figures 3,000 opposite his name.

It is alleged on the part of the defendant that this book was signed by all parties to whom stock was transferred; and he says that this was done simply for the purpose of having a complete record and list of the stock as it was transferred, and of the stockholders to whom it was transferred.

But in terms as it stands before us that is not the purport of this writing, and there is no sufficient evidence in the case, in my opinion, to change this from its natural effect, or to give it any other effect than such as would be drawn from it as it stands.

The question then is, What is the purport of this writing subscribed by the defendant?

[Now, as I have already said to you, a person is not liable for unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of a bank, unless he originally participated in the organization of the bank, and was one who originally subscribed to the capital of the bank, and that the person to whom the stock was simply transferred was not, as a transferee, liable to the bank.]

That is, however, subject to this qualification: that if a party to whom stock has been transferred, upon the requirement of the bank, agrees to pay the unpaid balance upon the stock which is transferred to him, then a contract relation is established between himself and the bank, which can be enforced. And that is the effect, under the evidence, of this writing, to which the defendant subscribed his name at the time of the transfer.

The evidence is that it was required of him that he should sign this book as a condition of the stock being transferred to him; and while it reads as an original subscription might, it still is not necessarily confined to that; we are not warranted in discarding it, because it is in part of that form; in substance it assumes to pay, as part of the capital stock of the Bank, the amounts set opposite the parties' respective names who signed it. And that, taken in connection with the fact that the defendant was required to do this, as a condition of the transfer to him of his stock, and the issuing of a certificate to him, established a contract or agreement on his part to hold himself liable to the Bank to the extent of $3,000.

I might say further, gentlemen, that it was right and proper for the officers of the Bank to call upon the defendant to do this, in making this transfer. While it is true, if he had refused to do that, the Bank could not have compelled him, because everyone may dispose of his stock in a corporation to another; and a party to whom it is transferred has a right, unless there be by-laws to the contrary which bind him, to have it transferred upon the books of the Bank, and certificates for it issued to him, upon a mere transfer.

[But the defendant did not stand upon that right. He accepted the requirement of the Bank, and as the Bank or Corporation could only enforce unpaid subscriptions to stock against parties who had agreed to pay, and so if they had not compelled parties to sign this book, or to sign something like it, would have been remitted to the original stockholders] upon a failure such as this, it was proper for the Bank, when parties came in with a transfer of stock, to compel them to sign such an agreement as this, so that they, in every case, might be held for the balance that was unpaid.

That, as I have instructed you, was the effect under the evidence of the defendant signing this agreement, and if you believe this evidence, a contract relation is thus established between the Bank and the defendant, to pay the balance of 50 per cent which is shown to be due upon his shares.

This leads us, then, to the second question: Is it necessary, in order to enable the assignees to meet the liabilities of this Bank, that they should collect the whole of the unpaid stock subscriptions?

The right of these assignees to call upon the stockholders for the balance unpaid upon any subscription of stock, is not absolute, but qualified. They have only the right to call for so much as may be necessary to meet the liabilities of the Bank. They cannot call for the whole of a stock subscription, merely to go through the form of getting assets into their hands, and then subsequently hand back a part. Their duty is confined to collecting from the subscribers to stock so much as may be necessary to meet the existing liabilities.

This question is properly to be determined in proceedings specially brought against the stockholders before a proper court, in which, upon all the facts in regard to the assets of the Bank, the solvency of the several subscribers and the liabilities, a proper assessment upon such stockholder may be made according to the exigencies of the case; but if it clearly appears from the evidence that all the subscriptions from solvent stockholders will be necessary to meet the liabilities of the Bank, it is not necessary to go through the preceding form of an assessment by proceedings in court, under such circumstances as I have mentioned to you.

Now then, Mr. Kennedy, upon this point, says that in his opinion, it is necessary; not only that (because if that were the only fact in the case, I should not feel as though it were proper to submit the question to you upon his mere say so), but he particularizes and shows to you how it is necessary to collect, and why it is necessary to collect from the defendant, as well as from all other solvent stockholders, this 50 per cent of the stock unpaid.

The original liabilities of the Bank, as it appears from his evidence, amounted to some $70,000. Upon this, interest has accumulated more or less since 1879, when the Bank failed. The appraisers who were appointed by the court to go through the assets of the Bank and make an appraisement fixed the amount of available assets at about $86,000. Of this the assignees have collected, as I remember the evidence, something over $60,000, and with a little over $5,000 cash in hand remaining with them, they have paid off some $50,000 to $55,000 of the liabilities. This, taking into consideration the cash which they have, would reduce the balance unpaid of liabilities down to from $10,000 to $15,000, with interest to be added to that. The exact amount of this interest is not shown to you. It could hardly amount to seven years' interest upon $70,000, because, as we have seen, from $50,000 to $55,000 of this original $70,000 has been paid off. Mr. Kennedy estimates, however, that it would require to pay off these existing liabilities, from $30,000 to $35,000.

If we take that, then, from the evidence, as a proper statement of the indebtedness; on the other hand, to meet these liabilities is the $5,000 of cash on hand, the balance of the appraised assets $16,000, and the subscriptions. If these figures are correct, in any event, the stockholders have got to respond to some extent upon their unpaid subscriptions.

Of the unpaid subscriptions, Mr. Kennedy estimates, and gives you particulars in this respect, that only about $18,000 or $19,000 can be collected. If that be so, with the $5,000 in hand, there would only be from $23,000 to $24,000 to meet liabilities which Mr. Kennedy estimates at from $30,000 to $35,000. If this be the evidence which you accept as true, then there is sufficient evidence to submit to you, that, beyond any question, the whole of all the subscriptions of solvent stockholders will be required to meet the liabilities of this Bank.

It is true, on the other hand, that we are not given particulars in regard to the $16,000 which the appraisers considered sufficient to be brought in and scheduled as available assets. Nor are the original subscriptions to this $125,000 taken into account in making that estimate. Mr. Kennedy's estimate is based entirely upon such stockholders as he finds in this book, and upon the amounts which they have there subscribed for.

[It is right and proper to take into consideration these parties who appear as original subscribers to this $125,000; and if you find from that, and if you are not satisfied in regard to this $16,000 which the appraisers have considered available assets, taking those two circumstances into consideration, that the whole of the stock subscriptions of each solvent stockholder, and among others this defendant, is required to meet the liabilities, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this case.

As I have said to you before, the question on this issue is not whether there may not be a necessity for calling in some part of the subscriptions; in any view of the case, as I take the evidence, a necessity is shown for calling in some part; but neither you nor I, in this proceeding and under such facts as have been developed, would be able to make an assessment, and say how much is needed less than the whole amount.

If you find, under the evidence, that the whole amount is not necessary, then the plaintiff cannot recover for any amount, because we have no standard to fix how much; but if you are satisfied from the evidence that the whole amount will be necessary, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover upon that issue.]

There are, then, as I have explained to you, or endeavored to, two questions: 1, whether this defendant has made himself liable, as a subscriber, by signing this agreement; and under the evidence, if you believe it, I instruct you that he has; 2, whether the whole of this stock which is unpaid is necessary to meet the liabilities of the Bank. If you find that it is, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover. If you find that it is not, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

I will now read to you certain points which the counsel on either side have submitted to me, with my answers in regard to them. I will first read the plaintiff's points:

1. "That James W. Gillespie, by signing the subscription in evidence, became a subscriber to the capital stock of the Bank, and as such is liable to pay any amount unpaid upon the same, necessary to pay the debts of said Bank, even if the jury should find from the evidence, that the certificate of stock in evidence was not issued upon such subscription."

2. "That as it appears by the evidence of the defendant himself that he was required to sign the subscription to the original stock, upon the issuing to him of the certificate in question, and that he did so voluntarily, he thereby became a subscriber to the stock of the Bank, and liable to pay the amount unpaid thereon."

I have endeavored to instruct you substantially as set forth in these two points. There are minor points of inaccuracy that do not enable me unqualifiedly to affirm them; but with such qualifications as I have endeavored to give you in my general charge, and to which I now refer you, I affirm these points.

The defendant's points are as follows: * * *

3. "That the assignee of stock of the Bank in question is not personally liable for assessments made upon him subsequent to his purchase of the stock from an original subscriber."

This point is affirmed with this qualification: that if it does not appear that he has not assumed to pay the same, of which, however, there is evidence in this case; that is, the simple assignee of stock (a transferee as I have called him), without more, without having undertaken any obligation to pay, would not be liable, but if (of which there is evidence in this case) such transferee as the defendant is has himself assumed to pay the balance due upon stock, then of course the plaintiff, upon such a showing as we have here, would be entitled to recover. * * *

Now, in making up your verdict, you will find either for the defendant or for the plaintiff for the full amount of the unpaid balance due upon this stock, with interest from the time of the demand made upon the defendant by the assignees. You cannot find for a less amount; nor can you stop between those two points. Your verdict, under such instructions as I have endeavored to give you, must be either absolutely for the defendant, or it must be for the assignees for the full amount.

I do not need to remind you that in the consideration of this case you are to dispel anything of prejudice from your minds; that you are not entitled to consider anything except the evidence in the case.

Whichever way you look in regard to this evidence, of course hardship is seen; it is hard for this defendant to be required to pay further upon the stock, which is now of no value, and which payment would be an absolute loss to him. Still if the evidence, according as I have instructed you, shows that under the law he ought to respond, that he is obliged by law to respond, that there is a legal liability upon his part, then it is your duty to say so by your verdict.

Of course the determination of these questions, if the assets of the Bank are not going to be sufficient to meet the liabilities, are important for the plaintiffs. They are important to the creditors and the depositors of this Bank whom they represent; and if your verdict should be for the defendant, of course followed by other similar verdicts, it might result in loss to the depositors.

These plaintiffs, as assignees, have very little interest other than simply to represent those for whose interest and in whose trust this property and the assets of this failed Bank, have been assigned to them. You are, therefore, to deal with the case simply as it is represented to you upon the evidence, and not upon what you may think might be right under other circumstances, but simply under the law, as I have endeavored to instruct you, and under the evidence as it has been presented to you here.

Verdict and judgment for the defendant.

The assignments of error not already mentioned specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets, and the answers to the points quoted.

Messrs. Jessup & Hand, for plaintiff in error:

Can a corporation assign an unpaid subscription to its capital stock, so that its assignee can collect the same?

Corporations, unless expressly restrained by the Act which establishes them or some other Act, have and always have had an unlimited power over their respective properties, and may alienate and dispose of the same as fully as any individual may do in respect to his own property.

Dana v. Bank of U. S. 5 Watts & S. 223; 1 Kyd, Corp. 108.

The directors of a bank have power to assign all its property to trustees to pay its debts.

Catlin v. Eagle Bank, 6 Conn. 233; Union Bank of Tennessee v. Ellicott, 6 Gill & J. 363.

The general assignment made by the Corporation for the benefit of creditors passed all its rights substantially to the assignees.

Yeager v. Trust Co. 14 W. N. C. 296.

Unpaid stock is as much a part of the assets of the company as the cash which has been paid in upon it.

Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 60 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 222).

This being the case there seems to be no reason why the claim for unpaid stock, which is a simple chose in action, cannot be collected as any other asset.

The unpaid subscriptions to its stock are a part of its assets, which can be made available in equity, by the creditors; and therefore a general assignment for their benefit passes them to the assignee.

West Chester etc. R. R. Co. v. Thomas, 2 Phila. 344.

It is, however, but the assignment of a chose in action; and the legal title being still in the corporation, the assignee can proceed only in its name, and must be able to show that the provisions of the charter have been pursued so as to give the company the right; in other words, that a call for the unpaid capital has been duly made, and by the proper authority.

Germantown Pass. R. Co. v. Filter, 60 Pa. 131.

The discretion of the directors as to calls is modal merely, relating to the time and manner of making payments. When the debts of the company require the calls to be made, it becomes the duty of the managers to make them, as much so as to collect other debts due the company.

Germantown Pass. R. Co. v. Filter, 60 Pa. 132.

A common-law action may be maintained for such a debt.

Yeager v. Trust Co. 14 W. N. C. 296; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. (Bk. 23, L. ed. 220); Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. (Bk. 23, L. ed. 203); Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 384); Messersmith v. Sharon Sav. Bank, 96 Pa. 440; Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co. 5 Gill, 484.

The court below held that the assignees, holding the legal title to this debt, and having power to make the calls which they did, could not collect anything unless there was first an adjudication by a competent tribunal that the whole of the unpaid stock of all the subscribers was required to pay off the liabilities.

This ruling was founded, as we think erroneously, upon Lane's Appeal, 105 Pa. 49.

In that case the corporation and the assignee refused to call for and collect the unpaid stock; and so the creditor was compelled to file his bill.

In Bell's Appeal, 6 Cent. Rep. 161, which was a bill by a creditor to enforce unpaid subscription to the stock, this court says:

"This is a proceeding to enforce the equitable obligation of stockholders in an insolvent corporation to pay the unpaid portions of the capital stock due by them, in order that the debts, all the debts, of the corporation may be paid to the extent of such unpaid capital. It is not a statutory obligation at all, but an obligation in equity, arising out of the consideration that the capital stock of a corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts. Only so much of the unpaid capital as is necessary for the payment of the debts can be called in, and this can only be done when all the other assets are exhausted. It is manifest, therefore, that in a case of this kind there must be an account taken of the amount of debts, assets and unpaid capital, and a decree for an assessment of the amount due by each stockholder."

In Cornell's Appeal, 5 Cent. Rep. 181, it is held that under the Act of 1836, P. L. 799, making stockholders liable individually for the amount of unpaid stock held by them, it was not necessary for the creditor to bring in other stockholders, or to take an account of the other indebtedness of the company.

These cases simply show the law to be that where the individual has exhausted his remedy at law, he can go into equity, and compel defaulting stockholders to pay over the balance of their unpaid stock.

Is a transferee or holder of stock liable to pay calls for any amount unpaid while he so holds the same?

It has been supposed by the profession in this State that a mere transferee or holder of stock was not liable to pay the amount due upon stock held by him, but Bell's Appeal, supra, holds to the contrary and adopts the doctrines stated in Angell & Ames on Corporations, § 534.

The transferee of stock in an incorporated company is liable for calls made after he has been accepted by the company as a stockholder and his name has been registered on the stock books as a corporator; and being thus liable, there is an implied promise that he will pay calls made while he continues the owner.

Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 384).

Bell's Appeal overrules Messersmith v. Sharon Sav. Bank, 96 Pa. 440, as to the nonliability of a simple transferee.

May the court of common pleas exercise its chancery powers in directing an assignee for creditors, to call in unpaid installments, without notice to each stockholder before making such order?

The courts of common pleas have general chancery powers, in reference to trusts; and while they cannot take possession of the assigned estate and appoint a receiver, unless for cause upon the removal of the assignee, as was done in Lane's Appeal, supra, still they have chancery powers over the assignees, so far as relates to filing and settling their accounts, and the removal of them for neglect of duty or misfeasance in office.

In this case the court of common pleas had jurisdiction of the assignees, so far as their official conduct was concerned. They applied to the court for direction; the court gave it and they followed it.

In Sanger v. Upton, supra, which was an action of assumpsit, the district court made an order directing the assignees to notify stockholders to pay, and in default of payment to collect.

The plaintiff in error, Sanger, claimed that she was not bound by the order because she was not before the court and had no opportunity of resisting it. But it was held that the bankruptcy court, having jurisdiction of the subject matter, could make the order, and it could not be attacked in this collateral proceeding; that if she wished the order modified or revoked, she should apply to the court by separate and direct proceedings for that purpose. The same rule was applied to an order of the comptroller of the currency under the National Bank Act.

Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. 505 (75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 478); Cadle v. Baker, 20 Wall. 650 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 498).

Messrs. Fred. W. Gunster and Chas. H. Welles, for defendant in error:

The doctrine that the capital stock of a corporation is a trust fund for the security and benefit of creditors is an invention of the courts of equity; and those courts were the first to aid creditors in calling in unpaid installments of stock to satisfy their demands.

Thomp. Liability of Stockholders, §§ 10, 16.

The transferee of stock of the Bank in question without more is not liable for unpaid subscriptions.

Act of Incorporation, P. L. 1873, p. 1100; Pittsburg & Baltimore Coal etc. Co. v. Otterson, 4 W. N. C. 545; Delaware etc. Canal Co. v. Sansom, 1 Binn. 70; Palmer v. Ridge Mining Co. 34 Pa. 288; Franks Oil Co. v. McCleary, 63 Pa. 317; Messersmith v. Sharon Sav. Bank, 96 Pa. 440.

Bell's Appeal, 6 Cent. Rep. 160, only decides that in equity, on a creditor's bill, the holder of stock is liable for so much of the unpaid subscription as is necessary to pay the debts of the corporation.

If the instrument, which James W. Gillespie signed at the time the stock was transferred to him, be construed (as was done by the court below) into an agreement to pay the amount still remaining unpaid on his stock, it was certainly an agreement only to pay "at such times and in such manner as the board of directors of said corporation may from time to time order and direct."

Before the plaintiffs can recover, they must show a call by the board of directors, or what is equivalent, by a court of competent jurisdiction in a proper proceeding.

Lane's Appeal, 105 Pa. 49; Chandler v. Siddle, 10 Nat. Bank. Reg. 236; Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 968).

If the assignment carried with it the alleged subscription or promise to pay, it was, however, but the assignment of a chose in action; and the legal title being still in the corporation, the assignee can proceed only in its name, and must be able to show that the provisions of the charter have been pursued so as to give the company the right; in other words, that a call for the unpaid capital has been duly made, and by the proper authority.

Germantown Pass. R. R. Co. v. Fitler, 60 Pa. 124; Pierce, Railroads, 74, 75; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 281.

The verdict of the jury establishes the fact that the whole amount of the unpaid stock, held by owners who are good, is not necessary to pay off in full the liabilities of the Bank.

In equity the stockholder is under obligation to pay only so much as is necessary.

The amount, if any, of the defendant's equitable obligation (as owner of stock) to creditors cannot be ascertained in this action, because: 1, there has been no designation of creditors, no adjudication upon the claims of creditors, no ascertainment of any actual specific debts; 2, there has been no disposition of the assets; 3, there has been no ascertainment of what stock still remains unpaid.

The assignment in this case is evidently by virtue of the power conferred by section 29 of the Act of April 16, 1850, and as such is subject to the provisions of section 27 of the said Act.

Act April 16, 1850, P. L. 490, §§ 27–29; 1 Purd. Dig. 177, pl. 112.

There is no evidence in this case that these plain requirements have been complied with. As a matter of fact they have not been.

If it be held that the assignees have power to make calls or levy assessments, then we contend that they must defer any call or assessment upon stockholders until such time as they have complied with the provisions of the Act in regard to the disposing of the property and collecting liabilities, in order that it may be seen whether any, and if any what, assessment is necessary.

Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, § 417.

Where the trustees have attempted to make an assessment upon stockholders, without first having disposed or attempted to dispose of the property of the company, or to collect its debts, this is an objection which goes to the jurisdiction of the trustees to make the call at all. Id.

Where a creditor or creditors desire to avail themselves of the equitable liability of stockholders they should file a bill in equity, praying for an assessment on which an action can be brought, or for a decree directly against each stockholder.

Lane's App. 105 Pa. 49; Bell's App. 6 Cent. Rep. 161.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

While the assignments of error in this case are numerous the questions involved are but few, and those easily disposed of. And we may remark at the outset that we need not discuss the question whether the defendant, as the transferee of stock, was liable for the unpaid subscription for the reason that in point of fact he assumed the liability of an original shareholder by his subscription or agreement of April 12, 1873. This established a direct contractual relation between the defendant and the company upon which he is liable to a suit as if he had been an original subscriber. This is the fair legal construction of that paper.

This suit was brought by the assignees of the Bank to collect the whole of the unpaid subscription. There was no proof of an assessment. The plaintiff offered to prove an assessment or order of Judge Handley, made at Chambers, during vacation, authorizing the assignees to collect the whole of the unpaid subscriptions. See twelfth assignment.

We have no doubt of the power of a judge at chambers to make such an order. It is an exercise of chancery power, and the chancery side of the court is always open. While this order, standing alone, would be competent evidence it was not error to reject it as a whole. It was accompanied by an offer to prove a petition and citation which were not pertinent to the issue trying. It is always well to remember that in making offers of evidence the court has a right to regard the offer as a whole. The judge is not bound, where it contains several subjects, to treat it piecemeal, and admit one part and reject the residue. He may do so, but we will not reverse for his refusal. This is settled by numerous decisions, which we need not specify.

There being no assessment in evidence, the learned judge left it to the jury to find whether the whole of the unpaid subscription was required to pay the debts of the company. We see no error in this. If all the unpaid subscriptions were required to pay the creditors, no assessment was necessary under the authority of Yeager v. Scranton Trust Co. 14 W. N. C. 296.

It is well to observe that the syllabus of that case as reported is not correct. It is much broader than the point decided, which was that where it is shown that the whole subscription is required to pay the creditors an assessment is not essential. It was said in the opinion of this court that:

"The uncontradicted evidence shows that it was necessary to collect the whole of this stock subscription in order to pay the sums due to the depositors of this insolvent corporation."

There is not even an apparent conflict between the case referred to and the later cases of Lane's Appeal, 105 Pa. 49, and Bell's Appeal, 6 Cent. Rep. 160, 44 Legal Int. 27.

These were creditors' bills, filed against insolvent corporations, to compel the payment by the stockholders of their unpaid subscriptions; and it was held that in such cases there must be an account taken of the amount of debts, assets, and unpaid capital, and a decree for an assessment of the amount due by each stockholder. The reason of this is plain: upon the insolvency of a corporation a stockholder is liable for only so much of his unpaid subscription as may be required to pay the creditors; hence, he may not be called upon in an arbitrary way to pay any sum that an assignee or creditor may demand. It is, therefore, requisite to ascertain in an orderly manner the extent of a stockholder's liability, before proceedings are commenced to enforce it. But the necessity for this does not exist where the whole amount is required to pay the debts; hence, in such cases, as was said in Yeager v. Scranton Bank, supra, an assessment is not essential. The assignee may sue at once for all, for all is required.

In the case before us the jury found that the whole of the unpaid stock was not required to satisfy the debts of the Bank. As this finding may have been due in part to the testimony referred to in the ninth assignment of error, it is proper that I should refer to it. The court below, against the objection of plaintiff's counsel, permitted the defendant's counsel to interrogate Mr. Kennedy, the witness on the stand, as to the financial responsibility of one Henry O. Silkman, the allegation being that Silkman was a stockholder to the amount of $20,000, and that if his subscription was good, the whole amount of the unpaid stock would not be needed. There was no evidence that Silkman was a stockholder to the extent of over $5,000; hence, it was clear error to admit evidence as to his ability to pay up on $20,000. It is true the witness was not very clear upon the subject of Silkman's responsibility, but it is not easy to measure the effect of such evidence as this upon the jury; and because we cannot do so, and because its admission was error, we must reverse this judgment.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

Henry POTTEIGER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Lavina POTTEIGER et al., Exrs. of Adam Potteiger, Deceased.

As a defense to a past due promissory note signed by the defendant and payable to the plaintiffs' testator, the defendant alleged that the note was given for the accommodation of the testator, and in support of the allegation proved that the date of the note was written with ink different from that used in the rest of the note, and that when the note was protested he had sent notice to the testator complaining that the testator did not attend to his business, to which the testator replied that it was the defendant who did not attend to his business—held, that this evidence was properly submitted to the jury, and that a comment upon its inadequacy was not error.

(Argued Jan. 21, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 178, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, and Green, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiffs in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before ERMENTROUT, J., were stated in his charge to the jury, which was as follows:

"The executors of Adam Potteiger bring suit upon this promissory note, which is dated March 3, 1881, payable ninety days after date, in the sum of $1,000. When this note fell due on the 4th of June, 1881, neither Adam Potteiger nor Henry Potteiger appearing to make payment of the note, the note was duly protested. Subsequently to that time it appears that Adam Potteiger paid the note, and his estate claims that Henry Potteiger owes the amount of this note, with interest, from the time the note became due.

"There is no dispute about the signatures of the note. The note is admitted to be a genuine note; and so far as the face of the note is concerned, the law would import that Henry Potteiger was indebted to Adam Potteiger upon this note in the sum of $1,000, with interest, as claimed by the plaintiffs, for when a man's name appears upon a note as a maker, the party whose name appears as the first indorser, or the man to whose order the note is payable has a right to bring suit against the maker and recover the amount of the note. I say, upon its face, it would import that contract.

"The defendant, however, alleges that instead of Henry Potteiger owing this money, Henry Potteiger simply loaned his name as an accommodation; and instead of this being Henry Potteiger's debt it is in fact Adam Potteiger's. When a note of this character is laid down before you, and admitted to be genuine, you start out with the presumption that it is exactly what the note calls for, and that upon its face it implies an indebtedness upon the part of Henry Potteiger to Adam Potteiger. It then remains for the defendant to show to you that he is not liable upon this note; for unless he shows that to you, there must be a recovery in this case.

"Now, what is the testimony? There are no witnesses called as to the giving or the making of these notes. They first put in evidence the note for which this last note was given in renewal. When that note is examined you will see that it is a note signed by Henry Potteiger, payable to the order of Adam Potteiger; and the law would imply that when that note fell due Henry Potteiger owed the amount set forth in that note to Adam Potteiger.

["They next allude to the date of these notes. It is not pretended that either of them was forged paper. They do not dispute the correctness of the dates of these notes, but they offered that in evidence as a fact from which you, gentlemen, are to infer that it was Adam Potteiger's debt and not Henry Potteiger's, because there is a difference, an alleged difference, in the ink; and the theory is that Adam Potteiger obtained these notes in the first place, and then took them to the bank or to some other place; and they ask you from that circumstance to infer that it was Adam Potteiger's debt and not Henry Potteiger's, and that this note was given for an accommodation.]

["What is the next evidence? They say that Adam Potteiger, the son, was sent by Henry Potteiger to his father to convey to him the protest of this last note, and to say that the father did not attend to his business; and they ask you to infer from the fact of the son having told the father that conversation that he had held with Henry Potteiger, that that was an acknowledgment on the part of Adam that it was his debt.

Probably if the simple fact as stated had been reported to Adam Potteiger, and he had said nothing, it might possibly then be used as a circumstance to show that it was his debt. But the testimony is that he denied it. The moment the matter was called to his attention, he said, it was Henry that did not attend to his business; so that that testimony, if believed, instead of being an admission on the part of Adam Potteiger, might be construed into a denial of the allegation of the defendant here, that this was accommodation paper.]

["Now that is the only testimony in this case that they offer for your consideration to show you that this paper is accommodation paper—from what it reads upon its face. Is that testimony sufficient to satisfy twelve reasonable men that a promissory note in writing should be set aside? Is there anything in the testimony produced by the defendant that can in any way lead you to believe that this note was anything else than what it reads upon its face? If such testimony can convince you or satisfy you of that fact, then your verdict will be for the defendant.] But if such testimony fails to convince you or to satisfy you, rather, not convince you, that this is not Henry Potteiger's note, that it was for the accommodation of Adam Potteiger, then your verdict will be for the defendant. But if it does not give satisfactory proof, then your verdict must be in favor of the plaintiffs. And you will bear in mind always that when men give notes and place their names to them, the law implies that the maker of the note is responsible for its payment. You will start out, as I have said, with a presumption of this kind; and if you find for the plaintiffs, you will find for the sum of $1,000, with interest from the 4th of June, 1881, and the costs of protests."

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs.

The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. Jeff. Snyder and Geo. F. Baer, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. H. P. Keiser, J. H. Jacobs, and Chas. C. Kehr, for defendants in error:

Where the plaintiff in an action on a promissory note is notified that proof of consideration will be required on the trial, and there is conflicting evidence on the question of consideration, the jury are to determine from all the evidence in the cause whether a consideration has been satisfactorily proved.

Wire Book Sewing Machine Co. v. Crowell, 6 Cent. Rep. 186.

The burden of proving want of consideration rests on the defendant.

Swain v. Ettling, 32 Pa. 486; Chitty, Bills, 69.

In every case of a promissory note the prima facies is in this respect in favor of the payee. It imports a valuable consideration. And that consideration must be impeached by the defendant with sufficient evidence before the plaintiff is required to make further proof.

Hartman v. Shaffer, 71 Pa. 315; Knight v. Pugh, 4 Watts & S. 447; Conmey v. MacFarlane, 97 Pa. 364.

Per Curiam:

All the alleged errors are to the charge of the court. It is claimed that the language covered by the third specification is incorrect. It follows, however, a pretty full statement of the evidence, so that it is substantially correct. We see nothing in the general language of the charge to make it misleading. There is nothing therein which gives a just cause for reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 85, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiffs (proponents) in an issue devisavit vel non. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before ERMENTROUT, J., were stated in his charge to the jury, which was as follows:

Some time in 1885 John Pennypacker, a bachelor of some sixty-four years of age, died; and at his death a certain instrument of writing, under date of November 7, 1879, was presented as his last will and testament. Richard Pennypacker, a brother of the decedent, and his children are here as plaintiffs, asserting that this paper is the will of the decedent. Abraham, James and Charles Pennypacker, also brothers of the decedent, and Mary Huyett, a sister, are the defendants, asserting that it is not the will of the decedent, and that at the time of the execution of the paper the decedent had not sufficient mental capacity to make a will.

In passing upon this question you will carefully examine the evidence, laying aside all prejudice and disregarding all appeals to your sympathies. You are to judge in this case by the evidence that has been submitted to you, and not on mere passion, prejudice and sympathy. And in order to enable you intelligently to consider the facts that are in evidence, the court will instruct you in such legal principles as may be applicable to the case. The counsel have presented certain points to the court, upon which they ask us to charge. These points embody certain legal propositions which, we are asked to say to you, form the law in this case. We will first take up the points presented on behalf of the defendants.

The defendants respectfully ask the court to charge the jury as follows, and to cause the requests and answers to be filed as a part of the record of the cause. * * *

"6. By the evidence in the case it clearly appears that the relations existing at the date of the will between Richard Pennypacker and John Pennypacker were confidential, and as Richard Pennypacker is named in the will as a beneficiary taking an estate for life under the will, and was present actively taking part in the formal execution of the will, the will is void and must be set aside upon the presumption of undue influence, unless the plaintiffs have satisfied the jury by clear evidence that the will was the free, voluntary and uncontrolled act of John Pennypacker, and was not obtained by undue influence; and if the jury believe that John Pennypacker was of weak mind at and before the execution of the will, the plaintiffs must also prove to the satisfaction of the jury that at the time the will was made John Pennypacker was of sound and disposing mind."

We decline so to charge. The issue of undue influence is withdrawn from the consideration of the jury.

"7. If the jury believe from the evidence in this case that at one time in his life, before the execution of the paper offered in evidence as the will of John Pennypacker, he was for a period of one or two years of unsound mind, and was ever thereafter an imbecile, and after the execution of the alleged will, he became a wild and raving lunatic; and if the jury further believe from the evidence in the case, that Richard Pennypacker transacted all of John's business and had charge of his estate and business affairs at the time of the execution of the alleged will and John was at that time an imbecile; and if the jury further believe from the evidence in the case that Richard Pennypacker and Adam Pennypacker, his son, beneficiaries in said alleged will, were present at the execution of the will, and that Richard Pennypacker obtained the lawyer to write the will and the witnesses to attest its execution and was present in the room actively promoting its formal execution, by directing one of the subscribing witnesses, Charles Rans, to sign his name to the will as a witness and to do his best, the law presumes the will to be null and void for undue influence, and in order to overcome the presumption, the plaintiffs in this case must have satisfied the jury by clear evidence of two facts: 1, that at the time John Pennypacksr signed the will, he had enough memory, reason and judgment to have an intelligent understanding of the property he possessed, and of its nature, extent and value, and that he had an intelligent apprehension of the nature of the will he was making; and 2, that the making and execution of the will was the free and voluntary act of John Pennypacker's mind, and not the result of the undue influence or unlawful importunity of Richard Pennypacker."

This point is refused.

"8. Where a jury sees that at and near the time when the will sought to be set aside was executed, the alleged testator was, in other important transactions, so under the influence of the person benefited by the will that, as to them, he was not a free agent, and was acting under undue control, the circumstances may be such as to warrant the conclusion, even in the absence of evidence bearing directly on the execution of the will, that in regard to that also the same undue influence was exercised."

We answer this point as follows: while that may be true in law, the present is not a case for its application. The undue influence must be an influence exercised in relation to the will itself and not an influence in relation to other matters or transactions. Undue influence, to affect a will, must be such as subjugates the mind of the testator to the will of a person operating upon it. And in order to establish this, proof must be made of some fraud practiced, some threats or misrepresentations made, some undue flattery, or physical or moral coercion employed so as to destroy the free agency of the testator; and these influences must be proved to have operated at the very time of the making of the will. There being, in the judgment of the court, no such circumstances shown in this case, the point is refused.

"9. In order to come to the conclusion that a will has been obtained by coercion, it is not necessary to establish that actual violence has been used or even threatened. The conduct of a person in vigorous health towards one feeble in mind may be such as to excite terror and make him execute as his will an instrument (which if he had been free from such influence) he would not have executed. Imaginary terrors may have been created sufficient to deprive him of free agency."

We answer this point as follows: as a proposition of law, this is true, but the facts referred to are not the facts of the present case. There is no evidence in this case to show violence used or threatened; nor is there shown any conduct on the part of Richard Pennypacker, or any of the plaintiffs, exciting any terror, real or imaginary, in the mind of the decedent.

"10. If the jury should find that John Pennypacker's mind, from many years of mental infirmity and from long habits of dependence upon his brother Richard for direction and guidance, was not self directing, and was easily led into the channel of his brother Richard's suggestions; and if Richard was present at the time the will was signed, procured counsel to draw the will, and directed Charles Rans to sign as a witness and do his best; and if Richard, at and about or near the time when the will was made, by the stamp of his firm mind on the weak and plastic mind of John (if the jury so find the facts), impressed there his wishes and views in regard to the disposition to be made by the will, and thus constrained the mind of John, and so produced and procured such a will, as his brother would not otherwise have made, the will is not the free expression of John Pennypacker's intentions, and must be set aside."

This point we also refuse.

"11. The relation existing between Richard and John Pennypacker, when the will offered in evidence was made, having been of a confidential and fiduciary character, and Richard having procured the attorney to write the will, and having been present and taken part in the formal execution of the will by directing one of the subscribing witnesses to sign his name to the will, and Richard having been one of the persons named in the will as devisees, and taking a life estate thereunder, the law presumes that the will was obtained by Richard by undue influence, and the plaintiffs having offered no competent proof to rebut that presumption, the will must be set aside, and the verdict should be for the defendants."

We decline so to charge.

Plaintiffs' counsel have also handed to the court propositions of law which they ask us to affirm, and charge the jury in accordance therewith. * * *

"2. There is no evidence in this case tending to disprove the positive testimony of Messrs. Wanner and Zieber and of the subscribing witnesses, that at the time he made his will he did have mind and memory sufficient to understand and intelligently direct the disposition he desired to be made of his property; and if, therefore, his testimony is believed, the verdict must be for the plaintiffs."

We answer this point as follows: The jury are the judges of the evidence, its nature and character. If, upon full consideration of all the evidence in this case, the jury believe the testimony of Messrs. Wanner and Zieber and the subscribing witnesses, that at the time he made his will he did have mind and memory, sufficient to understand and intelligently direct the disposition he desired to be made of his property, the verdict must be for the plaintiffs.

"4. That the fact that his brother Richard went for Mr. Wanner, called the subscribing witnesses, and some of the witnesses testify that he and his son were present in the room when the will was signed, does not create a suspicion even as to the rectitude of the transaction. The law does not regard the presence of a brother and of a nephew at the time of the making of the will as improper, suspicious or objectionable, although they are legatees."

This point we affirm, on the authority of Caldwell v. Anderson, 104 Pa. 199.

"5. There is no evidence of undue influence in this case sufficient in law to justify its submission to the jury."

This point we affirm.

"6. That if the testimony of the numerous witnesses called by the plaintiffs, together with the testimony of the persons present at the execution of the will, is believed, that John Pennypacker was possessed of mind, memory and understanding to know what he was about; that prior to the fall of 1881 his only peculiarity was slowness of speech and a retiring disposition, but all his acts and conversations were sensible; that he never was known to have any delusions, or to talk irrationally, or to do any act showing a want of sound mind, then he had capacity to make a will. The testimony that Richard did the buying and selling and attended to the general business of the farm becomes immaterial, and the verdict must be for the plaintiffs."

This point we affirm if the jury so find; but, in judging of the mental capacity of the decedent, the jury will consider all the evidence both of the plaintiffs and defendants.

"7. That the evidence of want of testamentary capacity and undue influence in this case is not sufficient to justify the jury in finding a verdict for the defendants."

We refuse this point.

As you will have observed, the question of undue influence is withdrawn from the jury. That leaves for your consideration but one point in this case, namely: did the decedent, John Pennypacker, have sufficient testamentary capacity to make his will at the time of its execution on the 7th of November, 1879? This is the only question that you have now to consider. And I may say here that in consideration of that question there are a few principles of law that are well settled, and they will, in addition to what the court has already said, be carefully considered by the jury in passing upon this case. These legal principles are as follows:

As sanity, that is, soundness of mind, is the normal condition of men, the burden of proving mental unsoundness is always upon those who allege it.

Testamentary capacity, that is, the capacity to make a will, is presumed of everyone of full age, and the affirmative is with him who undertakes to call it in question, and this affirmative he must establish, not in a doubtful, but in a positive manner; and if, in weighing the evidence, the question is doubtful or balanced, a jury ought to incline in favor of disposing ability.

If, however, general or habitual unsoundness of mind be once shown to exist previous to the will, the burden of proving a lucid interval or restoration at the time of making it is thrown upon those who allege the fact.

I will also in addition read to you what is said upon the question of mental capacity in a late case decided by our supreme court, the case of Wilson v. Mitchell, 101 Pa. 503: "A man of sound mind and disposing memory is one who has a full and intelligent knowledge of the act he is engaged in, a full knowledge of the property he possesses, an intelligent perception and understanding of the disposition he desires to make of it, and of the persons and objects he desires shall be the recipients of his bounty. It is not necessary that he collect all these in one review. If he understands in detail all he is about, and chooses, with understanding and reason, between one disposition and another, it is sufficient for the making of a will. If, from any cause, he is enfeebled in mind, so as to be incapable of knowing the property he possesses, of appreciating the effect of any disposition made by him of it, and of understanding to whom he intends to bequeath it, he is without the requisite testamentary capacity. He must have memory. A man in whom this faculty is totally extinguished cannot be said to possess understanding to any degree whatever or for any purpose. But his memory may be very defective; it may be greatly impaired, weakened by age or disease. He may not be able at all times to recollect the names, the persons or the families of those with whom he had been intimately acquainted, may at times ask idle questions and repeat those which had before been asked and answered; and yet his understanding may be sufficiently sound for many of the ordinary transactions of life. He may not have sufficient strength of memory and vigor of intellect to make and digest all the parts of a contract, and yet he may be competent to direct the distribution of his property by will.

"The question is not so much, What was the degree of memory possessed by the testator? as this, Had he a disposing memory? Was he capable of recalling the property he was about to bequeath, the manner of distributing it, and the objects of his bounty? To sum up the whole in the most simple and intelligent form, Were his mind and memory sufficiently sound to enable him to know and understand the business in which he was engaged at the time when he executed the will? Neither age, nor sickness, nor extreme distress or debility of body will affect the capacity to make a will if sufficient intelligence remains. The failure of memory is not sufficient to create incapacity, unless it be total or extend to his immediate family or property. The want of recollection of names is one of the earliest symptoms of decay of memory, but this failure may exist to a very great degree and yet the solid power of the understanding remain."

You will, therefore, observe that what the law defines as the mental capacity necessary to make a will is this: Were the mind and memory of the man who makes the will sufficiently sound to enable him to know and to understand the business in which he was engaged at the time of the execution of the will? Did he know what he was doing? Did he have a proper idea of the manner and form in which he was disposing of his property and the parties to whom he was making that disposition? That is all the mental capacity that the law calls for in cases of this kind. It is a rule based upon sound principle, for all men are not created alike. One man may possess a very high degree of intelligence, another man may not. One man may be highly educated, another may have no education. One man may be able to read and write and to talk learnedly and intelligently, and another may not. But because a man cannot read or write, or has not received a high degree of education, he is not thereby prevented from making a will. Otherwise, people who walk in humble life and have not received much education or school learning, might be judged incapable of transferring property which they have earned by their daily toil. All that the law requires is, Did the man at the time of making the will understand the business in which he was engaged, and the disposition he was about to make of his property. If he did, his testamentary capacity is established. And if, under all the facts in this case, you believe John Pennypacker possessed that degree of mental capacity, you are bound to render a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in support of the will.

Now, what is the evidence in this case? I do not propose to refer to the whole of this evidence, because that will be impossible. I would have to read over the notes of testimony to do that; you will recollect the details, for I can only refer to it in a general way, and I do so simply to explain to you the law which you are to apply to the facts in the case.

On the 7th of November, 1879, this paper was drawn up and signed by John Pennypacker. Under the Act of Assembly, every man of the age of twenty-one years has a right to make a will; and if he is a man of proper mental capacity, and attaches his name to a paper setting forth the disposition of his property, that is all that is necessary to be done by way of executing a will. It is not necessary to have subscribing witnesses to make a will good. The signature of a man to a paper of that kind can be proven; and, therefore, although there may be no subscribing witnesses upon a will, yet the moment that the paper is brought into court and witnesses are called who are acquainted with the signature, and they prove that this is the testator's signature, the law presumes that paper to be his will; and unless it is shown that there was a want of mental capacity to make that will, it will stand.

In the case before us, however, a paper is brought into this court, and its formal execution is proved by two subscribing witnesses. Now that does not make it a will so that no one can contest it; otherwise, there would be no issue framed for your consideration. But after this will is brought in and formally proved, the allegation is that the decedent had not mental capacity to make a will; and it is for this reason that this evidence has been produced for your consideration, and from which you are to determine the question of mental capacity of John Pennypacker.

There are various branches of testimony in this case. The one branch of testimony extends to a time before the signing of this paper; another relates to the time of the signing of the paper, and still another to a time subsequent to its execution.

You will, however, always bear in mind that whether evidence is given as of the time before or after, that evidence becomes important only as it tends to throw light upon the condition of the man at the actual time of the execution of the will. Although in this case the decedent may have been of unsound mind before the making of the will on November 7, 1879, and although he may have been of unsound mind after the making of this paper, yet, if from all the evidence in the cause it is shown to you that at the time he did sign it he had sufficient mental capacity to know what he was doing, to know what he was about, to know the disposition he was making of his property, in other words, that he had sufficient mental capacity to make a will on that day, your verdict must be for the plaintiffs.

I have said that I do not intend to refer in detail to the evidence. Excluding James and Abraham Pennypacker, there were ten or more witnesses called on behalf of the defendants for the purpose of proving want of mental capacity. In addition to these twelve there were three physicians called, to testify as to their opinion upon what was stated to them to have been proven in the case. On the part of the defendants there were fifteen witnesses or more as to the mental condition of decedent, the witnesses stating facts within their knowledge, and three of them as to opinions from these facts. I mean, now, as to the fact of mental capacity or want thereof. On the other side, I think, some twenty-six witnesses have been called for the purpose of proving that he was of sound mind, and that he had proper mental capacity.

When the physicians were on the stand there were certain questions asked of them by both sides. The object of putting the questions to the doctors was to obtain from them an opinion regarding the mental soundness or capacity of the testator. In the questions that were asked of them, the physicians were bound to assume that everything stated in those questions on either side had been proven. I will read to you these questions which were asked of the physicians, because in their questions the defendants claim that they have embodied the facts which they have shown; while the plaintiffs also claim that in the question they put to the physicians they have embodied the facts shown by them in the case.

The question asked by the defendants is as follows:

"If a person were so dull of understanding at eighteen years of age that with the usual educational advantages of the community, he would be in the infant class in school with children ten years his junior in age; if he was very slow of speech and could not hold a conversation; would speak five or six words and then break off in an incoherent way; could not carry on a conversation; never had any idea of looking after his business; and being the owner of one half of a valuable farm and the stock thereon, and interested in the product thereof, would not do any work or anything unless directed by some one else, and who had a habit of standing at a place and looking on the ground for hours at a time, and this habit continued during all his life; and who, on or about thirty years ago, had delusions, said he was going to die, and be buried on a certain day, and chopped wood for his funeral, and when asked what he was chopping wood for, said: 'I will die; on Sunday the funeral will be, and they must have some wood to cook;' if he had the habit of saying there was something behind the house, if he had been there, of course it would be all right, but so it was away; it was not there any more; and if you would ask him what it was, he would not know, and would talk much about mad dogs, in a wild, incoherent way; would pass persons whom he knew, and when addressed by them, would not answer; would stand in the middle of a public road when a vehicle was approaching, and, although in the road way of the vehicle, would dumbly stand and compel the vehicle to drive around him; would go out on the public road without his hat, in the month of July or August, in a very hot sun, motioning and gesticulating strangely and looking wildly, and grinning, and when addressed by a person in the carriage whom he knew, were not to answer, but were to seize the shaft of the carriage and were to exclaim, 'If I only would not have done what I did,' and in answer to a question as to what he had done, were to reply, 'Yah! Yah! Yah!' would find pictures the only objects of interest in a book, and would show no interest in a book or newspaper, excepting in the pictures contained in the book or newspaper; would sit for hours writing his name on a slate, and nothing but his name; would sit on the earth and play with stones and dirt; would not buy his own clothes, but have them bought by some one else; would do no business, although owning a considerable interest in a farm and farm stock; what would be your opinion as to the sanity or insanity of that man, from the time described in this question, when he had delusions thirty years ago, up to 1880, five years before his death, assuming that the facts set forth in this question are true?"

And the answer which was made to this question was that he was insane or an imbecile. The jury will recollect the form of the answer.

After this question had been put to the doctors, and answered, Mr. Baer, on behalf of the plaintiffs, put this question:

"Suppose this man was able to read and write, and when he was about twenty-nine or thirty years old, he and his brother would take a farm and live on it, his brother managing the farm, he working and assisting; that his conversation was sensible; that he knew everybody in the neighborhood; that he made no mistakes of persons or things; that the only habitual peculiarity was a stoppage of speech and want of fluency; that what he did was entirely rational; that in 1856 he was sick for a year and a half, and during the time of the sickness he was under the care of Dr. Martin, and that the only facts testified to as to delusions were that during that period of sickness, covering a year or a year and a half, he had told this story about the chopping wood and dying, and this story of the mad dog; that when he recovered he continued to live with his brother, working on the farm, talking to people he knew; that in 1879 Mr. Wanner and Mr. Zieber went out, and with him in a room by themselves he told them that he wanted to give his property to his brother for life, and to his brother's children after his brother's death; that Mr. Wanner and Zieber wrote that out; that he signed the will with his own hand, of which this is the will (indicating); that he could write with his right hand and left hand; that he went out to gatherings in the neighborhood; and that no delusions nor insanity which took the form of delusions developed itself until two years after the making of the will; and that his brother testified that three years after the making of the will, when the insanity had commenced, the testator, in answer to his brother's question, told him that Mr. Wanner and Mr. Zieber had written a will for him, thereby showing his recollection of a fact that took place three years before; would you say that such a man had not mind enough to make such a plain and easy disposition of his property as is contained in this will?"

And to this question the answer substantially was that they would think that such a man had mind enough to make so plain and easy a disposition of his property, and that he had mental capacity enough to make a will of this character.

Now, you will observe that when these questions were asked of the doctors they were not required to have a personal knowledge of the facts contained in the questions, but they were bound to assume the truth of everything that is stated in the questions. It is for the jury to say whether or not the facts contained in these questions are true; and if the facts contained in the questions are true, then the answers of these experts would be opinions for the guidance of the jury.

But you will observe that these experts answered both these questions "Yes;" so that, assuming the facts set forth in these questions by the one side, the decedent could make a will, and assuming the facts set forth by the other side to be true, he could not make a will. It is for the jury to say what are the facts in this case. The facts set forth in either of these questions are all facts of this case; and the jury, in examining all the evidence, will consider what both sides allege, and they for themselves will find what are the facts of the case. The opinions which witnesses in the case gave were also in part for the guidance of the jury; but the value of an opinion which a witness may give in a case of this kind depends altogether on the facts which the witness may have testified to. And, therefore, when you come to consider the evidence of a witness, the first question that you will ask is, What did the witness testify to? If he gave an opinion upon the mental capacity of John Pennypacker, upon what facts did he base that opinion? Were they sufficient in your judgment to warrant the opinion he did express? If they were, that opinion is entitled to some weight, but if the opinion was not based upon proper facts, the opinion is not entitled to weight, although you are bound to consider the facts shown.

In other words, when the issue is one of mental capacity, you are not blindly to follow the theories of one side or the other. You are to use your judgment, your intelligence, your reason, in sifting the truth from all the evidence in the case. You are to take each and every fact, for the mental capacity of a citizen is to be judged by his actions, his speech, his conduct, his behavior, and his appearance. You are to give every fact in this case due and proper consideration. You are to endeavor to harmonize everything the witnesses may have said; if you cannot, then you are to reject those facts which you cannot harmonize with each other; so that, you observe, this question of capacity comes right back to the jury, under the principles of the law which the court has laid down to you; and the question which you are to answer is, Was John Pennypacker, at the time of the making of the will, a man of proper testamentary capacity? Was he fit to make a will? Had he a proper idea of the business in which he was engaged? Did he know what he was about? What disposition he was making of his property and to whom it was made? And in judging of that, the most important testimony is his actions, his declarations, his habits, his appearance, his conduct.

What took place before that day and what took place after that day are only important as they bear upon the question of his testamentary capacity at the time of the execution of the will; because that is the period of time that your verdict must determine the man to have been of sound mind and disposing memory.

I have already referred to the number of witnesses in this cause, and to the fact that, in judging the value of their opinions, you are to consider the testimony upon which such opinion may be based. As to the credibility of witnesses, you have heard them testify; they have stated their occupations, where they lived, how long they have known the decedent, their powers of judging, the conversations they may or may not have had with him, and they have told you different things as to the conduct, behavior, acts and declarations of the testator which, in their mind, may have induced them on the one hand to believe that he wanted mental capacity, and on the other that he had mental capacity. It is for you to determine their credibility. You saw them on the stand; you saw their appearance, their character, the extent of their information, and the manner in which they testified, and as you find so will your verdict be, either for the plaintiff or defendant. If you find that he possessed proper mental capacity on the 7th of November, 1879, your verdict will be for the plaintiffs; if otherwise, for defendants.

[I desire to call your attention also to what took place on the 7th of November, 1879:

From the testimony it appears that Messrs. Wanner and Zieber went out to the house of John Pennypacker on that day. It is said by those two witnesses that at the time of the making of the disposition of this property there was no one present but John Pennypacker; that upon being asked by Mr. Wanner what was wanted, he replied that he wished to make a will, and that thereupon, and in answer to questions of Mr. Wanner, he stated how he desired the will to be made, and dictated substantially what is set forth in this present paper as to the disposition of his property; that Mr. Zieber wrote down these facts; that having written them the will was read to John Pennypacker, and explained to him by Mr. Wanner, and that thereupon he replied that that was the way he wanted it; that thereupon witnesses were called in and the will was signed by the witnesses.

There is some conflict of testimony as to whether the will was signed before the witnesses came in or after; but at all events it appears from the evidence that the will was signed by the witnesses in the presence of John Pennypacker; that he attached his signature to the will. Mr. Wanner, Mr. Zieber, James Fry, and Charles Rans, are the attorney, the scrivener and the two subscribing witnesses. They all say that at the time of the making of that paper John Pennypacker was of proper mental capacity; that he knew what he was about, and that in their judgments, he was fit at the time that paper was drawn up to make a will.

No other witnesses are called in this case to show anything that was said or done there upon that occasion, except these four people, and these four people agree in the one fact, that he possessed sufficient mental capacity. Has their testimony been shaken by the testimony submitted here before or after, or is their testimony entitled to its full weight? If you believe their testimony, that John Pennypacker was fit to make a will, it is immaterial whether John Pennypacker was sound or unsound before or after, or before or after that day. If he was sound in mind and knew the business in which he was engaged, and what he was doing, then this will must stand, and the verdict must be for the plaintiffs.

If, however, after a consideration of all the evidence in this case, you should come to the conclusion that upon that occasion John Pennypacker did not possess such mental capacity, your verdict must be for the defendants. If he was of sound mind, memory and understanding upon that day, it is immaterial to whom he gave this property; for when a man is of sound mind and memory the law permits him to will his property to whomsoever he pleases in his own family or elsewhere; it is his own property and no one else's.]

I think now I have gone over all the principles in this case. You will take the legal principles which I have laid down to you, and in the light of these principles you will look at the facts in this case, after a careful consideration of all evidence, you will say how your verdict shall be—whether for the plaintiffs or for the defendants.

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs.

The assignments of error specified the answers to the points quoted, and the portion of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. Benjamin F. Dettra, J. Howard Jacobs and H. Willis Bland, for plaintiffs in error:

Richard owed the highest good faith to John. John was his feeble minded brother, to whom he stood in the relation of a natural guardian. Besides, he was his cotenant, and for thirty years had taken the fruits of the farm, which they owned in common, to himself without account.

In defining fiduciary relations, Rapalje & Laurence, in their Law Dictionary, title, Fiduciary, say:

"Such is the relation between trustee and cestui que trust, attorney and client, principal and agent, and generally, wherever from the position of two persons, one of them repoees confidence in the other."

"Tenants in common by descent are placed in confidential relations to each other by operation of law, as to the joint property; and the same duties are imposed as if a joint trust were created by contract between them, or the act of a third party. Being associated in interest as tenants in common, an implied obligation exists to sustain the common interest. This reciprocal obligation will be enforced in equity as a trust. These relations and confidence bind all to put forth their best exertions, and to embrace every opportunity to protect and secure the common interest, and forbid the assumption of a hostile attitude by either."

Freeman, Cotenancy, § 151; Tisdale v. Tisdale, 2 Sneed, 599; Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. 388; Lee v. Fox, 6 Dana, 171; Lafferty v. Turley, 3 Sneed, 182; Saunders v. Woolman, 7 Lea, 302; Williams v. Gideon, 7 Heisk. 620.

While equity does not deny the possibility of valid transactions between the two parties, yet because every fiduciary relation implies a condition of superiority held by one of the parties over the other, in every transaction between them, by which the superior party obtains a possible benefit, equity raises a presumption against its validity, and casts upon that party the burden of proving affirmatively its compliance with equitable requisites, and of thereby overcoming the presumption.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 956.

The jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity over the dealings of persons standing in certain fiduciary relations, has always been regarded as one of a most salutary description. The principles applicable to the more familiar relations of this character have been long settled by many well known decisions; but the courts have always been careful not to fetter this useful jurisdiction by defining the exact limits of its exercise.

Tate v. Williamson, L. R. 1 Eq. 528, 536.

The relation and the duties involved in it need not be legal; it may be moral, social, domestic or merely personal.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 956.

That a strict legal relation need not exist is shown by the following cases:

Revett v. Harvey, 1 Sim. & Stu. 502; Allfrey v. Allfrey, 1 Macn. & G. 87, 98; Espey v. Lake, 10 Hare, 260, 262; Beasley v. Magrath, 2 Sch. & Lef. 31.

The same general principle extends, with more or less force, to dealings between a physician and patient, a spiritual adviser and penitent, vendor and vendee of land, husbands and wives, and persons occupying their position, partners, and indeed all persons who occupy a position of trust and confidence, of influence and dependence, in fact, although not perhaps in law.

Pom. Eq. Jur. § 963; Rhodes v. Bate, L. R. 1 Ch. App. Cas. 252, 257.

No part of the jurisdiction of the court is more useful than that which it exercises in watching and controlling transactions between persons standing in a relation of confidence to each other; and this part of the jurisdiction of the court cannot be too freely applied, either as to the persons between whom or the circumstances in which it is applied.

Billage v. Southee, 9 Hare, 534, 540.

This court has adopted and enforced the most advanced equity doctrines upon this subject.

Miskey's App. 107 Pa. 611.

Whenever from such relation considerable authority or influence necessarily exists on the one side, and a corresponding reliance and confidence is placed on the other, a party will not be suffered to abuse this authority or influence by extracting any advantage to himself.

Darlington's App. 86 Pa. 518.

Influence is a thing which is assumed as between father and child; not that the influence is assumed to be unduly exercised, but that the influence is assumed; and it is then thrown upon the father, if he takes any benefit, to prove what is called the righteousness of the transaction.

Turner v. Collins, L. R. 7 Ch. App. Cas. 329.

The question is, not whether he knew what he was doing, had done, or proposed to do, but how the intention was produced; whether all that care and providence was placed round him as against those who advised him which from their situation and relation with respect to him they were bound to exert on his behalf.

Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273.

Wherever one person obtains by voluntary donation a large pecuniary benefit from another the burden of proving that the transaction is righteous falls on the person taking the benefit.

Hoghton v. Hoghton, 15 Beav. 278.

Persons standing in a confidential relation towards others cannot entitle themselves to hold benefits which those others may have conferred upon them, unless they can show to the satisfaction of the court that the person by whom the benefits have been conferred had competent and independent advice in conferring them.

Rhodes v. Bate, L.R. 1 Ch. App. Cas, 252; Savery v. King, 5 H. L. Cas. 627; Comstock v. Comstock, 57 Barb. 453; Boyd v. De La Montagnie, 73 N.Y. 498; Boyd v. Boyd, 66 Pa. 283; Cuthbertson's App. 97 Pa. 163.

It is sufficient to invalidate any instrument by a person of weak intellect, to show that the person in whose favor it is framed held a situation of confidence with respect to the maker of such instrument.

Jones App. 11 W. N. C. 261.

In Darlington's Appeal, 86 Pa. 518, the instance was one of husband and wife, and Miskey's Appeal, 107 Pa. 611, one of father and son; and the general doctrine is applied to transactions between other near relations: as gifts from a sister to a brother.

Thornton v. Ogden, 32 N. J. Eq. 723; Hewitt v. Crane, 2 Halst. (N. J.) Eq. 159, 631; Sears v. Shafer, 6 N. Y. 268.

In these cases consanguinity has not been allowed to prevent the presumption, but the beneficiaries have all been required by the law to show affirmatively that the benefit to them was not a result of the abnormal influence inseparable from the confidential relation.

Where the alleged testator is shown by evidence to be weak in mind, whether arising from age, bodily infirmity, great sorrow or other cause tending to produce such weakness, though not sufficient to create testamentary incapacity, and the person whose advice has been sought and taken receives a large benefit under the instrument propounded as a will, it must be shown affirmatively that the alleged testator had a full understanding of the nature of the disposition contained in it.

Cuthbertson's App. and Boyd v. Boyd, supra; Frew v. Clarke, 80 Pa. 180.

The rule is applicable not only to one who manually prepares the will, but to one who is instrumental to its preparation and assists in its execution.

Rea's Estate, 11 W. N. C. 80; Wilson's App. 99 Pa. 545.

In Wistar's Appeal, 54 Pa. 63, Judge Allison, in an opinion affirmed by the supreme court, speaking of dealings between persons who sustain the fiduciary relation, says:

"Where a claim is sought to be established by one holding a fiduciary relation to another, against the person or estate which he is required to protect, the burden of establishing the claim, both as to its fairness and consideration, rests upon him who asserts the demand. The principle on which courts act in regard to such claims, stands independent of the ingredients of deceit, imposition or unconscionable advantage, upon a motive of general public policy, and is designed to protect parties against overconfidence in those who have the care and management of their person, property or estate."

Where there is no evidence of infirmity of mind at the execution of a will, and the subscribing witnesses are uncontradicted, infirmity may be inferred from anterior and subsequent facts.

Irish v. Smith, 8 Serg. & R. 581.

Subscribing witnesses are not always the best to prove the sanity of the testator.

McTaggart v. Thompson, 14 Pa. 155; Irish v. Smith, 8 Serg. & R. 581; Rambler v. Tryon, 7 Serg. & R. 90.

Where the testimony is voluminous and the jury would naturally rely upon, and be largely influenced by the rehearsal of it by the court, it is important that the résumé should be as full on one side as the other, so that the jury may not be misled.

Gehman v. Erdman, 105 Pa. 371.

A tendency to mislead in the general tenor of the charge, although no particular portion of it be erroneous, is ground of reversal.

Wash. Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Rosenberger, 8 W. N. C. 16; 33 Legal Int. 338.

Actual violence need not be established.

Messrs. Howard P. Wanner, Jeff. Snyder and Geo. F. Baer, for defendants in error:

The language of the court in answering the contestants' eighth point is a correct statement of the law as the supreme court has time and again declared it.

Tawney v. Long, 76 Pa. 115; Stokes v. Miller, 10 W. N. C. 241.

Where the testator is shown to be of weak mind, without regard to the cause or causes from which that weakness has arisen, although it be not sufficient in itself to wholly destroy testamentary capcity, and the person by whom, or under whose advice, the will has been written, being a stranger to the testator's blood, receives a legacy or bequest, large as compared with the testator's estate, the burden of proof shifts from the contestants to the proponent of the will.

Caldwell v. Anderson, 104 Pa. 199.

Per Curiam:

All questions relating to the mental incapacity of the testator were correctly submitted to the jury. As the evidence failed to show any undue influence on his mind at the time he executed the will the issue of undue influence was properly withdrawn from the jury.

We discover no error in the answers to the points nor in the general charge.

Judgment affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania.

1. To maintain an action on an administration bond it is not necessary to push the administrator to insolvency.
2. A judgment at law or a decree of the orphans' court ascertaining the amount of the personal responsibility of the administrator to the particular creditor suing is a sufficient prerequisite.
3. Notice by a surety in an administration bond, before adjudication, to persons who by the adjudication are found to be creditors of the estate, that the administratrix is wasting the estate and that all claims against the estate must be pushed at once or he will not be responsible for losses, is ineffectual to relieve him from liability to such creditors.
4. An administration bond is not within the provisions of the Act of May 14, 1874.

(Argued March 2, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 151, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of debt. Affirmed.

This was an action by the Commonwealth, at the instance of William L. Rhoads and Adam Rhoads, against Daniel K. B. Kauffman, on a joint and several administration bond of Sallie E. Guldin, administratrix of Simon P. Guldin, deceased, in which the defendant was a surety.

The facts as they appeared at the trial were stated in the charge of the court and in the opinion filed upon discharging a rule for a new trial.

The defendant made at the trial the following offers of evidence:

"Defendant proposes to show by the witness on the stand that the signature to a notice dated April 12, 1878, is his signature; that he served said notice, or a copy of the same, upon each of the plaintiffs in this suit about the time of the date of said notice. The notice is as follows:

"'Reading, Pa., April 12, 1878.

"'Dear Sir: I am one of the bail of Sallie E. Guldin, on her administration bond. She is exceedingly slow in pushing matters to a settlement, and I am of opinion that the estate is being wasted. You will please take notice that all claims against said estate must be pushed at once, or I shall not regard myself responsible for losses that may accrue. I want you to push your claim in ten days.

"'Yours Truly,
"'Daniel K. B. Kauffman.'

"To be followed by evidence of proceedings in the Orphans' Court of Berks County, to compel Sallie E. Schaeffer, administratrix of Simon P. Guldin, deceased, to furnish counter security; and also to be followed by evidence of the solvency of Sallie Schaeffer at the time of the service of the notice, and for at least three years thereafter; thus for the further purpose of showing that had the plaintiffs pursued their remedies, their claims could have been collected by the plaintiffs without injury to the defendant in this action."

Rejected. First assignment of error.

"The defendant renews his offer of proof of notice and service of notice as aforesaid; to be followed by evidence of proceedings in the Orphans' Court of Berks County to compel Sallie E. Schaeffer, administratrix of Simon P. Guldin, deceased, to furnish counter security; with the order of the court refusing said application, thus decreeing in fact that said administratrix at the time was neither wasting nor mismanaging said estate, nor insolvent; to be followed by showing by the records of the orphans' court that at the time of the service of the said notice she was the owner of three tracts of lands, one situate in Oley Township of the value of $20,195; another in Earl Township of the value of $330; another in Earl Township of the value of $217; this to be followed by proof that after the service of said notice Jacob Senger did proceed upon his decree, and on or about the 29th day of March, 1880, he did receive from said administratrix amounts of the fa. fas.; this to be followed by a judgment and execution in the Court of Common Pleas of Berks County, by which it appears that on May 12, 1881, the sheriff sold goods of said Sallie E. Schaeffer upon said execution, to the value of $1,115.70; and to be followed by showing that the first application for a fi fa. of these plaintiffs was made on or about the 12th day of February, 1881, almost three years after said notice was served, and upwards of fourteen months after the final confirmation of the auditor's report and decrees by the court."

Rejected. Second assignment of error.

The charge of the court was as follows:

"In this case your duty is very plain. Nearly all the offers of testimony made by the defendant have been ruled out by the court. The only question remaining is the liability of the defendant upon the bond. It appears that on the 26th of April, 1878, Sallie E. Guldin was appointed administratrix of the estate of Simon P. Guldin, and she gave a bond to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in the sum of $5,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of her duties as administratrix. It is not necessary to read the bond, for it has already been read to you. She gave as her bail John F. Guldin and Daniel K. B. Kauffman.

"This bond is a joint and several bond. It also appears from the testimony produced before you that there was an account filed in the orphan's court by this administratrix, and auditor's report had; and that the orphans' court adjudicated and settled that Adam Rhoads was entitled to the sum of $610.83, a claim which he had against the estate of Simon P. Guldin; and that also William L. Rhoads was entitled to the sum of $311.68 for a claim which he had against the estate. This action of the orphans' court is final on the question of the amount; and since these decrees were entered against Sallie E. Guldin, the administratrix, for these amounts, and the administratrix did not pay them, the creditors had a right to proceed upon the official bond given, and recover against the bail.

"As this bond is joint and several, suit is brought against one of the sureties, which plaintiffs had a right to do; and this action is against Daniel K. B. Kauffman. Calculations have been made of the exact amounts due in these cases; and it is ascertained that the correct amount due this day coming to Adam Rhoads is $531.81, and the amount coming to William L. Rhoads is $323.03.

"It is necessary in cases of this kind to render a verdict in this form, first, in favor of the Commonwealth, for the sum of $5,000, the penalty in the bond, and then to render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, Adam Rhoads, in the sum of $531.81, the amount of damages assessed and costs accrued; and in favor of William L. Rhoads for the sum of $323.03, the amount of damages assessed and costs accrued; so that if you believe this evidence that has been laid before you, and there is nothing to contradict it, it is all record testimony, your verdict will be as indicated by the court. It will not be necessary for you to leave the box. So far as the legal questions and the rulings of the court are concerned, these will be for the court to review hereafter, and your duty will have been done by rendering the verdict."

Verdict and judgment accordingly for the plaintiff.

The defendant obtained a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted.

Upon discharging it, ERMENTROUT, J., filed the following opinion:

"To maintain suit upon the administration bond it is not necessary to first push the administrator to insolvency. A judgment at law or a decree of the orphans' court ascertaining the amount of the personal responsibility of the administrator to the particular creditor suing, is all that is necessary as a prerequisite to such suit. Commonwealth v. Stub, 11 Pa. 150.

"In the present case the auditor's report upon the administration account was confirmed December 5, 1879, although filed May 19, 1876. On February 14, 1881, the orphans' court decreed to Adam Rhoads $610.83 and William L. Rhoads $311.68. The court, subsequently reviewing the account and report, directed fi. fas. to issue. This was done and returns of nulla bona were made. The plaintiffs were therefore in proper position to sue.

"The defense is that on April 12, 1878, Kauffman served upon plaintiffs notice in writing to push their claims or he would consider himself discharged. The answer is that they were in the orphans' court doing precisely what was asked of them, and even if they had not done so, the Act of May 14, 1874, upon which reliance is placed, does not apply. The administration bond is not within its provisions. It is not an instrument in writing for the forbearance or payment of money at any future time, nor was the amount therein to be collected. The liability of a surety in such a bond is contingent, requiring certain proceedings to be had before any liability results. When the notice was given no suit could lie upon it. The court, on October 21, 1878, decreed that the administratrix was not wasting or mismanaging.

"The only step to protect the bail was the entering up by the plaintiffs of the decrees against the real estate of the administratrix; and this the bail complained of as being done without his knowledge or consent. The bail does not seem to have taken steps to protect himself. As to the alleged agreement of forbearance to bring suit against the principal, there is no evidence of such fact. It is not shown to us how any Statute of Limitations can apply to this suit."

Messrs. Henry O. Schrader and Hiram Y. Kaufman, for plaintiff in error:

Prior to 1874 a request on the part of the surety to the creditor to proceed and collect from the principal was sufficient, provided the request was positive and accompanied with a declaration that unless complied with the surety would consider himself discharged.

By the Act of May 14, 1874, "The surety or sureties in any instrument in writing for the forbearance or payment of money at any future time shall not be discharged from their liability upon the same by reason of notice from the surety or sureties to the creditor or creditors to collect the amount thereof from the principal in said instruments, unless such notice shall be in writing, and signed by the party giving the same."

We see no good reason why the Act of May 14, 1874, should not apply to an administration bond. It applies to all instruments in writing for the forbearance or payment of money.

"If a creditor, after being requested to bring suit against the principal debtor, refuse or neglect to do so, the surety is discharged, provided the request be positive and accompanied with a declaration that, unless complied with, the surety will consider himself discharged."

Greenawalt v. Kreider, 3 Pa. 264. See also Wilson v. Glover, 3 Pa. 404.

In order to discharge a surety notice to sue the principal must be clearly proved, and shown to the identical claim.

Wolleshlare v. Searles, 45 Pa. 45; Donough v. Boyer, 31 Legal Int. 286.

The notice must be in writing, and in the most explicit terms that he will otherwise hold himself discharged.

Fidler v. Hershey, 90 Pa. 363; Commonwealth v. Wilson, 7 W. N. C. 62.

The notice must be given by one duly authorized, at a time when the creditor has it in his power to proceed.

Conrad v. Foy, 68 Pa. 381.

Where the circumstances show that the creditors could not by legal proceedings have made the debt out of the principal the surety will not be discharged.

Weiler v. Hoch, 25 Pa. 525.

The offers were made to bring the plaintiff in error within these rules.

To hold a surety, after notice from him to proceed, etc., against the principal, it is necessary for the creditor to show that he used due diligence in proceeding against said principal. What is due diligence in pursuing the principal, in pursuance of a notice from the surety, may be gathered from Simpson v. Bovard, 74 Pa. 362.

Where a creditor has the means of satisfaction, either actually or potentially, in his hands or within his control, and does not choose to retain it, the surety is discharged.

Coatesville v. Hope, 1 Chester Co. R. 57.

If these plaintiffs had exercised only ordinary diligence they could have collected their claims from the administratrix. They could only have lost their claims by the grossest negligence. The notice from defendant should have put them on their guard. After such notice to them, if any loss results, it is because they utterly disregarded that ordinary caution which every person ought to possess.

(No counsel appeared for defendant in error).

Per Curiam:

There was no error in rejecting the evidence offered by the defendant below. It was wholly insufficient to prevent a recovery on the facts proved.

Judgment affirmed.

Solomon CLOSE et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
Noel H. BENJAMIN.

1. A voluntary conveyance to a child by a father who is indebted at the time is not ipso facto fraudulent and void, under the Statute of 13 Eliz. chap. 5. If the grantor had other property at the time or was otherwise of sufficient ability to pay all his debts, it is for the jury to say whether there was any design to defraud creditors, and if there was not, the conveyance is valid.*

2. One who was sick in bed and expected to die, was advised by counsel to convey his property by deed instead of devising it by will. Accordingly he conveyed his real estate to his son and died. He had at the time more than enough money in bank to pay his debts. After his death a creditor (who had obtained, after the conveyance, judgment for a pre-existing debt) sold the land in execution as the property of the father, bought it in and brought ejectment for it against the son. Held, that the question whether the conveyance was intended to defraud creditors or not was properly submitted to the jury.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before SASSAMAN, P. J., were stated in his charge to the jury, which was as follows:

"You have been sworn to try an issue joined between Solomon Close and George W. Kershner as plaintiffs, and Noel H. Benjamin, defendant. It is an action of ejectment, and is brought for the recovery of the possession of a small parcel of ground situate on the northwest corner of Thirteenth and Cotton Streets, in this City of Reading. It is said to contain seventy-six feet front on Cotton Street, and on its western line to extend back 150 feet, and on the eastern line towards the north to extend back, I think, 170 or 180 feet. It is the parcel of land described in the plaintiffs' writ.

"It appears that on the third day of April, 1875, one J. O. Thomas and wife conveyed two lots, as they are called, thirty-eight feet front on Cotton Street, to H. D. Benjamin; and that on the first day of April, 1875, A. W. Viven conveyed two lots of like front on Cotton Street to H. D. Benjamin; and thus on the third of April, 1875, H. D. Benjamin became the owner of this entire lot. H. D. Benjamin appears at the time to have been in litigation with one Zell, who survived one Eshelman, and who had a claim against him which was then being litigated. That litigation continued and by the records given in evidence it appears that in 1876 there was a verdict rendered in favor of the defendant, H. D. Benjamin.

*See Low v. Wartman (N. J.), 5 Cent. Rep. 641.

"Some time thereafter, in December of that year or the next year, H. D. Benjamin received an injury, and after he had received that injury he seemed to have been physically incapable of being communicated with, to any large extent, and the case went to the supreme court where it was languishing until 1879, when it was decided in favor of Zell. The judgment which had been rendered on the verdict in favor of H. D. Benjamin became thereby reversed in the supreme court. It then came back again into this court in 1879 and was prosecuted to a verdict again, which resulted in favor of Mr. Zell. When this last verdict was obtained, there was a motion made for a new trial, and the case hung in this court on that motion from 1879 until the 31st of January, 1881. On that day, if I understand the evidence rightly, there was an attachment execution issued and served on Garret B. Stevens; a fi. fa. was issued at the same time. The property in question was levied upon and was condemned. It was afterwards sold on a vend. ex. which was issued subsequently to the fi. fa., and the property was sold to H. W. Bland for $5, which was appropriated to the payment of costs. In pursuance of that sale on the 23d of April, 1881, Sheriff Gerhard, of this county, made a deed in favor of H. W. Bland, and Mr. Bland on the third day of August, 1881, deeded two of those lots.

"It seems that this property was regarded as four lots, each having a front apparently of nineteen feet; and two of those lots were deeded by Mr. Bland, the purchaser, to Thomas Zell. Mr. Bland was acting as the attorney in the former suit for Mr. Zell, and also in this execution; and Mr. Bland, as attorney, bought for his client, and afterwards conveyed it to him in one deed, dated August 3, 1881, and other deeds dated October 24, 1882, so that the property vested in Thomas Zell, in 1882, in October. Before that time, on the 7th day of September, 1881, Thomas Zell and wife conveyed the lots first conveyed to him by Mr. Bland, to one Hinchman; and he, on the 18th day of December, 1883, reconveyed these lots. It seems that Thomas Zell then became the owner of these two lots, and on the following day he and his wife conveyed them to Solomon Close and George W. Kershner, the plaintiffs in this case.

"The case standing in this form, without anything else being shown, the title of this property would vest in the plaintiffs; and upon the plaintiffs' prima facie case there would be no question but that the jury would have to render a verdict in favor of plaintiffs. A plaintiff in ejectment must always recover on his own title.

"When the case rested there and the plaintiffs were upon their prima facie case entitled to your verdict, the defendant said that so far as the plaintiffs' showing was concerned, their case could not be sustained in law. The defendant shows that there was a conveyance made by H. D. Benjamin while he was in possession of these lots on the 4th day of September, 1877, to one Noel H. Benjamin, the defendant herein.

"H. D. Benjamin was the defendant in the Zell suit; but in the suit here Noel H. Benjamin is the party against whom the ejectment is brought, who is admitted to be in possession of these lots. [H. D. Benjamin and wife made a deed to Noel H. Benjamin, on the 4th of September, 1877, which was a long time before there was a judgment entered in the case of Zell against Benjamin,—that first suit spoken of here as having terminated in 1879. The effect of the judgment of the supreme court in 1879 was the award of a venire facias de novo, which resulted in a new trial. This case, therefore, remained undetermined in 1879; and this deed of H. D. Benjamin to Noel H. Benjamin was made two years prior to 1879, and having been given about two years prior thereto, the defendant having a prior deed from H. D. Benjamin to the deed of the plaintiffs, instead of the plaintiffs being entitled to a verdict at that point the defendant, upon his own showing, would be entitled to a verdict at the hands of the jury.]

"The plaintiffs say that there is such a deed, but answer that the deed is void in law; and for that purpose they opened their rebutting case by calling Mr. Yarrington, who went along to the execution of the Noel H. Benjamin deed and witnessed it. There was no consideration passed for the deed in the presence of Mr. Yarrington, nor was the deed delivered in his presence. So far as his evidence is concerned he knew very little about the deed transaction.

"Mr. Snyder is called next. He testified that he was a notary public at that time, and that he took the acknowledgment of the deed of H. D. Benjamin to Noel H. Benjamin; that he saw no money pass, and no deed delivered there, and that Noel H. Benjamin was not present. There was therefore nothing elicited on the part of the witnesses, Yarrington and Snyder. But to further maintain their contention they called Noel H. Benjamin, who said he was a son of H. D. Benjamin, had met with a severe accident and was very sick therefrom, and that after having received that injury he could not be out of bed for a long time; that he made a deed to him, while he was bedfast, on the 4th of September, 1877; that he gave no money for it; in fact was a voluntary conveyance.

"By a voluntary conveyance is meant where one man makes a deed to another without giving anything for it. Where a man has debts at the time of making such a deed, he comes under the law which was enacted in England under the reign of Queen Elizabeth in the thirteenth year of her reign. It reads as follows, the law having been extended to this country: 'Be it declared, ordained and enacted, by authority of this present Parliament, that all and every feoffment, gift, grant, alienation, bargain and conveyance of land, tenements, hereditaments, goods and chattels or any of them by writing or otherwise, and every bond, suit judgment and execution at any time had or made sithence the beginning of the Queen's Majesty's reign that now is or at any time hereafter to be had or made to or for any intent or purpose before declared and expressed shall be from henceforth admitted and taken (only as against that person or persons, his or their heirs, successors, executors, administrators and assigns and every of them whose actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties, forfeitures, heriots, mortuaries and reliefs by such guileful, covinous or fraudulent devices and practices, as is aforesaid are, shall, or might be in any way disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded) to be clearly and utterly void, frustrated and of none effect. Any pretense, color, feigned consideration, expressing of use, or any other matter or thing to the contrary notwithstanding.'

"The sum and substance of this Act is that where there is a fraudulent conveyance, or where there is a conveyance with intent to defraud, hinder or delay creditors from collecting their debts, all such conveyances of land are void; and it has been held in England as well as in the State of Pennsylvania, more strenuously in New York, and I believe in several of the other States where it is considered that the Statute of Elizabeth is in force, that where there is a deed of this kind it is absolutely void, as against creditors it is also held to be absolutely void.

"Where the deed is made with the intent to defraud, hinder and delay or defeat creditors it has been held to be void. This matter has been before our higher courts very frequently. Where a man has outstanding debts, makes a conveyance of his property so that his creditors may be hindered, delayed or defeated in the collection of their claims, the conveyance is absolutely void as to those creditors. If a man is indebted to another, and at the time makes a deed to another without consideration or without a valuable consideration, and the main intent and purpose is to defeat his creditors, such deed is void, although the land may have a record title in the name of another.

"If an execution is issued against a property to sell the right, title or interest of the man who was the owner, and he conveyed it thus to get it out of the reach of his creditors, such a sale brings a good title to the man buying and the man in whose favor the deed was made.

["Where there is a voluntary conveyance without consideration, the law presumes, in the absence of other proof, that there was a present intent to defeat creditors; but such a presumption is an inference from the facts supposed to exist, and is only what in the law is called presumptio juris, which may be rebutted by other and competent evidence.

"It is not of that class of presumptions which in the laws are called presumptio juris et de jure, which are said to be unrebuttable and unassailable in the law.]

"For instance: where one man is indebted to another, either of record or under seal, and twenty years have run without there being a renewal of the debt or a new promise, the law presumes that debt to have been paid, because it is reasonable to suppose that a man would not allow a debt to hang that long without having had satisfaction. Under the Statute of Limitations the presumption is that there was payment made; and this limitation of the law is made to help sustain the presumption.

["These presumptions in the law are intended for various uses: to prevent improper litigations, improper disputes, or prevent frauds that might be perpetrated if there was no such statutes. We say to you that while this is only one of that class of presumptions, the law presumes that it was with the intent to defeat creditors, and it is permissible for the courts to admit evidence to show that it was not the intent.]

"When the plaintiffs rested their case they were entitled to a verdict at your hands. The defendant, however, offered in evidence a deed which is absolute upon its face and is recorded, and which changes the case. [At the point where the defendant rested the defendant would have been entitled to your verdict for the land described in the writ; but the plaintiffs rebutted that evidence by calling the witnesses, Yarrington, Snyder and Noel H. Benjamin, who says it was a voluntary conveyance to him without a consideration. So far as Noel knew, his father had no other property to pay any debts; that is, there was no other visible property or real estate left to pay any debts with. At that time, there being no real estate and no visible property for the payment of debts, the claim, as contended for by the plaintiffs, was in full force and effect. Of course it was in litigation. The one part claimed a considerable amount of money which was eventually recovered, and the other party said it was not owing at all; but as the final result turned out, there was a judgment for $2,350, so that the final event of the suit would show there was an actual existing debt. Where such is the case the testimony of Noel H. Benjamin becomes important. The law raises the presumption, because there was an outstanding debt at the time H. D. Benjamin conveyed this property without any payment of money, that it was a fraudulent conveyance, because if it existed, they, the plaintiffs' grantors, or those before them, would have been hindered or delayed in the collection of their debt, and because they would have been hindred or delayed in the collection of their debt, the law would presume that it was fraudulent and would make the deed void.

"This being however a presumptio juris it may be rebutted; and in order to continue the contention of the parties the defendant turns around and rebuts the rebutting case of the other party again.]

"Before proceeding further with the case as it stood after these parties were examined with their record evidence, showing the disposal of the one property to Mr. Stevens, I want to say to you that the plaintiff would again be entitled to your verdict for the lands described in the writ.

"There is where the hitch in the case comes; up to this time the one or the other party would be entitled to a verdict.

"First the plaintiffs and then the defendant is entitled to a verdict; and then there is another showing which entitles the plaintiffs to a verdict.

["The defendant comes in again and asks leave to rebut, which is done by the evidence of H. D. Benjamin, from whom it was learned as well as in part from the cross examination of Noel H. Benjamin and Mr. Stevens, that at the time the conveyance was made to Noel H. Benjamin, H. D. Benjamin was sick in bed and expected to die, having received a very painful and serious injury; and being in expectation of dying, Geo. F. Baer, a member of this Bar, was called in to consult as to the making of a will and disposing of this property in contemplation of death, and while he was called, in speaking about a will, the question arose as to the expense of a will being made here. Mr. Benjamin, as soon as he could move with his family, intending to go to the State of New York, and upon the advice of Mr. Baer, instead of making a will, conveying this property; there was a conveyance made transferring the property to these two children, the one on Cotton Street to the son Noel, and the other on Fifth Street, to his daughter Ella, which was soon after, in 1878, conveyed to G. B. Stevens, who in part of the consideration gave a mortgage for $4,500.

"It is in evidence that before the failure of the Bushong Bank, and at the time of these conveyances, H. D. Benjamin had other personal properties; that he had $10,000 in the Bushong Bank and that he had other money outstanding. No one that I have heard has contended, or would be able to contend successfully in the law, that if this property was conveyed for the purpose of hindering, defeating, defrauding or delaying the collection of the Zell claim against H. D. Benjamin, or any other, that these two deeds would not be fraudulent. In contemplation of law, if it was for the purpose, they would have been fraudulent.

"If there was an entire absence of purpose to defraud, and done under the advice of counsel, the party having enough and ample property, as Benjamin testified, and that property was not removed and it was forthcoming at the time when the judgment was really recovered and finally settled, I cannot say to you as a matter of law, that such a transaction would be fraudulent. While a man must be honest and just before he is generous, a man is the absolute controller of his own property, and he can make just such disposition of it as he sees proper, either by will or conveyance instead of a will, so long as he pays his debts; and a man must always pay his debts before he gives his property away. If in this case you are satisfied under this final rebutting evidence of the defendant that H. D. Benjamin had other means and other property, and had made provisions for the payment of this debt, whether the money was in the hands of the Bushong Bank, and if that failed and the other money remained which he kept under his control or he kept the control of his property as long as he would live, and if you believe it was really so and there was an entire absence of purpose and interest in the transaction to hinder, delay and defraud the creditor he had, no creditor can come in and say that the purpose was to defeat and defraud].

"It is a question for you. [If it was not for this rebutting evidence the court would have been obliged to say to you that the verdict would have to be in favor of the plaintiffs. If you believe this rebutting evidence to be true: that there was money enough in the hands of Benjamin, and that he was ready and willing to pay at that time, without wishing to hinder, delay and defraud, your verdict will be in favor of the defendant. If you believe that under the rebutting evidence there was an entire absence of purpose which in effect would hinder or delay the creditors, then it would not be proper to take away this property from Noel H. Benjamin and give it away to others.]

"If you believe the other way, that the case stands as it was presented by the plaintiffs in their rebutting evidence, then the plaintiffs are entitled to your verdict for the property described in the writ. If you believe that there was a provision made here, and the provision was sufficient at the time the conveyance was made, and there was ample money in the hands of this man outside of the conveyance of the properties, and there remained enough until this judgment became finally conclusive to pay it, your verdict would be in favor of the defendant.

"If you believe there was an absolute fraud in the conveyances, your verdict will be in favor of the plaintiffs for the property described in the writ."

The court then read and answered the plaintiffs' points as follows :

1. If the jury believe that at the time the lots in suit here were sold by the sheriff on the judgment of Thomas Zell against Hiram D. Benjamin, he, Hiram D. Benjamin, had removed to the State of New York and had no real estate or other property in the State of Pennsylvania in his name, which could be taken in execution to pay Zell's judgment, and if the jury find that Noel H. Benjamin paid nothing to his father, Hiram D. Benjamin, for the lots in suit here, the sheriff's sale passed a perfect title and the verdict must be for the plaintiffs, Solomon Close and George W. Kershner.

Ans. We cannot say so as the case will be submitted to the jury.

2. There is no evidence in this case that Hiram D. Benjamin had any property in his own name at the time of the sheriff's sale which could have been levied upon to pay Thomas Zell's judgment; and it being the uncontradicted evidence in the case that his conveyance of the lots in suit here to his son, Noel H. Benjamin, the defendant, was voluntary and without valuable consideration, the conveyance from Hiram D. Benjamin to the defendant was fraudulent in law and void, and the verdict must be for the plaintiffs, Solomon Close and George W. Kershner.

Ans. I cannot say so; the case will be given to you for determination.

3. Under all the evidence in this case the verdict should be for the plaintiffs, Solomon Close and George W. Kershner.

Ans. Refused.

Verdict and judgment were for the defendant.

The assignments of error specified the admission in evidence of the deed of September 4, 1877, from Hiram D. Benjamin and wife to the defendant; the attachment execution; and testimony as to the disposition of purchase money by Stevens; and also specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets and the answers of the court to the plaintiffs' points.

The assignments of error also complained that the charge did not fairly submit the facts to the jury.

Messrs. D. E. Schroeder, B. F. Dettra, and H. Willis Bland, for plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiffs are purchasers for value. The transfer to Noel H. Benjamin was as to Mr. Zell's judgment, in effect, a legal fraud.

On September 4, 1877, the date of the voluntary conveyance to the defendant, Thomas Zell was a creditor of Hiram D. Benjamin, defendant's voluntary grantor.

On January 31, 1881, a judgment was obtained against Benjamin, by Thomas Zell.

The real estate described in plaintiffs' writ was sold under said judgment as the estate of Hiram D. Benjamin to said Zell, and the plaintiffs have the title of the sheriff's vendee.

The defendant offered in evidence a deed dated September 4, 1877 (admitted by his counsel in his opening to be voluntary), from Hiram D. Benjamin, for the land described in the writ, for the purpose of showing that the title in said premises was in him.

As the indebtedness existed at the time of the voluntary conveyance, and as the defendant did not offer to show by other proof that Hiram D. Benjamin had other property at the time to pay said indebtedness, with the view of disproving the corrupt intent of delaying, hindering and defrauding Zell, a creditor, the court should have rejected the offer, upon the ground that the fraudulent intent resulted as a conclusion of law.

Fraud in law consists in acts, which, though not fraudulently intended, yet, as their tendency is to defraud creditors, if they vest the property of the debtor in the grantee, they are void for legal fraud, which is deemed tantamount to actual fraud, full evidence of fraud, and fraudulent in themselves, the policy of the law making the acts illegal.

A sale of all a man's property to his sons on bonds, not due for a long time, is invalid, on the ground of hindering and delaying. If the party be indebted at the time of the voluntary settlement, it is presumed to be fraudulent in respect to such debts, and no circumstance will permit those debts to be affected by the settlement, or repel the legal presumption of fraud.

Garrett v. Gonter, 42 Pa. 143.

The mere omission to charge upon a particular point for which there was no request is not assignable for error; yet if the language of the court, taken in connection with the circumstances of the case, may have misled them, it is ground for reversal.

Bisbing v. Third Nat. Bank, 93 Pa. 82; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Berry, 68 Pa. 272; Stall v. Meek, 70 Pa. 181; Washington Ins. Co. v. Rosenberger, 3 W. N. C. 16.

Messrs. Jeff. Snyder and Geo. F. Baer, for defendant in error:

The voluntary conveyance to the defendant, from his father, who was indebted at the time, was not fraudulent and void per se. There being evidence that the grantor had other property more than sufficient to satisfy the debt and out of which the debt was in fact fully satisfied, it was proper to submit the evidence to the jury to find what the facts were, and to determine whether the conveyance was made with any design to hinder, delay or defraud the creditor.

The doctrine of Spirett v. Willows, 11 Jur. N. S. 70, and Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. 500; Jackson v. Seward, 5 Cow. 67, 8 Cow. 406.

A deed from a parent to a child, for the consideration of love and affection, is not absolutely void as against creditors. The want of a valuable consideration is a badge of fraud; but that it is only presumptive and not conclusive evidence of it, and may be met and repelled by other evidence.

Hinde v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. 199 (24 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 454).

A voluntary conveyance, made by a person not indebted at the time, in favor of his wife or children, cannot be impeached by subsequent creditors, upon the mere ground of its being voluntary. It must be shown to have been fraudulent, or made with a view to future debts. And, on the other hand, the mere fact of indebtment at the time does not, per se, constitute a substantive ground, to avoid a voluntary conveyance for fraud, even in regard to prior creditors. The question whether it is fraudulent or not is to be ascertained, not from the mere fact of indebtment at the time alone, but from all the circumstances of the case. And if the circumstances do not establish fraud, then the voluntary conveyance is deemed to be above all exception.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 362.

If a parent makes an advancement to his child, and honestly and fairly retains in his hands sufficient property to pay all his existing debts, the child will not be bound to refund, even though the parent does not pay his debts existing at the time of the advancement.

Van Wyck v. Seward, 6 Paige, 62.

There is, as applicable to voluntary conveyances made on a meritorious consideration, as of blood and affection, no absolute presumption of fraud which entirely disregards the intent and purpose of the conveyance, if the grantor happened to be indebted at the time it was made, but that such a conveyance under such circumstances affords only prima facie or presumptive evidence of fraud, which may be rebutted and controlled.

Lerow v. Wilmarth, 9 Allen (Mass.), 386.

A voluntary conveyance, in consideration of blood and affection, by a person not indebted or not in embarrassed circumstances, but leaving ample means in his hands open to attachment, to pay all his debts, is good against creditors, if made bona fide. Whether it was bona fide in such case or not is a question of fact for the jury, upon consideration of all the circumstances attending it.

Pomeroy v. Bailey, 43 N. H. 118.

In Connecticut and Vermont the same rule prevails.

Salmon v. Bennett, 1 Conn. 525; Brackett v. Wait, 6 Vt. 411.

But the question has been definitely settled in Pennsylvania.

A voluntary conveyance to a child, by a father who is indebted at the time, is not ipso facto fraudulent and void under the Statute of 13 Elizabeth; if the grantor had other property at the time, or was otherwise of sufficient ability to pay all his debts, it will be referred to a jury, to determine whether there was any design to defraud creditors; if there was not, the conveyance is valid.

Chambers v. Spencer, 5 Watts, 404; Posten v. Posten, 4 Whart. 42; Sanders v. Wagonseller, 19 Pa. 252.

Per Curiam:

We have considered the twenty specifications of error, and cannot sustain any of them. There is no error in the answers to the points submitted, nor in the rulings relating to the admission of evidence. The charge was not misleading and the case was correctly submitted to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

(Argued March 3, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 301, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of trespass on the case. Affirmed.

The facts, as they appeared at the trial before ERMENTROUT, J., are stated in his charge to the jury:

The plaintiff offered in evidence, inter alia, the record of a former suit, No. 19, October Term, 1877. The offer was made in the following terms: "The declaration sets out that heretofore, to wit: on the 10th of September, 1877, to October Term, 1877, No. 19, a certain suit or action was instituted in the Court of Common Pleas of Berks County, in which William Trexler, the present plaintiff, was plaintiff, and Manoah S. Long, the present defendant, was defendant; in which suit a declaration was filed setting forth in substance, as follows:

"The cause of action—which is substantially the same subject matter as is embraced in the present suit; the declaration goes on and sets out in substance that the plaintiff was possessed of certain premises in the County of Berks, including a messuage and tract of land, and a tannery and a dam; that a stream of water had for many years flowed through the premises and into the dam, and that the water was originally pure and unadulterated and abundant in quantity and that it came to the premises in that condition; that the said defendant diverted large quanties of water from the stream and thereby lessened the amount of the water, and that he also fouled the water by means of mining operations; that in consequence of the fouling of the water it as it flowed through the plaintiff's premises became likewise foul and corrupt and diminished in quantity, and that he sustained damage on account of these acts of the defendant. That is set out as being the statement of what was tried in the former suit.

"We propose further, then, to show that there was a declaration filed embracing substantially what I have stated, that the defendant filed a plea to issue; that the case was tried in 1880, and that there was a verdict for the plaintiff for a small sum of damages; that upon the verdict judgment was entered, and that no appeal was ever taken, at least that is the inference from the record; that we offer in evidence now as the basis of the proceeding in this case, and to show the liability of the defendant for a continuation of the same acts as were established in the former suit; the plaintiff averring that the present action is brought for a continuation of the nuisance or wrongful acts which the defendant then did, and for which a verdict was found against him."

The defendant objected: "1, the cause of action set out in the declaration in the suit now offered in evidence is not the same as the cause of action set out in the declaration in the suit now trying; 2, the plaintiff does not declare in the same right in the present suit as the declaration in the suit of No. 19, October Term, 1877; 3, the offer is generally irrelevant, incompetent and inadmissible."

Objection overruled; exception.

The court charged as follows:

"Some time in September, 1877, the present plaintiff instituted an action on the case against the present defendant. The action began on the 10th of September, 1877; and in the pleadings in the case the injury alleged to have been inflicted is stated as beginning the 15th of October, 1871, and continuing from that time until the bringing of the action; or, in other words, for a period of about six years.

"The cause of action, as disclosed by the narr., is, first, a diversion of the stream and the use of it, whereby the water is materially diminished in quantity, to the injury of the plaintiff's property; second, that by using the water for the purpose of washing ore, the defendant polluted and fouled the stream running through the land of the plaintiff; and in addition to these two causes of action, the narr. states that there was added to the stream other water pumped from the ore workings and mines on defendant's land, thereby also polluting the stream, to the injury of the plaintiff's property.

"Upon a trial of that cause, on the 23d of September, 1880, the jury found a general verdict of guilty, and for the injury, in the narr. set forth as continuing for this space of six years, the jury assessed the damages at $231. It does not appear anywhere what damages were assessed for each particular branch of the alleged injury.

"It is now alleged that the defendant continued all these special injuries, and this present suit is brought to recover for a period beginning the 29th of December, 1878, to December 29, 1884, another period of six years. Some counts of the plaintiff's declaration in this case allege it as an old nuisance continued; and there are other counts which allege it as simply a nuisance, without referring to the former action.

"Counsel for both plaintiff and defendant have presented points to the court in which they claim that the law governing this case is set forth; and they ask the court to instruct the jury as requested in these different points. I will answer the points before proceeding with the general charge.

"The plaintiff's counsel respectfully request the court to instruct the jury, as follows:

"'1. The plaintiff having given in evidence the verdict and judgment in a former action, between the same parties, for the same subject matter, viz.: for the diversion and corruption by the defendant, in mining and cleansing iron ore, of the water of a certain stream flowing through plaintiff's premises, in which said action the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, and the present action being for a continuance of the same wrongful acts, the record of said former action is conclusive of the plaintiff's right to recover in the present suit, upon showing to the satisfaction of the jury that the defendant continued to divert and corrupt the water of said stream in the same way as he had previously done. The question of his legal liability for such acts cannot be retried.'

"This point is affirmed, if the jury so find the facts; but is not to apply to any water pumped from the mines in its natural character with impurities arising from natural, not artificial, causes.

"'2. Under such circumstances the only question to be considered by the jury is as to whether the defendant has continued the diversion and corruption of the water of the stream since the former action in 1877; and if the evidence satisfies the jury that such is the fact, it will be their duty to find a verdict for the plaintiff for such damages as he is legally entitled to recover from the defendant for his proportionate share of the injury.'

"This point is affirmed, if the jury find such circumstances to exist, with the qualification as to the water pumped from the mines in its natural condition, as stated in the answer to the first point.

"'3. If, after the plaintiff's right to recover has been established by a verdict and judgment in his favor, the defendant continued the wrongful acts complained of in the first suit, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury to give such damages as will deter him from continuing the same, though such sum be in excess of the actual damages suffered.'

"'4. The defendant having admitted himself that since the former action he has continued to divert large quantities of the water of the stream flowing through the plaintiff's premises for washing ore, of which it was shown that but a small amount returned to the stream, it is no answer to say that he pumped an equal or greater quantity into the stream from the water accumulated in the mine.'

"The principle contended for we affirm, if the jury so find the facts.

"'5. Even should the court be of opinion that in a case where the mining of ore could not be carried on without discharging the water collected from the percolations of the mines into the stream, such discharge would be damnum absque injuria, there is no sufficient evidence of such existing necessity in the present case.'

"We decline to charge as requested in this point.

"The defendant's points are as follows:

"The court is requested to charge the jury:

"'1. That the defendant's use of the water from the stream for carrying on his mining operations, was a reasonable and rightful use of the stream; and there being no evidence of negligence in conducting these operations, but the testimony being that the use of the water for washing ore was the ordinary and reasonable use of the country, in conducting mining operations, the inconvenience and injury to the plaintiff is damnum absque injuria.'

"This point we decline to affirm.

"'2. If the jury believe that the inconveniences to the plaintiff are slight, and that he has sustained no material and appreciable injury from the use made by the defendant of the water taken from the stream in washing his iron ore, then the verdict must be for the defendant.

"This point we affirm.

"'3. If the jury believe that owing to the distance and the intervening dams between plaintiff's property and defendant's the discoloration and sediment in the water from defendant's use of it at the ore washing would disappear, were it not for the operations using the same water between defendant's and plaintiff's property, then the defendant is not liable for the injury complained of, and the verdict must be for the defendant.'

"This we affirm.

"'4. If the jury believe that the discoloration and sediment in the water when it reaches plaintiff's property was due to the water pumped from the defendant's and other mines, and that it was necessary to pump this water from his mine, in order that he might operate it, then the defendant is not liable for the injury complained of, and the plaintiff cannot recover.'

"This point we affirm, on the theory, however, that it applies only to such water as the mine naturally discharges, or to the natural percolations of mine water into the mines, and with the impurities arising from natural not artificial causes; and upon the further theory that in this case the jury should find no other cause of injury.

"'5. That as the defendant received the water on his land affected by similar ore washers above on the stream, if liable at all it would only be for increasing the impurities in the water by operations on his own lands; and if the jury find that the defendant received the water pure and clear, and that but for the action of other operations lower down the stream, the stream would be freed from impurities before it reached plaintiff's land, the plaintiff cannot recover.'

"Affirmed.

"'6. Should the jury believe that the plaintiff has sustained appreciable injury, the defendant would be liable only to the extent that his mining operations contributed thereto: and if that alone did not cause appreciable and material injury to the plaintiff, but only slight inconvenience, the verdict must be for the defendant.'

"Affirmed.

"[In addition to the legal instructions contained in these points, we further say to you that the owner of lands through which a stream of water passes, while he has the right to use the water for any legal purpose, must return it to the channel uncorrupted and without essential diminution in quantity, for the benefit of the owner of the land along its banks below him. If he employs it for ordinary domestic purposes, and the stream is so small that all is consumed, although its loss would be an injury to the land below, yet it is an injury for which the law gives no damages; but where he employs it for manufacturing or other purposes, having no necessary relation to the use of the land, he is liable to an action by the owner of the lower land. For such purposes he can neither corrupt the water nor sensibly diminish its volume at the expense of his neighbor, although he may think it necessary for manufacturing, or washing ore.]

"When a jury approaches a case of this character, they will be careful to keep in view the magnitude of the interests that are involved. The section where these operations are carried on is a mining country. There are, within a half a mile, along this stream alone, as disclosed in this testimony, some seven operations, in which a vast amount of iron ore is handled, a great number of men employed, and the iron ore industry is a vast and important one.

"The proprietors of large and useful interests, such as mining of coal or iron ore, should not be hampered or hindered for trifling or trivial causes. For slight inconveniences or occasional annoyances, they ought not to be held responsible. But when material and appreciable injuries, such as damages to land, actual diminution, appreciable diminution of streams are shown, when such injuries have been sustained, a recovery of damages against them ought to be allowed, just as against any other person,—because a rule of law should be for all men; and all interests, mining and agricultural, should be treated impartially.

"In estimating the damages, if the jury find that any damages were sustained, there is a general rule laid down; that is, that the measure of damages is compensation for the injury that may have been sustained by the acts complained of. If the injury result from grossly negligent or malicious acts, or is caused by the persistent action of a man whose rights to do such acts have been legally determined against him, larger damages may be given by way of punishment; and the amount of such damages, which in law are called punitive damages, or exemplary damages, rests in the sound discretion of the jury, uninfluenced by prejudice or passion.

"We further say to you that the defendant, being the owner of the land, had a right to mine his iron ore, or permit his lessees to do so: and if this right was exercised in the ordinary and usual mode of mining and with due care, so far as the water pumped up from the mine is concerned, there is no liability for permitting the natural flow of mine water, either to run away from the land or to be pumped up from the mine into the creek, which, from the testimony, seems to be the natural drainage of that section.

"In all mines there are percolations, or drippings, or runnings from the water which accumulates; and this water must be discharged, or mining would cease. A man is permitted to get rid of this natural flow of water, and the defendant had a right to lift this water to the surface by artificial means, such as pumping, and let it into the creek. He may not foul it by any act of his own. He may not use it as a sewer for the mere purpose of throwing dirt, or in such a way as to throw the soil upon the land of his neighbor. He may not do that either by his own act or by the act of his servants. But if the impurities in the water which he thus conveys from the mine arise from natural, and not artificial causes, without any fouling on his part, or any act done whereby to alter the nature and condition of this water, that is, the natural impurities that water may receive in percolating through the mines, he may pump that out, although it may, by its natural impurities, defoul the creek. And, therefore, so far as this case is concerned, when you come to consider any injury which you find attributable to that source, you would exclude that special injury from your consideration.

"Taking the evidence submitted on the part of the plaintiff, if believed, and it is for the jury to pass upon the evidence, its effect would be that the streams below were muddy; that the impurities in the creek affected his leather in the tannery; the deposits settled in his dam at his grist mill; that the water for domestic purposes at the dam at his house was polluted in the same way. There were a good many witnesses called, and it is unnecessary to give their testimony in detail, because the jury will well recollect that, inasmuch as this case has not taken so many days.

"If, under a consideration of the plaintiff's testimony, you find that this defendant, taking into consideration the testimony on both sides, is guilty of inflicting such injuries, for which the law allows damages, as we have before stated, you would apply the rules we have indicated in ascertaining the damages. You will ascertain what damages were sustained by the alleged diverting of the stream, the appreciable diminution in the quantity and the pollution of the water. You will inquire how the acts complained of may have affected the use and enjoyment of the plaintiff and his property; and in the case of any permanent injury, you will inquire how the acts complained of affect the property in its value. So far as the mere diversion of a stream is concerned, that diversion may be simply temporary in its character, for when the stream is no longer diverted, the injury ceases; and then you would inquire what damage was done by its diversion and the diminution in quantity.

"When you come to examine into the question of any deposits that may have been made of mud, soil or otherwise, if there were any such deposits made, you will inquire whether they have affected the value of the property permanently, and ascertain to what extent. You will also, at the same time, ascertain what would be the cost of the removal of such deposits; and whichever way shows the lesser damages, you are to accept as the true measure. In other words, if the difference in value, caused by the permanent injury, is, we will say, in illustration, $100, and the cost of removal is $50, you would take the $50; if the cost of removal were $150, and it should be testified that the depreciation in the value of the property were but $100, you would take the $100.

"You will bear in mind that the plaintiff is the owner of farms there, a tannery, a grist and sawmill; the dams are there all erected; there is a valuable water power there. So far as the properties which the plaintiff has leased are concerned, you will not allow anything for diminishing the annual profits to the tenant. Such profits and damages belong to the tenant, and not to the owner. The tenant may sue for those; but the owner simply sues for the damages which he suffers in his reversionary interest.

"If, under all this evidence, you find that there was an injury committed, and you proceeded in the way indicated to ascertain the amount of the damages, you will further bear in mind that the estimates of damages alleged to have been committed contained all the damages that are alleged to have been actually suffered during these six years.

"When Colonel Trexler was upon the stand he said that he did not claim that these acts were due to the defendant alone. There are, according to the testimony, some seven operators upon that stream; and all of them seem to be carrying on mining operations in pretty much the same way. Some of the witnesses say that it is necessary to go away above the operations of the defendant, past the others, to get clear water; and that when the water reaches Long's, it is muddy both above and below; and some of the witnesses say that the stream is oftener clear than muddy, and others say oftener muddy than clear.

"Therefore, it is that you must, in the best way you can, apportion what you may find to be the proper amount of damages caused by the act of the defendant; for he is not liable for what the others have done, but only for his proportionate share. It is, of course, difficult to get at that. You can hardly do it exactly, but you will approximate to it as near as you can; and you must use your good judgment and sound discretion in getting at the true measure.

"Now, the defendant alleges, on the other hand, that he has not inflicted the injuries complained of; and for the purpose of establishing his theory of the case, he calls witnesses who give to you an account of how the mining operations are there carried on. They have described to you the course of the mine from the pit to the washery, and the washery and the mud dam. They have told you that unless there is a heavy rain in that neighborhood, the water in the pit is generally clear; that the water in this stream—there is no contention about that—is taken up, used in the washery in washing the ore; and they allege that the sand and dirt are separated, the sand first by means of the washery and screens connected with it; and from that the muddy water flows into the mud dam where it is allowed to settle; and that the water in its clear state is then taken from the mud dam and put into the creek; and that there is no pollution of water arising from that source; and they further testify to you that this creek is the natural drainage of that country, that on either side of the creek the land slopes, and that whatever washings there may be after rains pass into this creek; and the defendant alleges that the water is fouled in that way.

"There is testimony to the effect that during these six years a mud dam below the defendant broke, and that by that means great quantities of mud were washed into the stream; that there was a freshet in 1883 of so serious a character that it took the defendant some three weeks to pump out the water from his mine—some three weeks to clear the mining operations of the water; and he alleges that so far as he is concerned, he has not done any injury to the plaintiff. He brings to you the deposits of mud or soil, or whatever it may have been testified to be, which he says he found in these various dams; and he says that an analysis of these different muds or deposits shows that they do not come from his property; and that they are not of the same nature as the soil of his property.

"Now, all these things are brought to your attention for the purpose of showing that while true it may be that deposits were thrown into the different dams of the plaintiff, he, the defendant, was not the cause of it, and that therefore he is not responsible for that; and if you should find that he is responsible for some of the deposits, you will ascertain that quantity—naturally, the water in a creek of that kind will carry down sand, leaves, dirt and other stuff; dams will gradually fill up; freshets may do that; and my object in directing your attention to these facts is simply to show to you that you must apportion the damages; and you can only hold the defendant responsible simply for what he may have done, and not for what may have been done by others, or by the act of nature, or great freshets, or heavy rains that may have washed soil into that creek.

"If the testimony satisfies you that there was no diversion of water by the defendant, no deposit of mud, no injury to the lower owner caused by his act, then he would be entitled to a verdict. But if you find that he has done an injury to the lower owner that he has diverted the stream and failed to return it in proper quantity and pure in quality as he ought to have done, and that injury has resulted to the plaintiff, then you must return a verdict for the plaintiff, and assess the damages as indicated in the charge."

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff for $225.66.

The assignments of error specified the admission of the record of the former suit, the answers of the court to the points submitted, and the portion of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. Ermentrout & Ruhl, for plaintiff in error:

The declaration and evidence admitted by the court at the latter trial show conclusively that the merits of the controversies at the several trials were quite different.

In the former suit the gravamen of the complaint was that "the defendant had diverted the water of the stream, and had used it for washing iron ore upon his premises, whereby it was made muddy, impure, corrupt and poisonous, and that he did return the same into the stream," etc.; and also that "he did, then and there, empty and discharge other water pumped or drawn from the ore workings and mines, and likewise rendered muddy, impure corrupt and poisonous, etc., whereby all the water of the stream became muddy, corrupt, poisonous," etc.

"The declaration in the present suit contains an averment of the former suit, and the verdict and judgment thereon; and further avers that since the 10th day of September, 1877 (the date of the bringing of the former suit) the defendant continued the tortious acts complained of in the former suit. The plaintiff does not, however, aver that he was in possession of the tannery premises at the time of bringing this suit, but avers that since 1883 he did not have the possession of it, and declares for damages sustained in his reversionary interest since that time. The declaration in the present suit contains no averment that the defendant in the same way, and to the same extent, continued all the tortious acts complained of in the former one."

The admissibility of the record, in the first instance, was a question for the court to pass upon; and the plaintiff not having averred that the injuries complained of were continued to the same extent, it should have been rejected.

In Casebeer v. Mowry, 55 Pa. 423, which was a second action on the case for flooding plaintiff's land, by means of a dam which the defendant had erected in a stream, the court said that the effect of the first action was to establish the right, and adds: "Of course, this is only so if the dam was of the same height when the second suit was brought. That it was so we may infer from the fact that nothing was alleged to the contrary."

In the former action the plaintiff claimed damages sustained in his business of tanning, which he averred he had been and was then exercising and carrying on; while in this action he declares for injuries sustained in his reversionary interest. He, therefore, is now suing in a different right.

Damages for injuries to property vary also, according to the nature of the claimant's right. The owner of the freehold may undoubtedly recover for an injury which permanently affects or depreciates his property; while a tenant, or one having only a possessory right, may recover for an injury to his use or enjoyment of it.

Seely v. Alden, 61 Pa. 305; Ripka v. Sergeant, 7 Watts & S. 9; Williams v. Esling, 4 Pa. 486.

Where the verdict and judgment in a former trial between the same parties are used in pleading as a technical estoppel, or relied upon by way of evidence as conclusive per se, it must appear, by the record of the prior suit, that the particular controversy sought to be concluded was necessarily tried and determined—that is, if the record of the former trial shows that the verdict could not have been rendered without deciding the particular matter, it will be considered to have settled that matter as to all future actions between the parties; and further, in cases in which the record itself does not show that the matter was necessarily and directly found by the jury, evidence aliunde consistent with the record may be received to prove the fact; but even where it appears from the extrinsic evidence that the matter was properly within the issue controverted in the former suit, if it be not shown that the verdict and judgment necessarily involved its consideration and determination, it will not be conclusive.

Washington etc. Packet Co. v. Sickles, 5 Wall. 592 (72 U. S. bk. 18. L. ed. 553); Coleman's App. 62 Pa. 272.

Assuming, however, for the sake of the argument, that the court ruled correctly in admitting the offer, we submit that there is serious error in the answers to the several points of the plaintiff below as to the effect of the evidence, especially in view of the evidence admitted relating to the water pumped from the defendant's mines, and the instructions to the jury as to the right of the plaintiff to recover for injuries resulting therefrom. In both actions the plaintiff's chief complaint was the alleged injury resulting to him by reason of the water raised or pumped from defendant's mines. The learned judge, however, held that all injuries resulting from such acts were within the ruling of this court in Pa. Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 4 Cent. Rep. 475, 113 Pa. 126, and therefore damnum absque injuria.

At the former trial the defendant was held liable for such injuries. How can it then be said that the cause of action is the same in this as in the former action? The use made of the water by Long is inseparable to and necessary for the use of his land; it has a necessary relation to his use of this land,. and therefore is within the rulings of this court upon that question.

Pa. R. R. Co. v. Miller, 3 Cent. Rep. 126.

In the case of Kauffman v. Griesemer, 26 Pa. 407, it was held that the owner of the superior heritage may improve his lands by agricultural or mining operations, although thereby the quantity of water discharged upon the inferior owner is changed. This is said to occur when necessary for carrying on agricultural and mining operations. By a parity of reasoning the same rule should include a necessary alteration in the quality of the water.

The reasonableness of the detention of water by the riparian owner above to the injury of the riparian owner below depending, as it must, on the nature and size of the stream as well as the business to which it is subservient, and on the ever varying circumstances of each particular case, must be determined by the jury and not by the court.

Hetrich v. Deachler, 6 Pa. 32; Hartzall v. Sill, 12 Pa. 248; Cooley, Torts, 588.

The damages resulting to another from the natural and lawful use of his land by the owner thereof are, in the absence of malice, damnum absque injuria. When the maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædes is applied to landed property the plaintiff must show not only that he has sustained damage, but that the defendant has caused it by going beyond what is necessary in order to enable him to have the natural use of his own land.

West Cumberland Iron & Steel Co. v. Kenyon, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 783.

The reasonableness of the use of a stream by the upper riparian owner is a question of fact, to determine which testimony showing the uniform usage of the country is admissible.

Snow v. Parsons, 28 Vt. 459.

The court will refuse to enjoin the burning of bricks because it is essential to brick making, which the court regarded as a useful and necessary business and necessarily exercised near towns.

Huckenstine's App. 70 Pa. 102.

The water used in the mining operations below was returned to the stream in so clear and pure a condition as the nature of the operations upon the land would permit. The depreciation in quantity was equal only to the extent of the evaporations while it was permitted to remain in the mud or slush dam for the purpose of clarification. No substances foreign and not indigenous to the defendant's land was introduced into the water to foul it, as was proven in Wheatley v. Chrisman, 24 Pa. 298, and McCallum v. Germantown Water Co. 54 Pa. 40.

The defendent carried on his mining operations according to the customary and usual methods employed by skillful and experienced miners. It was a custom of which the court was bound to take notice as a part of the law.

Koons v. Miller, 3 Watts & S. 271; Watt v. Hoch, 25 Pa. 411.

Messrs. H. Maltzberger and A. G. Green, for defendant in error:

It is charged that in the declaration in the first suit plaintiff avers possession in the tannery and claims damages to his possession; while in the latter he avers the possession to be in his tenant and claims damages to his reversionary estate. The answer is that we complain of the defendant's tortious acts; that they are still continued, and that they cause the same injury to the property affected as they did before; and as the suit extended back six years, so far as the plaintiff had possession during that time—which was a little over four years, the suit having been brought in January, 1885—he would be entitled to recover; and the evidence of the record of the former action would be confessedly appropriate and admissible.

Kilheffer v. Herr, 17 Serg. & R. 319; Smith v. Elliott, 9 Pa. 346; Rockwell v. Langley, 19 Pa. 502; Casebeer v. Mowry, 55 Pa. 419; Coleman's App. 62 Pa. 272.

In view of the continuance of the defendant's wrongful acts, the court was justified in instructing the jury to give such damages as would deter the defendant, although the amount should exceed the actual damage done.

3 Bl. Com. 220; Sedgwick, Damages, 6th ed. 162; Williams v. Esling, 4 Pa. 486–490; Wheatley v. Chrisman, 24 Pa. 298–302.

There was competent evidence to go to the jury of wrongful abstraction, diminution and corruption of the water, which clearly negatived the fact of a reasonable and proper use on the part of the defendant.

If the jury can apportion the damages occasioned by different tort feasors (Seely v. Alden, 61 Pa. 302) they might approximate the damages from different causes. If both lawful and unlawful acts contribute to foul the water and bring sediment into a dam, it is easy to see that while the lawful cause might require twenty years to fill it, in combination with other unlawful acts it might be filled in less than five.

The principle of Wheatley v. Chrisman, 24 Pa. 298, that "A proprietor of land over which a stream of water runs has, as against a lower proprietor, the use of only so much of the stream as will not materially diminish its quantity," is not yet obliterated from our law books.

Per Curiam:

The judgment in the former case was substantially for the diversion of the water of the same stream. It settled conclusively that the defendant below had no right to so divert it. If some other items of damage were considered in that case, it bears only on the measure of damages in this action. It does not open anew the question of right to so divert the water. The points submitted were correctly answered, and the evidence was fairly submitted.

Judgment affirmed.

(Argued Feb. 22, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 163, E. D., before Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, dismissing a bill in equity to set aside a conveyance. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared before the Master, Henry S. Knapp, Esq., were stated in his report, which was as follows:

"The plaintiffs are heirs at law of Enoch Hartman, who died at the house of his son-in-law, Elias Lowry, one of the defendants, upon the first day of January, 1881. The bill was filed upon December 10, 1884, and seeks to set aside the conveyance by Hartman of his farm, situate in this county, to the said defendant, Lowry.

"The bill recites that Hartman being the owner of a farm of sixty-seven acres of land, and being seventy-eight years of age and very weak and sickly both in body and in mind, was induced by the false and fraudulent representations of his son-in-law, Lowry (that the farm was heavily incumbered by judgments and mortgages, and that the creditors were about to cause it to be sold by the sheriff), to convey it to him, Lowry, upon his promise to pay off the debts; that Hartman died about four months thereafter, Lowry meantime taking possession of the farm by virtue of his deed, which possession he held until April 14, 1884, when, fearing that the plaintiffs were about to commence legal proceedings for the recovery of the property, he entered into a conspiracy with W. D. Spencer, the other defendant, to defeat their claims, and for this purpose conveyed the said property to said Spencer.

"The answer of Lowry denies all fraud or fraudulent representations upon his part to obtain the conveyance from Hartman; denies the fact of mental weakness on the part of Hartman, or that he was in any way incapacitated to make the conveyance, and denies any conspiracy with Spencer; but alleges a bona fide sale to Spencer for full consideration upon April 14, 1884, several years after the death of Hartman, and that Spencer paid him $500 in cash and gave him a mortgage for $2,000 to secure the balance of purchase money.

"The answer further alleges that the conveyance from Hartman to Lowry of August 28, 1880, by the terms of which Lowry agreed to maintain and support Hartman as a member of his family, as long as the said Hartman should live, and pay for necessary medical attendance and funeral expenses, and that in consideration therefor Hartman agreed to convey to Lowry his interest in the farm in question; that, in pursuance of said contract, Hartman lived with and was supported and maintained by said Lowry from the date of the contract until the time of his death about one year later.

"The answer of Spencer denies all the allegations of conspiracy between himself and Lowry, and alleges that he bought the property in good faith, for the sum of $2,500, of which sum he paid $500 in cash and gave a mortgage to Lowry for $2,000; that he had no notice of the matters of fraud alleged in the plaintiffs' bill at the time he bought the property from Lowry.

"It will thus be seen that the principal questions to be determined are these: 1. Was Lowry guilty of fraudulent conduct in obtaining the conveyance from Hartman; 2. Was Hartman incapacitated, by reason of mental weakness, disease and old age, to make a valid contract and conveyance of his interest in the land; 3. Did Spencer acquire his title with knowledge of the fraud by Lowry or incapacity of Hartman, if such fraud or incapacity existed?

"A question entitled to early consideration is whether the parties in interest are competent witnesses as to the matters arising before the death of Enoch Hartman, the grantor.

"The parties to the suit were all or nearly all of them sworn before the examiner, and their testimony was taken under objection. The thing in action is clearly the farm which was conveyed by the deed of Enoch Hartman; and the contract in action is the conveyance whose validity is contested; it is likewise clear that Enoch Hartman is the assignor of the thing or contract in action.

"Before the Act of 1869 the parties to the suit would have been incompetent to testify for any purpose. That Act does not apply to actions where the assignor of the thing or contract in action may be dead. The enabling Act of April 9, 1870, permits interested parties (who are excepted by the proviso to the Act of 1869) to testify to matters occuring since the death of the assignor of the thing or contract in action.

"This ruling will require the expulsion from the record of all testimony of parties in interest, as far as that testimony relates to matters transpiring, or existing before the death of Enoch Hartman.

"From the pleadings and so much of the testimony as appears to be admissible under the law, the following matters of fact are found:

"First, on the 13th day of June, 1872, J. M. Seamans and others, being the owners of a certain farm consisting of about sixty-seven acres of land, situate in the Township of Abington, in this county, contracted, by articles, to sell the same to Enoch Hartman for the sum of $3,000; Hartman took possession and made payments upon the purchase money until upon January 29, 1880, it was all paid except the sum of $600, together with about the sum of $30 accrued interest, the last payment upon the principal having been made in May, 1876. Seamans and others had assigned their interest in the articles of agreement which by various conveyances had become the property of William H. Stevens. A deed bearing date April 1, 1873, but not acknowledged until January 26, 1878, from Seamans and his cotenants to Hartman, was also in possession of Stevens to be delivered to Hartman when the purchase money was fully paid.

"Second, upon January 29, 1880, Enoch Hartman was nearly seventy-seven years of age, a widower, his wife having died nearly two years before, and the father of seven daughters, all of them married, four of whom, to wit: Eurah Travis, Christiana Evans, Sarah E. Mitten and Mary Brown, are plaintiffs in this suit, and one of whom, to wit: Emily Lowry, is the wife of Elias Lowry, one of the defendants in this suit; two of the daughters, to wit: Eliza Jane Peets and Malinda Cole, are not parties to the suit.

"At the time named Enoch Hartman had no other living children, but had two grandchildren, to wit: John H. Hartman and Christopher Hartman, sons of a deceased son, John Hartman, both of whom are also plaintiffs in this suit.

"Third, on the 29th day of January, 1880, Hartman entered into a written contract with Elias Lowry, one of the defendants and husband of Emily Lowry, before named, by the terms of which Lowry agreed to maintain and support Hartman during the term of his life and pay all expenses for medical attendance and burial; in consideration whereof Hartman agreed to convey to Lowry his interest in the farm mentioned in the first finding of fact. In pursuance of this contract Hartman became a member of Lowry's family, and so continued until he died upon the first day of January, 1881.

"At the time this contract was entered into Hartman executed an assignment of his contract with Seamans and others, and delivered the same to Lowry, and upon August 28, 1880, in further fulfillment of said contract, he executed and delivered to Lowry a deed of the said farm. Lowry took possession of the land and paid up the balance of purchase money to Stevens, receiving the deed of Stevens and others before mentioned, which with Hartman's deed to himself was recorded in the recorder's office of Lackawanna County, upon August 28, 1880.

"Lowry remained in possession of the farm until April 15, 1884, when he sold and conveyed it to W. D. Spencer, the other defendant, for the sum of $2,500, $500 in cash, and taking a mortgage for the balance.

"Fourth, for many years prior to his death Enoch Hartman was troubled by a disorder which some of the medical witnesses said was scrotal hernia, while by others it was denominated hydrocele, at any rate it had the appearance of a watery tumor in the region of the scrotum. It was so large that it might be observed when Hartman was fully clothed. This was annoying and uncomfortable at times, but was not especially painful and did not particularly affect his general health which was fair for a man of advanced years; he died of cardiac dropsy, and it is thought his heart must have been somewhat affected for a year or more before his death.

"Hartman felt very keenly over the loss of his wife, to whom he had been married very many years, and her death and the consequent breaking up of his home had a very depressing effect upon his spirits. He seems to have had difficulty in adjusting his domestic concerns to his liking after that event. He lived on the farm for a time without other companionship or help than a young girl whom he had taken to bring up. He then lived for a time with some of his sons-in-law. He rented the farm on shares for a time to his son-in-law, Isaiah Mitten, he occupying meantime a part of the house; during all this time he was frequently much depressed in spirits; bodily infirmities were advancing upon him; he was too old to work; his affairs were unsettled; the balance of unpaid purchase money upon his farm weighed upon his mind with a force exaggerated by his helplessness; he brooded over his troubles, and they grew greater to his mind, from too much contemplation; his intellect was weakened and somewhat disordered; his mind and memory were somewhat impaired. He did not, however, lose the use of his mental faculties; at the time he entered into the contract upon January 29, 1880, he had sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of the act he was performing and the consideration he was receiving therefor; It was his deliberate act, after mature consideration; he believed it to be the best disposition he could make of himself and his property.

"Fifth, it was not established in this case that Elias Lowry represented to Hartman that the farm was incumbered by judgments or debts of any kind and was about to be sold at sheriff's sale, nor that he made any false representations to Hartman whatever; nor is it established that he persuaded Hartman or induced him to enter into the contract of January 29, 1880, or exercised any undue influence over him.

"Sixth, the terms of the contract of January 29, 1880, were fully carried out upon his part by the defendant, Elias Lowry.

"Seventh, upon January 29, 1880, the farm was worth from $2,800 to $3,000: Hartman's interest in it was incumbered by about the sum of $630 unpaid purchase money. The rental value of the farm was about $175 per year.

"It now becomes necessary to consider the vital question in this case, and it is a mixed question of law and of fact, to wit: Was Hartman incapable, by reason of mental weakness, disease and old age, upon January 29, 1880, to make, with validity, the contract with Lowry, and also to ratify it by conveying the land upon August 28, 1880? Such contracts by aged persons, for their support and maintenance during life, have frequently been made; and in the absence of fraud or lack of contractual ability they will be sustained.

"Oftentimes the most beneficial arrangement a person, bereft of home comforts and desiring most of all a haven of peace and a rest from distracting cares, can make is to barter his small accumulation of property for a life support; justice requires that contracts of such persons should not be lightly set aside; for that is the period of life when they most need to be able to use freely, for their own support and comfort, that which in their stronger years they have been able to lay aside. The evidence falls short of establishing, in the mind of the Master, any degree of insanity whatever: and while there is evidenced a certain degree of weakess of body and mind, yet it is not shown that advantage was taken of such weakness.

"On behalf of plaintiffs it is strenously urged that the consideration was grossly inadequate, and that this circumstance establishes a presumption of fraud.

"If the consideration can be properly considered grossly inadequate, it would be a strong point against the defendant Lowry; but of this there seems to be great doubt. When the contract was made, the amount which Lowry was to pay was entirely unascertainable. It did not appear that Hartman was suffering from any malady which was likely to speedily terminate his life. What amount of care would have to be bestowed upon him, and for what period of time, how much medical attendance might he require? While such prudence and calculation are happily not usual elements in the relation of sturdy sons to their aged parents, yet these are questions which must be considered when measuring the adequacy of the price contracted to be paid by Lowry.

"Two thousand two hundred dollars would have been a fair price for Hartman's interest in the land at the time he entered into the contract, and this the Master believes he was willing, after due deliberation, to exchange for a life support and the payment of various necessary expenses. No person was dependent upon him for support; the contract was made with his son-in-law, in whom it may be supposed he had confidence, and in whose family it may be supposed he desired to spend the remainder of his life. Viewed as a purely business matter, it can hardly be said the contract was grossly inadequate; no effort was made, either by himself or any of his friends, to avoid it during his lifetime, and it was faithfully carried out by Lowry.

"Under the whole showing the Master does not consider that justice requires the deed to be set aside at this late day.

"The Master finds the following matters of law: 1. General weakness of mind not amounting to insanity, will not, of itself, be sufficient to avoid the deed of its subject; 2. If a grantor, when making a deed, understands the nature of the act and its effect, and knows the consideration, and there is no fraud on the part of the grantee, the deed will generally be sustained; 3. Under all the facts shown in this case, the plaintiffs are not entitled to a decree setting aside the deed of Enoch Hartman; 4. The bill filed in this case should be dismissed."

To this report various exceptions were filed by the plaintiffs. Upon overruling the exceptions and confirming the report, ARCHBALD, A. L. J., after reviewing the facts, delivered the following opinion:

"Unless undue influence, fraud or imposition appears in the case, or a relation of confidence is established between the parties, as the evidence shows that Hartman was of sufficient mental capacity to understand his acts and the effect of them, according to the decisions in Pennsylvania, the agreement is not one which equity will disturb.

"In Kelly's Appeal, 15 Pittsb. L. J. 323, the plaintiff had transferred to his nephew all his property upon mere verbal promises of maintenance and trust, and himself brought a bill to rescind the arrangement. Mr. Justice Gordon, commenting upon the case, says: 'On the ground of inadequacy of consideration, he (a chancellor) might interfere to protect one who had improvidently agreed to devest himself of all his property on a mere oral promise of maintenance. But it is otherwise with an executed contract. Inadequacy of consideration alone will not induce a chancellor to rescind such contract. Graham v. Pancoast, 30 Pa. 89; Aiman v. Stout, 42 Pa. 114.

" 'Nor according to the same authorities will mental weakness, when not sufficient to prevent a comprehension of the contract, nor mere hardship, warrant a rescission. As to the case in hearing, the court below agrees with the auditor, that there was neither such mental incapacity on the part of the grantor as would of itself avoid his deed, nor was there evidence of actual fraud on the part of the grantee. But the case is put on the ground of constructive fraud; and Judge Story is quoted as saying that equity will grant relief in cases where a confidence has been reposed, and that confidence has been abused. But such abuse of confidence is rather an actual than a constructive fraud. Constructive fraud is a legal implication and depends neither upon the good or bad faith of the contracting parties, as between themselves.

" 'Here, however, admitting the ability of the one party to contract, and the good faith of the other in accepting the benefits conferred upon him by the contract, and there is no room for the intervention of a legal policy, since by the transaction no implication can arise of the infraction either of law or public policy. We know of no obstacle, legal or moral, in the way of one who is of sane mind and free of debt, making a gift of a part or the whole of his property to another, much less in his transferring it in consideration of maintenance.'

"In Graham v. Pancoast, 30 Pa. 89, it is thus said by Strong, J.: 'The power of a chancellor to decree a rescission of a contract, and order its surrender, though undoubted, is one of the most delicate powers which he is ever called upon to exercise, and is never to be put forth except in a clear case. It is not sufficient to put him in motion that suspicion and distrust have been thrown over a transaction. In such a case he will move neither to rescind nor to decree its specific performance. * * * Inadequacy of price, improvidence, surprise, and mere hardship, have each been held sufficient to stay the active interposition of a chancellor. Yet no one of these, nor all combined, furnishes an adequate reason for a judicial rescission of a contract. For such action something more is demanded, scuh as fraud, mistake or illegality. In the present case the bill of the complainant charges that the contract was obtained by fraudulent representations from an old man physically and mentally imbecile, and that the price agreed to be paid for the property was grossly inadequate. It may be observed that the false and fraudulent representations specifically charged in the bill are but two: that the lots bargained to be sold were of the value of $5,000, and no more, and that they were in danger of being sold for taxes. Neither of these alleged representations is supported by any evidence in the cause, and they are denied in the answer. Nor, if they had been proved, are they such representations, as if false, are fraudulent. They are not such as would reasonably have been relied upon by Graham, and they constituted no material inducement to his entering into the contract. There is no relation of confidence between the vendor and vendee. In regard to the value of the lots and their liability to sale, both parties had equal means of information: and when that is the case, a representation, though undue, will not be considered fraudulent.'

"Appropriate quotations illustrating the same principles, might also be taken from Nace v. Boyer, 30 Pa. 99, nd Hetrick's App. 58 Pa. 477, but they would swell this opinion to an inordinate length.

"In the case of Dean v. Fuller, 40 Pa. 474, an extreme position is taken by our supreme court, which I do not believe the court, as at present constituted, if brought to the test, would again take. The decision fails to recognize, in my opinion, the relation of confidence which existed between the contracting parties; or as said by the learned American editor of Leading Cases in Equity (Vol. 2, p. 1211), the error 'seems to have been in analyzing that which should have been considered as a whole. Jackson's advanced age, distress and weakness, Fuller's position as a confidential friend, and that he was present at and directed the preparation of the instrument of gift, were circumstances which, in the aggregate, threw the burden of proof on him, though each of them might have been inadequate if standing alone.'

"I refer to the case mainly to show that the general leaning of our highest court has not been in the line of the cases to which counsel for plaintiffs have referred me.

"Beyond our own State somewhat similar limitations upon the equitable doctrine under consideration are to be found in Howe v. Howe, 99 Mass. 88; Harrison v. Guest, 6 DeG. M. & G. 424, and Greer v. Greers, 9 Gratt. (Va.) 332.

"At the same time there are other authorities which go far to sustain the plaintiffs' case. Thus in Allore v. Jewell, 94 U. S. 511 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 264], it is said by Mr. Justice Field: 'It may be stated as settled law that, whenever there is great weakness of mind in a person executing a conveyance of land, arising from age, sickness or any other cause, though not amounting to absolute disqualification, and the consideration given for the property is grossly inadequate, a court of equity will, upon proper and seasonable application of the injured party, or his representatives or heirs, interfere and set the conveyance aside.'

See also Harding v. Handy, 11 Wheat. 103 [24 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 429]; Seeley v. Price, 14 Mich. 541; Whelan v. Whelan, 3 Cow. 537.

"In 2 White & T. Lead. Cases, Eq. part 2, ed. 1877, p. 1233, it is said: 'Another and not infrequent form of undue influence is where one whose mind has been enfeebled by age or disease, or who truly or erroneously considers himself unfit for the transaction of business, enters into a negotiation with a friend or relative, which results in a transfer of his property subject to a trust or in consideration of an agreement to provide for his support. * * * From the very nature of such a transaction, confidence is reposed by one party and accepted by the other; and the conveyance will not be allowed to stand, unless the grantor proceeds understandingly, deliberately, and of his own accord, nor if it appears that the grantee gained an undue advantage at the expense of the donor, or of those on whom the property would have devolved in the ordinary course of events.'

"I would cheerfully apply the somewhat broader doctrine of these latter authorities to the case in hand, if I did not feel myself controlled by those which I have cited from our own reports. There are many circumstances which warrant the suspicion that the transfer by Hartman was not his own free act, and no direct evidence to show that it was. The testimony of Mrs. Stevens comes nearest to establishing this; but the statements of Hartman to her, after all, amount to no more than an assertion of what he intended to do. They throw little light on how that intention was produced, which always lies at the root of the question of undue influence.

"The conclusion of the master in his fourth finding of fact, that it was Hartman's deliberate act, after mature consideration, and that he believed it to be the best disposition he could make of himself and his property, I do not think has sufficient support from the evidence; and I would therefore strike it out. But this makes no material difference. The specific charges of fraud and imposition, in the bill, are met and denied by the answer; and no competent proofs are adduced to overcome such denial.

"The case then stands thus: under the authorities to which I have first above referred, and others, it is established that where no fiduciary relation is shown between the contracting parties, some element of actual fraud or imposition must be proved. But the case must proceed on one or the other of these grounds. If there was any confidential relation between the parties, then on the ground of public utility the grantee is not allowed to take any benefit to himself from the transaction, without showing the entire fairness of it, and that it was the deliberate and well formed purpose of the grantor's mind after full advice from some indifferent source. The burden in such case is upon the party seeking to sustain the transfer. He must show that the benefit he will derive from it was clearly understood and intended by the grantor. It is to be supported, not as a contract, but as a gift.

"But that is not this case. There is no charge in the bill of any fiduciary relation between Hartman and Lowry at the time of the contract, or even of the deed, although the distinction between these is not material. Nor is this made out by the proofs. The most that can be said is that out of the relations of the parties a certain amount of confidence and dependence might spring. It would be natural and proper that it should. I confess that at first I was inclined to consider this as sufficient, and so require of the defendant a corresponding burden of proof. It is difficult to resist the thought that such a course would more nearly comport with justice, and that the opposite may legalize a fraud. But after a full consideration of the question, I am constrained to hold that something more than this is required, to establish the confidential relation upon which the rule in equity is based. There must exist some close relationship of blood or marriage, as of parent and child, or husband and wife, or a special relation of confidence, in accordance with which one party has customarily resorted, or does at the time resort, to the other for direction and advice in business or other intimate personal affairs. In either of these cases a dependence of the one mind upon the other necessarily results, and equity will not allow that it shall be used by the one party for his own selfish ends. To guard against this it is presumed in a matter of advantage to the one that the mind of the other has been unduly influenced and controlled.

"But the present case does not fall within these lines. It does not appear that the relations between Hartman and Lowry were in any way intimate prior to the time of the transfer. Hartman was not dependent upon his son-in-law in any way; so that we have the mere relationship by marriage, out of which to imply a confidential relation. Standing by itself it does not seem to be sufficient.

"The case then falls back upon the charge of influence unduly produced by misrepresentation and fraud. While, as I have said, there are some things to arouse a suspicion of imposition upon the mind of this feeble old man, it is hardly necessary to say that the court must have something more tangible than that to act upon. Moreover, it is denied in the answer; and upon that denial the defendant has a right to stand.

"The charges, therefore, in the bill upon which the case is made to depend, are not made out, and the proceedings must be dismissed.

"In accordance with the views expressed in this opinion, I will sustain the fourth and thirteenth exceptions of the plaintiffs; but this does not affect the result.

"Let a decree be drawn dismissing the bill, in accordance with the recommendations of the master, with costs."

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in holding that a relation of confidence had not been shown to exist between the parties in this case; in holding that because the intimate relation of the parties had existed for only a short time, it could not be treated as evidence warranting the inference of undue influence; in holding that there was no adequate evidence of actual fraud in this case to set aside the conveyance; in refusing to set aside the conveyance as prayed in the plaintiffs' bill of complaint; and in dismissing the plaintiffs' bill.

Messrs. H. M. Hannah and C. H. Soper, for appellants:

A transaction of this kind requires full and complete proof of fairness and honest dealing on the part of the person who is to profit by such a conveyance.

Darlington's App. 86 Pa. 512.

In the case of Boyd v. Boyd, 66 Pa. 283, no blood relation existed between the parties; they were merely friends and acquaintances who had done business for each other; and yet the court regarded it as a case where the beneficiary under the will should be called upon to assume the burden of proof and show the complete bona fides of the transaction.

In Cuthbertson's Appeal, 97 Pa. 163, the same doctrine was reasserted and very clearly defined; and the law as there settled requires an explanation from the defendant which he has not made nor undertaken to make.

In Wilson's Appeal, 99 Pa. 545, the person benefited by the will was an associate and friend, but he could scarcely be supposed to have more influence than a daughter and a son-in-law. And yet the court, quoting the decision in Cuthbertson's Appeal, says: "He (the beneficiary) must make it clearly appear that the gift to him was the free and intelligent act of the testator."

A court of equity will, in favor of heirs, relieve against a contract and sale of real estate, where there has been great disparity in the mental capacities of the contracting parties; and where the inadequacy of the consideration was so gross as to leave no doubt that the vendor must have been laboring under the effect of some strong delusion in his own mind in relation to the subject; although the grantor was not, strictly speaking, a non compos mentis, and although it does not strictly appear that the bargain was induced by false and fraudulent affirmations on the part of the purchaser.

Chitty, Cont. 10th Am. ed. p. 757.

Where the vendor was a man of a weak and eccentric disposition, and at the time of the sale was without the assistance of a disinterested legal adviser, there exists in the whole case such an inequality between the contracting parties that it is impossible for the court to recognize the claim of the defendant to hold the property for anything more than the money he has advanced upon it.

Buswell, Insanity, 286, note.

While the contracts of persons not idiotic and not mentally diseased are not void because of weakness of understanding, yet when one undertakes to deal with such a person he is justly held to be under more than the usual obligation to abstain from deception; the court will regard such transactions with a jealous eye, and if it can see the least speck of imposition, or that the donor is in such a relation to the donee as may naturally give him an undue influence over him, in a word, if there be the least scintilla of fraud, a court of equity will interpose.

Cooley, Torts, 515, 516.

Inadequacy of consideration, the presence of hard and disadvantageous stipulations, or the mere fact that a right or advantage has been given or conceded, without an equivalent, will be a sufficient warrant for the interference of equity, when the weakness of the complainant, or the position held by the respondent, makes it the duty of the one to take that care of the other which the latter is unable to take of himself, although there be no actual fraud or the exercise of undue influence.

Huguenin v. Baseley, 2 White & T. L. Cas. Eq. part 2, 1156.

The case of Harding v. Handy, 11 Wheat. see note, 103 (Bk. 6, L. ed. 429), is a case where the parties to the conveyance bore the same relation to each other as in the case at bar, that of father-in-law and son-in-law; and yet the court treated it as a case coming within the rule, and the conveyance was set aside.

So in Allore v. Jewell, 94 U. S. 506 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 260).

The defendant's haste in offering the property for sale and selling it exhibits clearly that he was uneasy at what he had done and was anxious to get it out of his hands to prevent the heirs from asserting their rights.

Mr. Lemuel Amerman, for appellee, Lowry:

Nothing but very clear error will justify an appellate court in setting aside a master's finding of fact.

Where the master's findings of fact are approved by the court below, an appellate court will not set them aside, except for the clearest error.

Kisor's App. 62 Pa. 428; Phillip's App. 68 Pa. 130; Sproull's App. 71 Pa. 137.

Nothing but fraud or palpable mistake is ground for setting aside an executed contract; and the evidence of these must be clear, precise and indubitable, and of that which occurred at the execution of the instrument.

Stine v. Sherk, 1 Watts & S. 195; Irwin v. Shoemaker, 8 Watts & S. 75; Davidson v. Little, 22 Pa. 245; Graham v. Pancoast, 30 Pa. 97; Geddes App. 80 Pa. 442; Cummins v. Hurlbutt and Bierer's App. 92 Pa. 165, 265; Richard's App. 39 Legal Int. 402; Lynch's App. 97 Pa. 349; Nulton's App. 103 Pa. 286.

The difference between the facts and circumstances necessary to move a chancellor to refuse the execution of a contract, and those necessary to induce him to rescind it is: In one case interposition will be refused on the ground of improvidence, surprise or even mere hardship; on the other a court will act only on the ground of fraud, illegality or mistake.

Yard v. Patton, 13 Pa. 278; Rockafellow v. Baker, 41 Pa. 319; Edmond's App. 59 Pa. 220; Stewart's App. 78 Pa. 88; Lynch's App. 97 Pa. 353.

Neither inadequacy of consideration, hardship, nor mental weakness not amounting to inability to comprehend the contract, when unaccompanied by evidence of imposition or undue influence, furnishes any ground for equitable interference in setting aside an executed contract.

Graham v. Pancoast and Nace v. Boyer, 30 Pa. 97, 99; Aiman v. Stout, 42 Pa. 114; Kelley's App. 32 Pittsb. Legal J. 328.

Under the facts in this case the court would not set aside even an unexecuted contract.

Hetrick's Appeal, 58 Pa. 477, was the case of a man who was eighty-six years of age, alone in the world, infirm in body, and feeble and weak in mind, conveying his entire estate, a house and lot worth $600, to the wife of an insolvent man, by deed in fee simple, upon the insolvent's agreement for his maintenance for life. He, himself, before the contract was fully executed, prayed the court to set it aside. The court dismissed his bill.

Mr. M. E. McDonald, for appellee, Spencer:

The plaintiffs charge Spencer with knowledge of the matters charged against Lowry, and also that Spencer had colluded with Lowry to defraud the plaintiffs.

This allegation is fully, specifically and absolutely denied by Spencer, in his answer and also in his testimony before the examiner.

This put the plaintiffs to the proof of the matters alleged in their bill and thus denied, by two competent and credible witnesses, or one witness and circumstances equivalent to a witness.

Campbell v. Patterson, 95 Pa. 447.

They have absolutely and utterly failed to do this.

Lowry was in possession of the farm from January, 1880, until April 14, 1884, when Spencer bought it.

There were no proceedings instituted, nor was there any notice given that the plaintiffs had or claimed to have any interest in the farm whatever.

Vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subveniunt applies in equity as well as at law.

Slemmer's App. 58 Pa. 168.

Equity will not aid those against one who has been misled by their laches.

Coates v. Gerlach, 44 Pa. 43.

Per Curiam:

The court below did well in dismissing the plaintiffs' bill. A chancellor ought not to interfere to rescind an executed contract when the parties have a full and complete remedy at law; and the more so in a case like the present where the interests of a third party are involved. Moreover, the complainants' case is unsupported by facts.

Enoch Hartman did, as he had a right to do, the best possible for himself, in providing for his own welfare in his old age; and Lowry's bargain turned out to be a good one, only because the old man died sooner than was expected. We agree with the master that the consideration received by Lowry, in view of all the circumstances was not grossly disproportioned to the services which he agreed to render; for he had to run the risk of Hartman's living until extreme old age had made him a serious and costly charge. That it turned out otherwise was an advantage rightly belonging to Lowry, and not to Hartman's heirs.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at costs of appellants.

JANUARY Term, 1887, Nos. 281, 315, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Cross appeals from a decree of the Common Pleas of Northampton County, in an action to recover arrearages of dower. Modified and affirmed in the first appeal. Affirmed in the second.

Bill in equity filed by Charles Brodhead, as administrator of Catherine Shimer, against Stephen D. Heller to recover arrearages of dower, in a certain tract of land, of seventy-eight acres and seventy-eight perches, in Hanover and Bethlehem Townships.

The case was referred to Robert T. Jones, Esq., as master, before whom the facts appeared as follows:

Conrad Shimer died in Hanover Township April 30, 1866, intestate, leaving a widow, Catherine, and three children, Samuel C., Asher D., and Camilla M. No letters of administration were taken out, and his estate was amicably divided among his children, who, on December 10, 1866, entered into the following agreement in writing:

"Whereas, Samuel C. Shimer, Asher D. Shimer and Camilla M. Brodhead, children and heirs at law of Conrad Shimer, deceased, have this day apportioned the real estate of the said decedent among themselves; and whereas, Catherine Shimer, widow of said decedent, has not made any claim for any dower out of said real estate, now the parties, above named, hereby agree with each other that so long as said Catherine shall make no claim for dower they will each of them pay annually to the said Catherine during life as follows, to wit: the said Samuel the sum of $200 annually; the said Asher the sum of $100 annually, and the said Camilla the sum of $200 annually, the said amounts to be paid half yearly, and to be paid into the Dime Savings Bank, of Bethlehem, or such other bank as said Catherine may require, on the first Monday of January and July of each year to the credit of the said Catherine Shimer, commencing with the first Monday of January next, 1867; and nothing shall be considered a payment within the meaning of this agreement, unless the money shall have actually been deposited in such bank; and if the same shall not be paid at the days and times set by any of the parties hereto, any one of the parties, having paid his or her share, shall have authority, and is hereby authorized to bring suit in his or her own individual name as agent and for the use of the said Catherine Shimer, and recover the same as debts of like amount are recoverable by law; and this agreement shall have sufficient power and warrant for such suit; and the said Asher Shimer hereby covenants and agrees in consideration of the larger share of the estate, which he has obtained, that the said Catherine Shimer shall have the exclusive use, occupation and control of the brick house wherein she now resides without payment of rent or other charge during her life; that he will also furnish her with such flour, feed, grain, potatoes and such other farm produce as she has been accustomed to receive from the farm during the lifetime of her husband; that she shall also be permitted to take such eggs and poultry for her own use as she has been accustomed to do in the past, or keep her own poultry along with the said Asher and have them fed as heretofore; that he, the said Asher, will keep two cows for her, giving them yard and stable room and pasture them in the summer, and feed them in the winter in the same manner as he keeps and feeds his own; that he will also furnish her with a safe and comfortable horse and carriage for visiting and other purposes; that he will always keep her provided with good, dry wood, prepared for the stove, and of a quality fully equal to that which is used in his own house, and delivered at the place where she was accustomed to get it during the lifetime of her husband; that her friends and visitors shall always have ready and convenient access to her house by the ways commonly used, and that stabling shall always be provided for her guests and visitors; that she shall at all times have free access to and joint use of the spring house and summer and wash kitchens as in the past, and shall in no way be restricted therein; that he will in the proper season in each year furnish her with three hogs, killed and dressed, and weighing from 250 to 300 pounds each; that he will wagon such coal as she may purchase at the most convenient depot or coal yard to her house, and have the same put in its proper place as she may properly request; that she shall also have the same portion of the garden that she has been accustomed to have, and shall have it manured as in the past, that she shall have the privilege of as much fruit as she may desire from the orchard on the farm for her own use.

"If Mrs. Shimer moves out of the house then Asher is to have the use of it until she may wish to move back.

"Whenever Catherine Shimer shall claim her dower at common law then these payments and privileges shall cease, but nothing herein contained and no receipt by her of any of the above mentioned payments shall be any bar to her application for such dower; but such payments shall be claimed as a credit on the amount of dower which may be claimed. And in the event of claim being made on the 318 acres of the homestead farm, this day conveyed to Asher Shimer, for the dower of the said Catherine, the said Camilla M. Brodhead hereby agrees to pay so much thereof as may be chargeable upon $12,285 worth of said farm, valuing the woodland at the sum of $200 per acre and the farm at $150 per acre, that amount having been paid by the said Asher D. Shimer to the said Camilla M. Brodhead in consideration of her releasing her interest in said farm, and he being entitled to be relieved of any claim for dower to that extent.

(Signed) Sam. C. Shimer,
A. D. Shimer,
Camilla M. Brodhead.

Dated December 10, 1866."

After entering into the above agreement the said Asher D. and Camilla M. executed conveyances to Samuel C. Shimer of six tracts of land of the estate of Conrad Shimer, including the land in question, which was worth about as much as the five other tracts combined.

Samuel C. did not comply with his agreement, having only paid to the widow $250, at different times and in smaller sums than stipulated. In the year 1870 he executed a mortgage of $6,000 to the Society of the United Brethren for Propagating the Gospel Among the Heathen. From their minutes it appeared that Samuel C. represented that there were no liens on the premises, and it was on the faith of such representations that the society gave him the money and took his bond and mortgage.

In 1879 a judgment was entered against him which became a lien on such property, subsequent to the mortgage to the society, and the property was advertised for sale October 11, 1879, at which sale the following notice was read:

"To all bidders at the sheriff's sale of the real estate of Samuel C. Shimer:

"Take notice that I, Catherine Shimer, widow of Conrad Shimer, deceased, am entitled to and shall claim my statutory dower and thirds of such widow in the lands and tenements late of the said Conrad Shimer, deceased, and now about to be sold as the property of the said Samuel C. Shimer; that I have received no part of the said dower and thirds and claim the same from the time of my late husband's death to the time of payment thereof, and with interest thereon according to law.

(Signed in German)
Catherine Shimer.

Bethlehem, October 4, 1879."

At such sale the property was purchased by Isaac Treible for the consideration of $50, subject to the mortgage of the society. December 4, 1879, Treible sold the premises, to Stephen D. Heller, the defendant, for the consideration of $1,000, subject to the aforesaid mortgage.

Heller testified at the trial that shortly before buying of Treible he called upon the widow Shimer relative to her claim for dower.

He asked her what her claim was on Sam's property for dower; and she said that she wanted nothing—that he should go to Sam, and as he made it she would be satisfied. He said he would like to buy the land but would not like to have a lawsuit, and that he intended buying the farm Sam had owned. She said there would be no lawsuit about it, and that he should buy the farm, and that her husband always said it was a good piece of property.

Heller testified that on the faith of what Mrs. Shimer said he bought the land from Treible. There was also testimony of conversation by the widow Shimer with other parties, that she would claim no dower out of any of the land which had belonged to Samuel.

Shortly after the purchase by Heller he paid the mortgage of $6,000 and the accrued interest.

The widow Shimer died May 9, 1881, never having made any demand on Heller for dower or interest. Charles Brodhead, the plaintiff and husband of Camilla M., took out letters of administration, and brought this action against Heller, to recover arrearages of dower.

The defendant contended before the master that at the time of the agreement of December 10, 1866, and the partition of lands of her deceased husband, the widow relinquished her claim to dower and accepted in lieu of such dower and as a substitute for her claims the aforesaid agreement, and that by her declarations, on the strength of which the defendant purchased the farm and paid the aforesaid mortgage, she was estopped to claim dower.

The master held that the widow was no party to the agreement between the children; that under the law she had an estate in the land which could not be devested except by a conveyance or by such conduct on her part as would amount to equitable estoppel; that the mere fact that the children agreed to pay her a certain annuity in lieu of dower, and that she took the money, does not in law affect her claim; that the evidence of Heller as to the declarations of the widow Shimer were incompetent because of her death, and that the conversations with other parties relative to her claim for dower, made after Heller had bought would not amount to an estoppel, for both Heller and Knecht (another purchaser) had already acted, and although Heller paid for the mortgage afterwards, he had already agreed to do this, having bought subject to it.

The master took evidence as to the rental value of the premises, and allowed the sum of $133.33, annually, from April 30, 1866, to May 9, 1881, fifteen years, amounting to $1,999.95, less the sum of $250 paid by Samuel C. to the widow. Exceptions to this report were filed by both parties; they were dismissed, and the report of the referee confirmed by the court below. Both parties appealed.

Brodhead assigned as error: 1, the action of the court in estimating the dower upon the basis of one third of the annual rents, issues and profits instead of one third of the annual interest upon the estimated value of the land; 2, in not allowing the interest on the same sum found due, from the time of the death of the widow; 3, in deducting from the amount found due the plaintiff the sum of $250.

Heller assigned as error the action of the court in dismissing the following exceptions to the master's report:

1. The master erred in holding: "So far as concerns the question before the master, it is not material whether Samuel owned other land than the seventy-eight acres and seventy-eight perches, because the bill only seeks to have the statutory dower set apart so far as the Heller tract is concerned."

2. The master erred in holding: "The widow was no party to the agreement between the children." He should have found that she accepted under the agreement and had her living under it, until Samuel was sold out by the sheriff.

3. The master erred in holding that Catherine Shimer was not estopped by reason of her declaration made to Knecht, on the ground that "both Heller and Knecht had already acted, and although Heller paid for the mortgage afterwards, he had already agreed to do this because he bought subject to it." He should have held that Heller was not bound to pay the mortgage, and would have declined to pay it, had he not relied on Mrs. Shimer's statement, communicated to him by Knecht, that she would claim no dower in any of the lands that belonged to Samuel.

5. The master erred in holding that it was of no importance that in case the plaintiff recovered, distribution would be made to Samuel C. Shimer of his share in his own debt."

6. The master erred in holding that: "The declarations of Samuel C. Shimer to parties from whom he borrowed money, are clearly inadmissible to affect the question arising in this controversy." He should have held that Samuel's mother had always referred all inquiries about dower to Samuel; that she had record notice that Samuel had incumbered the farm with a $6,000 mortgage, and was bound by all that Samuel said about the dower.

9. The master erred in not finding that Samuel C. Shimer's children are in equity estopped from recovering in this suit, money which their father was bound to pay.

10. The master erred in deciding that Samuel C. Shimer was not a competent witness on the call of the defendant.

8. The master erred in not dismissing the bill, at the costs of the plaintiff.

7. The master erred in finding that the rent, issues and profits of the Heller farm amounted to $400 per year, giving the widow $133.33 each year. If there were any dower chargeable, it would be a proportionate share of $200 per annum for the six tracts; and then it would begin to run only from the time that Heller bought the land, and had the yearly income, or from the time that Mrs. Shimer abandoned her claim under the agreement and made her claim against the land.

Mr. Fred Green, for Brodhead.

Mr. W. E. Doster, for Heller.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the death of Conrad Shimer, intestate, his widow became entitled to the use of one third of his real estate during life. She was not a party to any instrument which devested that estate; and it may be noted that in the agreement signed by the heirs, dated December 10, 1866, they call her estate dower, and speak of her claim of dower at common law; but the agreement considered in its entirety reveals no intent to change her estate, or deprive her of remedies to which she was legally entitled. This cause must be considered with reference to the right of the widow, defined by statute.

The contention of Heller is that the widow accepted the agreement, and is bound by its terms. That we think is correct; and the first inquiry is, What are the terms relating to herself? At the outset it is stipulated that so long as the widow shall make no claim for dower, each heir shall pay her annually a certain sum, and one of them shall allow her to occupy a house and furnish her specified articles, with permission to enjoy definite privileges. And it is finally stipulated that when the widow shall claim her dower the payments and privileges shall cease, and "Nothing herein contained and no receipt by her of any of the above mentioned payments shall be any bar to her application for such dower; but such payments shall be claimed as a credit on the amount of dower which may be claimed."

Thus it is expressed that she may claim her dower, and whenever she shall claim it, the prior payments shall be a credit. There is no room for implication that by receipt of the payments she waived her right under the law; nor is there any reason in the facts of this case why she should not recover all arrears, subject to a credit as stated in the agreement. It is unnecessary now to consider the question whether, had the annual payments been made, the widow could recover for the years covered by the payments. The contract repels an inference that the widow released the whole, or any part of the amount due her, unless in case of actual payment as agreed.

It is not the intendment that the widow must demand her legal right in all the lands of which her husband died seised, if she elected to do so in the land taken in severalty by one of the heirs. In making the division the value of the widow's interest was not ascertained. She continued to be entitled to her estate in each portion; and it is evident that each heir was to satisfy her, or hold his portion subject to her estate.

Heller claims that if the widow was entitled to dower in his land, to ascertain the amount due it is necessary to ascertain the value of all the lands of which her husband was seised at the time of his death, and determine the amount by the proportion of the number of acres in his tract to the number of acres in all said lands. But such is not the statutory rule for ascertaining the value of the widow's estate.

The inquest shall divide the real estate into as many purparts as there are heirs, if it can be done without prejudice; and if that cannot be done, then to divide the real estate into as many purparts as can be, without prejudice to the value of the whole, and make a just appraisement of each. And the heir who accepts, shall pay the widow the interest on one third the appraised value, or the amount of his bid if he bid higher than the appraisement.

Not until the Statute of 1867 was the court authorized to decree that the share or purpart of the widow in the whole of the decedent's real estate, where it consists of several tracts, shall be charged on one or more of the tracts, and the others be discharged. That Act makes no change in the rule that each purpart shall be separately appraised.

The widow might have compelled partition, and valuation of the real estate. Instead, she acquiesced in the agreement of the heirs which recognized her right, as already noted. That she could, under the circumstances, maintain a bill in equity, to recover the sum due on her statutory estate, was decided in Merrill's Appeal, 16 W. N. C. 491.

Her administrator has the same remedy. This claim relates to a separate tract now owned by Heller. The owners of other tracts are in no way jointly liable with him. Nor does it concern him whether any other person shall be compelled to account for the widow's interest in the land. In any form of procedure, either a separate appraisement of this tract would be made, or the rental value thereof ascertained.

In Merrill's Appeal the sum demanded was measured by one third the value of the rents, issues and profits; and this seems a just basis where all the interested parties, by neglect or agreement, omitted to avail of the statutory proceeding for partition and appraisement. If the widow wanted more than one third the rental value of the land, she should have enforced partition. Although her right remained unimpaired by the contract, she had no disposition to assert it until the land was about to be sold by the sheriff. To have proceeded then for partition would not have availed for recovery of anything prior to commencement of the proceeding. We are not convinced that the master and court below erred in ascertaining the amount of arrears due the complainant. Nor are we persuaded that the ruling relative to interest, under the circumstances, is erroneous. The first and ninth assignments in Heller's appeal, and the first two assignments in the administrator's appeal, are not sustained.

We think the master rightly failed to find the alleged estoppel. The testimony was insufficient to establish it.

Nor was there error in ruling that Samuel C. Shimer was incompetent to testify of matters which occurred between himself and the widow in her lifetime. None of the assignments in Heller's appeal are well taken.

In the appeal by the administrator, the third assignment must be sustained. Samuel C. Shimer paid $150 in 1869, and $100 in 1870; in no year did he pay the widow the sum stipulated in the contract. He took other lands besides the tract described in the bill. Fenicle's testimony shows that the value of the other lands fully equals the value of Heller's tract. Therefore, Heller is entitled to a credit of not more than half of what Shimer paid, and the decree must be corrected by adding $125 to the sum due the complainant.

In the appeal of Brodhead, administrator, it is now considered and decreed that the decree of the court below be corrected by striking out the words "one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine" and inserting instead thereof the words "one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four." The appellee, Stephen D. Heller to pay the costs. Record remitted.

In Heller's Appeal—Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at costs of appellant.

(Argued March 1, Decided March 14. 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 57, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in a feigned issue. Affirmed.

On the 18th of September, 1876, Messrs. Bernhart & Koch obtained judgment against David Mitchell for $942.55. This judgment was revived on the 23d of August, 1884, for $1,378.48; whereupon, on the 19th of August, 1885, execution issued, and the sheriff levied upon the personal property in question in this case.

When this levy was made Agnes Mitchell, the wife of the defendant, presented her petition to the court, claiming that the property upon which the sheriff had levied, as the property of David Mitchell, was her property and not her husband's. This issue was thereupon framed to determine the ownership.

At the trial before ERMENTROUT, J., it appeared that on August 26, 1876, Mrs. Mitchell procured from Bernhart & Koch, a credit to the extent of $300, upon a policy of life insurance owned by her husband, and for that purpose assigned by him to Bernhart & Koch. Under this arrangement she procured flour from time to time as she needed it in carrying on the bakery business, which had formerly been conducted by her husband. About twelve days after the securing of credit as aforesaid, an execution having been issued against her husband, the sheriff levied upon his personal property.

The husband claimed the benefit of the Exemption Law, and $300 worth of property was appraised to him. This property remained on the premises and was absorbed in the business which Mrs. Mitchell conducted. Mrs. Mitchell carried on the business in the house of her husband for more than a year, when, in 1878, the house too was sold by the sheriff. She continued the business and the property in question was the accumulations. The premiums on the policy of insurance were paid by Mrs. Mitchell.

The plaintiff offered to prove that about twenty years ago David Mitchell, her husband, contracted the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors; that he persisted in the habit, and that he became so drunken and profligate by reason of his habit of drinking that about the year 1878 he entirely neglected and refused to provide for his wife and family; and from that time, that is to say, from 1878 up to the present time, he had entirely neglected and refused to support his wife and family; to be followed with proof that Agnes Mitchell, the plaintiff, from 1873 up to the present time, had solely, exclusively, without any assistance or help from her said husband, David Mitchell, supported herself and her family by her own earnings; and also to be followed with proof that the property described in the interpleader in this case was purchased by Agnes Mitchell with her own earnings, without any assistance from her husband, during the last nine years.

To this the defendants objected; but the court overruled the objection and admitted the testimony.

There was testimony that the only articles embraced in this issue which were taken by David Mitchell under his exemption were several jars, two kitchen tables and one mirror; and for these articles the jury found against Mrs. Mitchell. All of the other articles Mrs. Mitchell testified were bought by her out of the earnings of the business.

The defendants submitted, inter alia, the following points, which were refused by the court:

"1. There is no evidence in the case from which the jury can find that David Mitchell, the plaintiff's husband, had either neglected or refused to provide for her, or deserted her, before the time at which she alleges that she took up and carried on the business in her own name. Therefore, any flour, stock or other materials purchased by her on credit at the time of her commencing the business in question, and the increase thereof or accretions thereto, became the property of David Michell; and it appearing from the plaintiff's own testimony that the property in question is part of the increase of the said business, the jury would have to find for the defendants.

"3. Not only does the plaintiff's testimony fail to show that her husband, David Mitchell, neglected or refused to provide for her, or that he deserted her, but on the contrary, the plaintiff, in her own testimony, has clearly stated that her husband had carried on the business up to the time of the sheriff's sale, and that the said business (immediately after the sheriff's sale) had begun to be carried on by her, and that she and her family had always lived and been supported out of the same. The plaintiff, therefore, having been supported out of her husband's business up to the very time of her obtaining credit and commencing the business for herself, it follows that at the time of her obtaining credit and commencing the said business, the conditions contemplated by section 2 of the Act of May 4, 1855, did not exist; that she was not then a feme sole trader, or invested with the rights of such, and that the flour, stock and materials so purchased, with all the accretions, became the property of her husband; the plaintiff having also testified that the property embraced in this issue was part of the accretions of the said business, the verdict will have to be for the defendants.

"4. The undisputed testimony submitted by the plaintiff herself shows that the business which was commenced after the sheriff's sale and all the accretions of which the plaintiff admits that the property in question was part was so commenced upon credit procured from Bernhart & Koch by the assignment of an insurance policy then owned by David Mitchell, together with the property retained by said David Mitchell under the exemption law. The said business was, therefore, in law the business of the said David Mitchell; and all the profits thereof and accretions thereto, including the property in question, likewise belong to him; and the verdict must be for the defendants.

"5. It appearing from the testimony of William N. Coleman, a witness of the plaintiff, and from that of the plaintiff herself, and from the policy of insurance on the life of David Mitchell with the assignment indorsed thereon, that the basis of the credit upon which the plaintiff commenced the business in question was the said policy of insurance owned by the plaintiff's husband and by him for that purpose assigned to Bernhart & Koch, it follows that the nucleus of the said business, or the original capital with which the plaintiff commenced the same, was furnished by her husband, and the said business and its accretions belong to the husband; and the plaintiff having herself testified that the property in question is part of the accretions of the said business, the verdict will have to be for the defendants.

"6. Under all the circumstances of the cause the jury will have to find for the defendants."

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff.

The assignments of error specified the admission of the testimony referred to, and the refusal of defendants' points.

Messrs. William P. Bard and Cyrus G. Derr, for plaintiffs in error:

Evidence to prove the wife's title, must be clear and satisfactory, clear and full proof, clear and unequivocal; it must exclude reasonable suspicion that the property was the husband's.

Tripner v. Abrahams, 47 Pa. 228; Baringer v. Stiver, 49 Pa. 129; Flick v. Devries, 50 Pa. 266; Curry v. Bott, 53 Pa. 400.

The property of a husband is not to be covered up or withheld from creditors upon equivocal, suspicious or doubtful evidence of a wife's right to it. The family relation is such and the probabilities of ownership so great, on the part of the husband, that a plain and satisfactory case should be made out before the wife can be permitted to hold property against honest creditors.

Earl v. Champion, 65 Pa. 194.

When a creditor seizes property in the possession of a husband, for his debt, the presumption is that it belongs to him and not to the wife; and this is a violent one, and is adhered to for the purpose of protecting creditors. If the wife sets up a claim to it as against the husband's creditors, she must show that it is hers; the burden of proof is upon her, and the evidence must be clear and satisfactory.

Kingsbury v. Davidson, 3 Cent. Rep. 551, 112 Pa. 383.

Where a wife claims property as against her husband's creditors she must show affirmatively, by clear and full proof, that she paid for it with her own separate funds. She must make it clearly appear that the means of acquisition were her own, independently of her husband. It was not the intention of the Legislature to dispense with the presumption which ordinarily and of necessity arises in favor of creditors, in transactions between husband and wife affecting the ownership of property in the wife's name.

Leinbach v. Templin, 105 Pa. 527.

Messrs. C. G. Reber, J. Howard Jacobs and H. Willis Bland, for defendant in error:

A feme sole trader, although in fact married, is in law as capable and free as though she was sole in fact.

By the Act of February 22, 1718, § 1, 1 Sm. Laws, 99; 1 Purd. Dig. 801, "Whenever any mariners or others are gone, or hereafter shall go to sea, leaving their wives at shopkeeping or to work for their livelihood at any other trade in this province, all such wives shall be deemed, adjudged and taken, and are hereby declared to be, as feme sole traders."

"So, by the custom of London, a feme covert may act as sole in the way of trade, if she buys and sells in trade for herself, with which her husband does not intermeddle."

Cro. Car. 69.

So it shall be, if the husband formerly used the same trade, but at the time of the contract is a soldier beyond sea, and does not intermeddle. Id.

"By the custom of London, and in some States, by virtue of statutes, a married woman may be authorized to carry on trade as a feme sole."

2 Bouvier, Inst. p. 85.

A feme sole merchant is defined by Jacob (Law Dictionary) to be "A married woman who, by the custom of London, trades on her own account independently of her husband."

It is said in 4 Bouvier's Institutes, 274, § 3999, that "A married woman may also acquire separate property by becoming a sole dealer and trader, by permission of her husband, even without deed; in this case she becomes entitled to all her earnings as her separate estate."

And, if a husband should desert his wife, and by aid of her friends, she should be enabled to carry on a separate trade, her earnings in such trade will be protected in equity from the claims of his creditors.

Cecil v. Juxon, 1 Atk. 278; Lamphir v. Creed, 8 Ves. 599.

The Act of Assembly gives a feme sole trader a capacity of contracting debts and being sued for them, not only touching matters of her trade, but for the maintenance of herself and children; she is placed upon a different footing from a feme sole trader in London, and a much better one.

Burke v. Winkle, 2 Serg. & R. 190.

A married woman who is a feme sole trader can, in Pennsylvania, maintain an action in her own name, for a distributive share of her ancestor's estate.

Valentine v. Ford, 2 Brown, 193.

Under the custom of London the husband must, for conformity, be joined in legal proceedings.

Comyn, Dig. title, Feme Sole Merchant.

A married woman can be invested with the capacities of a feme sole trader under the Acts of 1718 and 1855, without having been so decreed under the fourth section of the Act of 1855.

Black v. Tricker, 59 Pa. 13.

The Act of May 4, 1855, § 2, P. L. 430, 1 Purd. Dig. 801, extends the powers and immunities of a feme sole trader, to the wives of drunken and profligate husbands, and husbands who have deserted their wives.

"Whenever any husband, from drunkenness, profligacy or other cause, shall neglect or refuse to provide for his wife, or shall desert her, she shall have all the rights and privileges secured to a feme sole trader, under the Act of February 22, 1718, * * * and be subject as therein provided; and her property, real and personal, howsoever acquired shall be subject to her free and absolute disposal during her life, or by will, without any liability to be interfered with or obtained by such husband; and in case of her intestacy shall go to her next of kin, as if he were previously dead."

"The section was designed to suspend the marital rights of the husband, as a consequence of the acts enumerated, and at the same time to relieve the wife from her marital disabilities. It was intended to put her on a footing, where she could acquire and exercise dominion over property, to sue and defend; and when the Act declares that property acquired under the circumstances described, the proof of or establishment of those circumstances is surely all that is required in this as in the other Act."

Black v. Tricker, 59 Pa. 17.

A feme sole trader, having capital and tools of her own, may even employ her husband to superintend the business, and have the benefit of his skill and labor, and the additional property produced thereby belongs to her, and cannot be levied upon by his creditors.

Gibbs & Sterrett Mfg. Co. v. Goe, 1 Pennyp. 238; Rush v. Vought, 55 Pa. 487; Welch v. Kline, 57 Pa. 428.

The conduct of the defendants in dealing for years with the plaintiff as if the property were hers, estops them to deny it.

Where one, by his words or conduct, willfully causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time.

Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & El. 469.

Where an act is done or a statement made by a party, the truth or efficacy of which it would be a fraud on his part to controvert or impair, the character of an estoppel shall be given to what otherwise would be mere matter of evidence. It is not necessary that the party against whom an estoppel is alleged should have intended to deceive; it is sufficient if he intended that his conduct should induce another to act upon it, and the other, relying upon it, did so act.

Bidwell v. Pittsburgh, 85 Pa. 417; Bisph. Eq. § 290.

Mrs. Mitchell had a perfect right to use any property of David Mitchell to start in business for herself. The law recognizes her reasonable right to do that.

The Act of 1718 (1 Purd. 801, ed. 1885) contemplates that the wife shall have been started in business by the husband and that he shall have furnished the capital. In the state of the law of married women in 1718, the stock of goods in a shop or store of a married woman living with her husband would have been the property of the husband. The Act contemplates a business of shopkeeping existing at the time the husband goes to sea, and provides that:

"When any mariners, or others, are gone, or hereafter shall go to sea, leaving their wives at shopkeeping, * * * all such wives shall be deemed adjudged and taken, and are hereby declared to be, as feme sole traders."

We cite generally upon the proposition that the property in controversy is, under the facts of this case, the property of Mrs. Mitchell:

Act February 22, 1718, 1 Purd. Dig. 801; Act May 4, 1855, 1 Purd. Dig. 801; Ellison v. Anderson, 1 Cent. Rep. 624; Black v. Tricker, 59 Pa. 13; King v. Thompson, 87 Pa. 365; Elsey v. McDaniel, 95 Pa. 472; Orrell v. Van Gorder, 96 Pa. 180.

Per Curiam:

There is no error in the answers to the points submitted, nor in the admission of evidence. Whether the husband had neglected or refused to provide for his wife was a question of fact. The evidence that he had done so for a great length of time was amply sufficient to submit to the jury. It tended to prove not only that he persisted in not supporting his wife and his children, but that she actually supported and provided for him. It was well submitted to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

George M. LOCKARD et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
Zebulon S. ROBBINS.

1. A right to remove, or use at will, a house built on another's land is merely a revocable license to let the building remain until a reasonable time after notice that it must be removed, and up to that time to use it where it stands.
2. The licensee's right is not personal. He may lease the house.
3. If the owner of the land obtains possession of the house from the tenant of the licensee upon the understanding that possession shall be restored to the tenant when demanded, this does not amount to a revocation of the license. The licensee can maintain an action for use and occupation against the owner of the land to recover compensation for such possession.

(Argued March 1. Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 397, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Columbia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

This was an action by Zebulon S. Robbins against George M. and John K. Lockard, trading as G. M. & J. K. Lockard. It originated before a justice of the peace. The plaintiff's claim, as set forth on the justice's docket, was for $262.50 "rent for the use and occupation of a grain house on the property of the defendants, agreeably to an article of agreement made between the said parties."

The agreement referred to was dated March 3, 1873, and was signed without seals by J. J. Robbins, J. M. Robbins, W. V. Robbins and the plaintiff, Z. S. Robbins, of the one part, and the defendants of the other part. The parties of the first part were individual members of a corporation entitled "The Columbian Iron & Manufacturing Company," which owned the land upon which the grain house in question stood. The agreement was as follows:

"Whereas, the said Lockards have purchased one fifth of claims due to the Columbian Iron & Manufacturing Company on their books, amounting to the sum of $1,087.95 (the one fifth) and have given their notes for the same, it is therefore agreed between the said parties that in case any part of the said claims are uncollectible or debts against the said corporation are presented to reduce the net amount of said claims to less than the sum above mentioned, then the amount reduced is to be credited on the notes given by the parties of the second to the party of the first part, dated the day above written.

"It is further agreed by and between the said parties that the said parties of the second part shall have the option to purchase so as to become owners of one sixth of the whole stock of the corporation at any time within one year from the 10th day of February, A. D. 1873, from the parties of the first part, at par, and to be paid for as may be agreed at the time of purchase, that is so that John K. Lockard and George M. Lockard shall each become the owner of one sixth of the said capital stock of the company; Lockards to pay the proportion of the improvements. The said parties of the second part for value received do hereby assign, transfer and set over, to the said parties of the first, certificates of the capital stock of the said company numbers five and six, as collateral security for the payment of four notes, each $1,000, dated the date hereof, said certificates to be held by the parties of the first part until notes are paid.

"The grain house on the Manufacturing Company's lot belongs to Z. S. Robbins and can be removed or used by him at will.

"It is agreed by the parties that the corporation is free from debts beyond those on their books or statement."

The agreement was not executed by the corporation.

On October 24, 1873, the corporation assigned all its property to C. R. Woodin, for the benefit of creditors. The deed was executed by the corporation and by the plaintiff, Z. S. Robbins, as one of its directors, and contained no reservations. The defendants remained in possession of the property to take care of it after the assignment, at the request of C. R. Woodin, the assignee, until the spring of 1874, and the plaintiff removed to Shenandoah, Schuylkill County.

On November 26, 1874, the assignee sold the property to M. W. Jackson at public auction; and on December 22, 1874, he executed a deed pursuant to said sale by auction, without any reservation, including buildings, etc.

About January 1, 1875, the defendants again took possession of the property under a lease from M. W. Jackson. Soon after this J. H. Stecker took possession of the grain house. Stecker was a friend and son-in-law of Z. S. Robbins. In October, 1876, Stecker gave the key to the grain house to John K. Lockard, one of the defendants, with the understanding that said Lockard could use the grain house until Stecker wanted it again. Soon after this Stecker removed to Three Rivers, Michigan, and never requested that the key be returned to him. George M. Lockard, the other defendant, had nothing to do with obtaining or receiving the key from Stecker.

On October 14, 1879, Jackson conveyed the property to the defendants, including buildings, and without any reservation. Soon after this the Lockards removed the grain house and set it up temporarily on props.

ELWELL, P. J., charged the jury as follows:

"In this case the plaintiff claims for the use and occupation of a house (and the ground on which it stood) from October, 1876, to the time of the commencement of this suit February 14, 1882, at the rate of $50 a year. In such an action the right to recover is based upon contract. The plaintiff must establish by satisfactory evidence that the use and occupation have been with his consent and so as to infer an acknowledgment of his title. It is not necessary that there should be an express contract; it may be implied; as, if A labors for B, with B's knowledge and consent, there arises the presumption of B's agreement to pay, although no such bargain in terms be proved.

"If one enter upon another's land under claim of ownership, he may be liable for trespass or in ejectment, but not in action for the occupation and use, because there is no contract between him and the person on whose land he trespasses. Ordinarily the declaration sets forth that the defendant, being indebted to the plaintiff for the use and occupation of certain lands described, undertook and faithfully promised to pay what the use and occupation thereof should be reasonably worth; but the declaration here contains only an allegation that the defendants occupied the plaintiff's land. However, the case is trying upon its merits, as much as though the other allegation were expressly made.

"We must look through the evidence and ascertain whether there is anything from which a contract can be implied on the part of the Lockards to pay Robbins rent. We begin in 1873, the title not being traced further back, when [the Columbia Iron & Manufacturing Company, the owner of the land upon which the building in question then stood, in March, entered into an agreement among themselves, providing that these defendants might purchase a fifth part of the claims of that company, amounting to a certain sum, making a further agreement in regard to the stock of that concern, and containing this clause: 'The grain house on the Manufacturing Company's lot belongs to Z. S. Robbins, and can be removed or used by him at will.' It was perfectly competent for the parties to this agreement to declare in writing the ownership of this building described by one of the witnesses as temporarily set on blocks or props, not permanently fixed upon a foundation fastened in the soil. The parties had a right to consider it as severed from the realty, and did in fact treat it as personal property].

"Perhaps it might, under the evidence here, have been levied upon and sold as a personal chattel belonging to Robbins; but the question of his right to occupy the ground of his associates is another matter and is for the court.

"It is claimed for the plaintiff that he has a right to keep his building where it was as long as he chooses, enjoying access to it and the use of it. That amounts almost to a claim of fee simple in the soil, at any rate to the claim of a life estate in Robbins. [But I construe the agreement to give him a license, merely, to let his house stand and to use it, or to tear it down and remove it, to do whatever he pleases with it, until the owners of the soil should give him notice to take it away, a revocable license, not the grant of a perpetual right, authority to let the building remain until a reasonable time after notice that it must be removed, and up to that time to use it where it stood], unless the title was devested by the subsequent conveyance.

"[While the building stood on the spot of its erection, unmolested by the defendants, used by Robbins or his tenants, Robbins had the right to the use, the defendants acquiescing; but when they assumed the right to move it, if Robbins had any remedy, it was some other form of action than the present, because that act of removal without leave and apparently under claim of ownership put an end to all contract between the parties for the plaintiff's use of the building at the place where it originally stood.]

"The conveyance by this corporation, in October, 1873, to Woodin, assignee, for the benefit of creditors, being for the land and for all ways, woods, water courses and buildings, is said to be without reservation, and to take away all the plaintiff's title in the grain house, whatever it might have been before.

"A conveyance in writing under seal must stand unmodified by parol, unless fraud or mistake be shown. [Robbins, as one of the company's directors, united in the conveyance which devested all the company's right. Woodin, the assignee, held that title just as the corporation held it. He was not a purchaser; he merely took the conveyance for the benefit of creditors, and he held just as the corporation did. But if the conveyance had been made to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the claim of Robbins, that purchaser would have taken the whole title to the property, the buildings and everything else upon the soil] and under the soil and above it, the conveyance being sufficient to transfer all rights.

"Whatever was said by M. E. Jackson, attorney for Woodin, or by the plaintiff, at the assignee's sale, would be of no validity as affecting the question of reservation to Robbins of title to the grain house, would not alter Robbins' right in the building; but if the purchaser at that sale had notice of Robbins' claim he took the property subject to Robbins' title whatever it is and was. If the title is worthless, the claim and the notice amount to nothing; if the title is good, the notice binds the conscience of the purchaser.

"[Whether all persons connected with this property did, or did not, fully know of and understand Robbins' claim to it, is submitted to you to find from the evidence. Robbins says that some time in 1873 he leased to J. H. Stecker, at $50 a year, and that Stecker occupied as his tenant for two or three years and paid him rent. Stecker, in his deposition, says he paid for about a year and a half, at $100 a year—from about 1873 to the fall of 1876, says Robbins; and says also 'It was worth $50 a year, Stecker paid me that.'

"In the view that I take of the case, the rights of the parties depended upon Stecker's tenancy and his delivery of the key to J. K. Lockard. If the Lockards obtained possession under Robbins' tenant, knowing him to be such, they stood in Stecker's shoes and are bound to acknowledge his landlord as theirs. Cooper v. Smith, 8 Watts, 539.

"'The title of a landlord to real estate, though perfectly good, would frequently be rendered the next thing to worthless, etc. * * * He must surrender up the possession, and then, and not till then, will he be in a situation to controvert the title of the landlord.'

"Was Stecker, during these years from some time in 1873 to 1876, Robbins' tenant in the occupancy of this grain house? One of the Lockards testifies that for a while after the assignee's sale to Mordecai W. Jackson, they were 'looking after' the property for him. Upon the other side it is testified that Stecker was renting the building, carrying the key, and controlling the possession, and that J. K. Lockard asked his permission to use the building, asked and obtained the key, promising to return it to Stecker, which is not denied by Lockard. Did the Lockards take possession by permission of Robbins' tenant, with the understanding that the possession should be restored to him? If so, and if the object was by managing with the tenant to oust the owner, the Lockards stand precisely where the tenant stood; the landlord would have to be turned out by due course of law, not by overreaching or colluding with his tenant.

"If Stecker's tenancy existed, and if the Lockards gained possession in the manner stated by him, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover the reasonable rental of the property, from the time it was taken by the defendants down to the time that they removed the building (at some time between 1878 and March, 1880), with interest from the time the credits accrued, which will be for you to find.]"

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff for $171.25.

The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. E. H. Little and Robert R. Little, for plaintiffs in error:

The court misapprehended the fact in charging that the corporation owner transferred the grain house on the company's lot to Z. S. Robbins. The agreement referred to shows that it was individual members who undertook to transfer the building; and that it was not the act of the corporation either by a vote of the directors or by any of its officers or agents.

Unless the individual members of a corporation are authorized to do so they cannot bind it by any express promise.

Allegheny Co. Workhouse v. Moore, 95 Pa. 408.

There is no evidence that the grain house was set up temporarily on props, until after it had been removed by the Lockards in 1879. According to the evidence it was a fixture, until after the Lockards leased the property from M. W. Jackson, January 1, 1875.

See Schouler, Personal Property, 136–140.

"The rule is a general one that upon the sale of the freehold any and all fixtures attached to it will pass unless there is some express provision to the contrary."

Schouler, Personal Property, 150.

Robbins should have removed the fixture at the time he sold, or within a reasonable time thereafter.

Davis v. Moss, 38 Pa. 346.

Robbins waived his right to the grain house by assenting to the assignment for the benefit of creditors without reservation.

Buck's App. 2 Pennyp. 327.

When chattels are so far annexed to the freehold as to become fixtures, they pass to a grantee of the land, unless expressly excepted in the conveyance.

Davis v. Buffum, 51 Maine, 160; Noble v. Bosworth, 19 Pick. 314; Union Bank v. Emerson, 15 Mass. 159; Terhune v. Elberson, 3 N. J. L. (2 Penn.) 726; Miller v. Plumb, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 665; Preston v. Briggs, 16 Vt. 124.

Robbins' interest was not a revocable license, but even if it was the deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, executed nearly seven years before the Lockards removed the grain house, operated as a revocation of the license. If there was a revocable license by a former owner, the sale and conveyance of the land operated as a revocation.

Vollmer's App. 61 Pa. 118.

An unsealed memorandum given by the owner of land, stating that A is the owner of a house upon the premises, and authorizing its removal, is a mere license to enter, and is revoked by a subsequent conveyance to B.

Whitaker v. Cawthorne, 3 Dev. Law (N. C.) 389.

A parol license to enter and occupy land is revoked by the death of the owner of the land, or by a conveyance by him, and, therefore, cannot bind his sucessors, unless it is irrevocable.

Eggleston v. New York etc. R. R. Co. 35 Barb. (N. Y.) 162; Carter v. Harlan, 6 Md. 20, 38.

The deed to C. R. Woodin for the benefit of creditors, expressly conveys all buildings, without any reservation; and the words are employed by Z. S. Robbins, the plaintiff, for he executed the deed as one of the company's directors.

The words of an instrument shall be taken most strongly against the party employing them.

Broom, Legal Maxims, p. 254.

In the absence of ambiguity, no exposition shall be made which is opposed to the express words of the instrument.

Id. p. 266.

Again, if the court were right in construing the agreement of March 3, 1873, as giving Z. S. Robbins a revocable license, it does not give a license to Stecker, nor to any assignee of Robbins, nor to any person but Robbins, personally.

"A license is a personal privilege and is not assignable; an assignment by a licensee determines his rights."

Dark v. Johnston, 55 Pa. 164, 171.

It is not contended that there was any express contract on the part of the Lockards to pay rent to Robbins. And the question here raised is whether the law will imply a contract, on the part of the undisputed owners of property, to pay rent to a party having no title whatever.

A tenancy by implication will in general arise when the ownership of premises is in one person and the occupation is in another, while there has been no distinct agreement.

Jackson & G. Land. & T. 18.

Hence, Stecker as a trespasser was liable to pay the Lockards and not Robbins for the use of the property.

"A tenancy by implication can never arise under a party who has not the legal estate of the premises in question."

Taylor, Land. & T. 15, 21.

"If the position of the parties to each other can be referred to any other ground than that of a distinct tenancy, no promise to pay rent can be implied."

Id. p. 491.

"In no case does the action for use and occupation lie, unless the party has the legal estate, nor where the title is in dispute; for the court will not try the title in this action, the proper remedy in such cases being by ejectment."

Id. p. 492.

Mr. John G. Freeze, for defendant in error:

To lay the foundation for a recovery in assumpsit for use and occupation of real estate, the relation of landlord and tenant must exist under a contract express or implied.

Clark v. Clark, 25 Am. Law Reg. 768.

The ownership of a building, with the right to use it, carries with it the right to put a tenant into it and receive the rents from him; and leasing the building is in no legal sense an assignment; and the authorities referred to by the plaintiffs in error do not touch the case before the court.

2 Bl. Com. chap. 20.

Even under the strict doctrine of the old cases relative to landlord and tenant the plaintiff below in this case is entitled to recover, because he proves: first, ownership; second, the right of use; third, reservation of the building at sale; fourth, acknowledgment of ownership in plaintiff by defendants below after the sale; fifth, tenancy under himself by Stecker, and payment of rent; sixth, the succession of defendants below, to the tenancy, by their request of the key, and agreement for its return.

But the contractual relationship is not so strictly held in the later cases, and the relaxation seems to be on just and equitable principles.

A contract to pay rent may be implied, from the title of the plaintiff and the occupation of the defendant.

Mercer v. Mercer, 12 Ga. 421; Cummings v. Noyes, 10 Mass. 432; Nat. Oil Refining Co. v. Bush, 88 Pa. 335.

Per Curiam:

Each of the twelve specifications of error is to the charge of the court. The evidence was sufficient to submit to the jury, and it was submitted in a clear and correct charge. We discover nothing therein calculated to mislead the jury. The facts found by them relieve the verdict from all legal difficulty, and well support the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

William Henry KIME et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
Thomas B. POLEN et ux., in Right of Wife.

In ejectment by Polen against Kime for a lot of ground, both claimed under Tripp, who in 1852 was the owner of a tract including the lot in question. In 1858 the tract was sold at sheriff's sale, on a judgment against Tripp, to Sharps, who conveyed to Shoemaker. In 1873 Shoemaker conveyed to Polen. Kime was in possession claiming by a defective paper title, and by adverse possession. Kime's fence in 1873 included part of the lot and he alleged it had stood in the same place since 1860, but the evidence was indefinite. Shoemaker's title to the lot was clear and his deed to Polen mentioning other adjoiners besides Kime's line as well as the amount of land conveyed, indicated an intention to convey the lot to Polen without regard to Kime's fence. The court below left the question of Shoemaker's intention to the jury.—Held, affirming judgment on a verdict for Polen, that the question was merely one of lines and that the justice of Polen's claim was plain from the deeds, which need not have been submitted to the jury.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 37, E. D., before Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiffs in an action of ejectment. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial before ARCHBALD, J., were stated in his charge to the jury, which was as follows:

"I ask that you pay particular attention to the charge that I now shall deliver to you, not because the case possesses greater importance than any other case; it is of sufficient importance to merit your attention in any event, but because I think possibly the true issue, in your minds, may have been lost sight of in considering and hearing evidence upon matters that only indirectly affect that issue.

"A great deal of evidence has been directed to the question of where the fence of the Kimes was in 1873, or prior to that. [Now, it may be that you will find, as the defendants contend and as is sustained by perhaps the greater part of the evidence, that there was a fence at the brow of the hill as early as 1860 or 1861, and that it was continued a long time, and that it stood in the same position in 1873. But even if that fact be established, it still does not entitle the defendants to your verdict, as I shall explain to you.] It is a circumstance to which I shall call your attention in due course, but I state this in the beginning, because too much has been said back and forth and so much evidence directed to the location of that fence, and its establishment as early as 1873.

"This action brought by Mr. and Mrs. Polen (Mrs. Polen being the owner in whom the title now is, or is supposed to be) to recover possession of a piece of land such as is described in the writ, 'bounded on the north by land formerly used for a burying ground,' that would be up the valley, 'and now a common,' the boundary on that side is spoken of as 'a common,' 'on the easterly side,' that is the side down the hill, or towards Scranton from Hyde Park, 'by land used for a burying ground, and by land supposed to belong to one or both of the defendants and now or lately to one Alsworth; on the southerly side by Price Street,' that is on the side down the valley, 'formerly Franklin Street and on the westerly side;' that is up the hill, 'by a street called or known as Fairview Avenue; said described lot being about sixty feet in front on said Fairview Avenue and about the same in the rear, and about thirty-eight feet in depth.'

"[There is sufficient evidence to submit to you, as to the identity of the land described in this writ, which I have now read, and the land in dispute between these parties. There is very little doubt in regard to what land is in dispute between the plaintiffs and the defendants. It is a question for you, whether the description in this writ corresponds with and is identical with the land which has been discussed and shown to be in dispute between the parties. The sheriff has made a return which has not been disputed, and according to law that return is evidence that the defendants are in possession of the land which is described in the writ. In my mind there can be very little question but what there is a sufficient identification of the land described in the writ, with the land which is in dispute between the parties].

"Now, this land being in the possession of the defendants, the plaintiffs, in order to recover, must show that for some reason they are entitled to that possession. If they are the owners in law of the land in dispute, and have shown a title to it, then the law always gives a party the possession of land to which he has shown a title. So the first question for us to direct our attention to is the title of the plaintiffs to this land.

"[The defendants' show of title and the plaintiffs' disclose to us a common source of title, as it is called.] It appears by the evidence, that Mr. Benjamin S. Tripp, this old gentleman, who has been on the witness stand here, owned the whole of the land, reaching from what is now Wyoming Avenue or Ninth Street from the border of the Fellows estate up the hill, covering this whole tract in dispute, and extending up to Main Street, as I remember the testimony, embracing nine acres in all. We may start then from that point, with the ownership of the whole land covering this piece in dispute from Wyoming Street away up to Main Avenue. That circumstance is important, and gives us the basis of the consideration of the plaintiffs' title, and the respective rights of the plaintiffs and the defendants.

"Now, from that common source, although the defendants' title really starts from Mr. Tripp before the plaintiffs' title, I will trace the plaintiffs' title down first.

"On the 15th of July, 1858, Mr. Tripp then being the owner of the whole tract, as I have stated it to you under the evidence, a judgment was entered against him in Luzerne County; and on the 12th of April, 1862, upon that judgment a sheriff's sale was had, and a sale made to Stephen J. Sharps. The sheriff subsequently, on the 23d of April, 1862, executed, acknowledged and delivered to him a deed for this land.

"I will read the description in that deed. 'Commencing at a corner on Chestnut Street' (that street, as you will remember the evidence, is up on the hill parallel to Fairview Avenue, which is just on the brow of the hill—that is, Chestnut Street is westerly then, under the evidence, from Fairview Avenue.) 'Commencing at the corner of Chestnut Street, in line of land belonging to the Baptist Church and running thence in an easterly direction along the line of land of said Baptist Church, lands of Timothy and John Gardner and lands supposed to belong to the burying ground 255 feet, more or less, to a corner.'

"That would be, as I understand it, starting at Chestnut Street and running easterly in a direction which would cross Fairview Avenue and come down the hill 255 feet, more or less, to a corner; 'thence in a southerly direction' (or down the valley, a course at right angles from the other line) along said burying ground and the rear end of other land in possession of Timothy and John Gardner and land of David J. Davis 160 feet, more or less, to a corner; 'thence in a westerly direction,' (turning up the hill again), 'along the line of land of said Tripp and the rear end of lot owned by William Silkman and land of Timothy and John Gardner, 255 feet, more or less, to said Chestnut Street; thence north, (turning up along Chestnut Street) about 150 feet, more or less, to the place of beginning.'

"You will notice that the easterly boundary of the land levied upon and sold and conveyed by this sheriff's deed is the tract of Timothy and John Gardner, among others, bounded by the burying ground and by David J. Davis, and also by the land of Timothy and John Gardner.

"This sheriff's deed on the 24th day of March, 1868, was assigned by Mr. Sharps to William S. Shoemaker; then on the 10th of December, 1873, William S. Shoemaker conveyed to Mr. Polen, subsequently Mr. Polen conveyed to William Jacobs, who conveyed back to Mrs. Nellie C. Polen.

"That is the claim of the title that the plaintiffs make to this land in dispute.

"The defendants' title, starting from the common source, Mr. Tripp, with the plaintiffs' title, appears by the recitals in the deed of Timothy Gardner to John Gardner, to have originated from Mr. Tripp in a contract on the first of November, 1853. Mr. Tripp at that date contracted to sell to Judson M. Clark. Subsequently a sheriff's sale was had of Mr. Clark's interest, and Mr. William Sweatland became the purchaser. A deed by the sheriff was delivered to him on the 11th of May, 1859, and on the 30th of September, 1859, Mr. Sweatland, on the back of the sheriff's deed, assigned his interest under the sheriff's sale to Timothy and John Gardner.

"Timothy Gardner on the first of August, 1865, deeded his interest in the land to John Gardner. I will read the description in that deed:

"'Bounded as follows: northerly by what is called the Fellows burying ground,' that would be on that (the right) side; 'easterly by land formerly in the occupancy of Sylvanus Fellows, now Wyoming Avenue; southerly by land of Benjamin S. Tripp;' that is down the valley; 'now belonging to David J. Davis; and westerly by other lands late belonging to said Tripp, the same being fifty feet in width on said Wyoming Avenue and running back from the center of said Wyoming Avenue said width 150 feet; coal and minerals with the right to mine and remove the same reserved.'

"This deed, from Timothy Gardner to John Gardner, by its recitals is shown to be the same land that was contracted in 1853 by Benjamin S. Tripp to Judson M. Clark; that is, in 1853 Mr. Tripp, under the evidence, being the owner of the whole tract of land, contracted to sell to Judson M. Clark a piece of land fifty feet wide, running from the center of Wyoming Avenue up the hill 150 feet.

It is fixed by the evidence that Wyoming Avenue was contributed and dedicated to the public by Mr. Tripp, on the one side and Mr. Fellows on the other; that the line between Tripp and the Fellows estate goes through the center of that street. That will explain why, possibly, in this description the center of the street is taken as the beginning of the 150 feet which runs up the hill.

"Now the title of Timothy and John Gardner to this land, vested subsequently as I shall explain to you, in Anna M. Kime and William Henry Kime, two of the defendants.

"[You will notice that in 1853, when the title started, Mr. Tripp had the rest of the land still. It was not until the sheriff's sale in 1862, nine years after, that the title, which is now claimed to be vested in the plaintiffs, passed from Mr. Tripp by the sheriff's sale. The effect of this, then, was to leave in Mr. Tripp the balance of the land, and the balance of that land having been levied upon by the sheriff subsequently and sold by him and conveyed to Sharps, and Sharps having assigned to Shoemaker, the title was vested in Shoemaker of the whole of the balance of the land, down to the Gardner line, down to a point 150 feet from the center of Wyoming Avenue.]

"Now, on the 30th of December, 1872, John Gardner and his wife, who were the owners of this Kime lot at that time, contracted to sell to Dr. W. H. Heath; subsequently Dr. Heath assigned his interest under that contract to Anna M. Kime and William Henry Kime, so that their title is derived under this contract from John Gardner to Dr. Heath and the Gardner title is derived under this contract from Benjamin S. Tripp to Judson M. Clark.

"The description in this contract to Dr. Heath reads as follows: 'Beginning at the corner on the line of the People's Street Railway and running thence along the line of land formerly owned by Benjamin S. Tripp and the line of the old cemetery north 51 degrees west 150 feet, be the same more or less, to the top of the hill, to line of land now or formerly owned by William S. Shoemaker.'

"[The mistake in that description is evident to you from the diagram which has been put in evidence—the Street Railway being here much farther up than the center of Ninth Street or Wyoming Avenue. Beginning 150 feet from the Street Railway would run it up the hill, but counting from the middle of Wyoming Avenue 150 feet, up the hill, and it draws the rear end of the Heath or Kime lot, or Gardner lot, much farther down the hill, being down here (pointing to the map) instead of at the top of the hill.]

"You will notice that this description also runs up to the land of Shoemaker and would be bounded, of course, by the point where Shoemaker's land begins. The fact that under that, there was less land than Gardner could deliver, or contract to sell to Dr. Heath, cannot affect the plaintiff's title to the land, beginning at a point here in the rear of what is claimed to be the true rear line of the Kime lot and extending the balance of the way; the plaintiffs are not answerable for a mistake made in that description.

"Mr. Gardner could not contract to sell what he did not have title to; he might have contracted to sell 250 feet, or 500 feet; but a mere contract to sell that amount would not give any title unless he had it.

"[The mistake made in this contract—and it is an evident mistake—probably is the starting of this whole controversy. Limiting then this contract to the title which Gardner had and which alone he was able to contract to sell, it covers and shows title to no part of the land in dispute.]

"Now, however, I must call your attention to this fact, that the right of a plaintiff to recover in an action of ejectment does not depend upon the weakness of his adversary's title to the land. The plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title. If I am in possession of land, then I have the right to retain that possession against everybody who cannot show a proper title to it. Provided, always, I have not intruded without any color of right upon the possession of another person.

"[So the question is really brought down to this: the defendants showing no title to the land in dispute, have the plaintiffs shown a title to this land? There is no doubt that the title to the land in dispute was fully vested in William S. Shoemaker, so that the whole question turns upon the Shoemaker deed. Did the deed from Wm. S. Shoemaker to Mr. Polen, in 1878, convey title to the land in dispute? That is, did it embrace within its description the land in dispute? If it did, then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. If it did not, then the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover.]

"I will read the description: 'Beginning at a corner on the easterly side of Franklin Street 140 feet from Chestnut Street; thence in an easterly direction sixty feet to land of the Baptist Church; thence in a southerly direction along the land of the Baptist Church, Sperry and lands supposed to belong to the burying ground, about 140 feet, more or less; thence in a southwesterly direction along said burying ground and the rear end of land now in the possession of Kime and Alsworth sixty feet; thence in a northerly direction along the east side of said Franklin Street about 140 feet to the place of beginning. Excepting and reserving twenty feet in width across said lot for road or street, called High Street, containing about 7,200 square feet, more or less, it being lots numbers 8 and 10 and ten feet off of the southerly part of lot No. 6. Excepting and reserving all the coal and other minerals.'

"Something has been said in the argument and your attention has been called in the evidence, to the fact that Mr. Shoemaker, if the position taken by the plaintiffs in this is correct, would have a greater number of feet in length in his whole tract than his deed called for. That does not make any difference. As I have explained to you, the balance that was left to Mr. Benjamin S. Tripp, after he had contracted to sell to Judson M. Clark the whole balance of the tract from the end of the Gardner lot up to Main Street, was sold out at sheriff's sale, and the title, as far at least as Chestnut Street (I am not familiar enough to say whether farther or not) was vested fully in William S. Shoemaker.

"Now then, the description in the deed to Polen begins at a point fixed on the easterly side of Franklin Street distant 140 feet from Chestnut Street, and beginning at that point on Franklin Street it runs thence in an easterly direction; that would be running in a direction parallel with Fairview Avenue sixty feet; that would be across the lot to the land of the Baptist Church; thence running in a southerly direction along lands of the Baptist Church and Sperry and land supposed to belong to the burying ground 140 feet, more or less; thence in a southwesterly direction along said burying ground and the rear end of land now in possession of Kime and Alsworth sixty feet; that is, [the 140 feet, beginning at the point fixed in this deed, is to be carried its full extent, unless there is something else in the deed to limit it and stop it before the full 140 feet are reached, provided of course, Mr. Shoemaker had title to that full 140 feet and we have seen that he did have it.]

"Now, is there anything in this deed, or in the circumstances in the case, that shows that that whole 140 feet is not to be allowed to Mr. Polen under this deed? If there is, then he must stop short at the point the deed fixes less than 140 feet; that is what we must do under this description in the deed and the evidence in the case. If not, then he is entitled to go the the full 140 feet, beginning where he does.

"Now, the boundary on the southerly, as it is here called, or as we have been talking of it, the easterly side of this tract of land conveyed to Mr. Polen, is fixed by the rear end of land now in the possession of Kime and Alsworth and the burying ground; that is three abutters, as we call it, three adjoiners—three pieces of land are spoken of as the boundary on the easterly or southerly side of the Polen lot; land in the possession of Alsworth, the burying ground, and land in the possession of Kime.

"[We have then as the boundary on the rear of the Alsworth lot, the rear of which is not defined, the land in the possession of Kime, and the burying ground.

"Not only are these dimensions and these boundaries given in the deed, but we also have a statement in it of the amount of square feet that was supposed to be in the land covered by this description, that is, 7,200 square feet, more or less. Now, if you take a tract of sixty feet by 140 feet and allow for the twenty feet of road way that is reserved out of it, you will find that it comes to 7,200 feet.

"There is in this a circumstance which you are to weigh, in considering whether the intent of this deed is to give to Mr. Polen the full 140 feet. Of course the title to the land in dispute is not in Kime; it is either in Mr. Shoemaker or it is in Mr. Polen.

"Did then Mr. Shoemaker by this deed intend to deed all that he had there down to the line of Kime? Or did he intend to keep in himself the narrow piece there on the brow of the hill just where it falls over, and a rocky piece of ground at that without particular value, as has been said here by some of the witnesses? That is the question for you to determine.

"The position of Kime's fence in 1873, compared with its position now, as bearing upon the claim of the plaintiffs of title to land in dispute, is only of importance in guiding us to what was the intent of Mr. Shoemaker when he made this deed.

"With proper caution Mr. Shoemaker has given a description which does not compel him to warrant the title to the land in dispute. That is, he only conveyed down to a point where Kime could establish title and right of possession under this deed. Unless it is shown that Mr. Shoemaker intended to retain title in himself to the small strip of land there, the land that is in dispute, then this deed conveyed title to that land to Mr. Polen.

"It seems to me clear, from all the circumstances put in evidence in this case, which, of course, you are to pass upon, that Mr. Shoemaker by his deed did intend to convey all the land he had down to the true line of Kime's lot; that is, to that boundary of Kime's lot which alone he could rightfully claim possession to, and that Mr. Shoemaker did not intend to limit the conveyance simply to the position of Kime's fence as it was in 1873.

"If you are satisfied from the evidence of this, then the deed does not confine the plaintiffs to that line, that fence line as fixed in 1873, or prior to that, but is sufficient to cover the land in dispute and to show the title perfect in the plaintiffs to it; and if you so find, then the plaintiffs are entitled to your verdict; on the contrary, if you find from all the circumstances in the case, under such explanations and instructions as I have given you in regard to them, that it was not the intent of Mr. Shoemaker, by this description, to cover the land in dispute, but that he intended to reserve to himself title in that, that is, that the description excludes the land in dispute, then the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, and your verdict should be for the defendants.]

"I will now read the points which have been submitted. I will first read the defendants' points:

1. "'If the jury find from the evidence that the description of the boundary line between the plaintiffs and the defendants is described in the deed from Wm. S. Shoemaker and wife to Thomas B. Polen, dated December 10, 1873, as follows: thence in a southwesterly direction along said burying ground and the rear end of lands now in possession of Kime and Alsworth, sixty feet, and that this is the boundary line of the land conveyed to the plaintiffs, and that at and before the said 10th of December, 1873, the land in dispute was in possession of Kime and Alsworth, the verdict should be for the defendants.'

Ans.: "I cannot affirm this point.

2. "'A call for adjoiners will prevail over a designation of courses and distances and they must govern though neither courses, distances nor contents correspond.'

Ans.: "This is true as a general proposition of law, and I affirm it. Of course it is qualified by what I have already instructed you.

"The plaintiffs' points are as follows: * * *

2. "'The possession of the defendants of the land in dispute is no defense to this action, unless continued in for thirty years and unless it was actual, visible, notorious, distinct, hostile, continued and exclusive.'

Ans.: "If the plaintiffs have shown title to the land, as I have instructed you, that is legal paper title, as it is called, then a claim of title by possession, if made on the part of the defendants, would have to be such as described in this point. I do not understand, however, that the defendants make any show of title by possession, as it is called."

A juror: "Please notice that second point again."

The Court resuming. "Possession must be continued in for twenty-one years: it must be adverse, hostile, continuous, open and notorious, in order to give title to land. There has been no showing of such possession on either side; so that I do not think this point is important, or that it illustrates in any way the issues here.

"The real question, as I have explained to you, is, whether Mr. Polen's deed covers the land in dispute. The defendants may have had possession of it for ten years or fifteen years; I do not know how long, but they have not shown continuous, adverse possession, such as would give them title. There is no evidence to submit to you on that point, and you should dispel it from your minds. They have no claim by virtue of possession, except the claim which a defendant always has, that he has the right to retain his present possession, however it may be obtained, unless the plaintiff has shown a legal title to the land. * * *

4. "'Under the Sharps deed and the assignment Mr. Shoemaker took title to all land down to the rear end or line of the Gardner lot, although it was more than 255 feet.'

Ans.: "This is affirmed. That is just as I have endeavored to explain to you. * * *

8. "'The jury must find for the plaintiffs for some of the land described in the writ under any circumstances.'

Ans.: "That is, there is a part of the land as claimed by the plaintiffs, to which they are entitled, that Kime does not lay claim to, running from the edge of Fairview Avenue down to the point where Kime's lot is, a little strip there, some fifteen or twenty feet wide; the evidence will show what it is.

"Now, gentlemen, in regard to that, I think the point as stated is correct, and that your verdict, in any event, would have to be for that small piece of land on the edge of Fairview Avenue and the line of Kime's fence as it was in 1873.

"Under the instructions that I have given you, however, if you find that the intention of the Shoemaker deed was, as I have explained, and the description in it applies to all the land down to the rear of where the Kime lot should end, then of course, your verdict would be for the plaintiffs for the whole of the land described in the writ. If you find only for part, you will mark off what part you find for, describing it. If, however, you are satisfied from the deed and from the other circumstances in the case and from the instructions which I have given you, that the plaintiffs have not shown a title to that part of the land lying between where Kime's fence is now, or was in 1873, down to a point where Mr. Shoemaker's title would end to that tract, and the title to the Gardner lot begins, then your verdict should be for the defendants."

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs.

The assignments of error specified the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets; the answers to the points quoted; and that the charge as a whole tended to mislead the jury.

Messrs. Lemuel Amerman and F. W. Gunster, for plaintiffs in error:

The sheriff's deed to Sharps calls for only 255 feet from Chestnut Street and then calls for land "in the possession of Timothy and John Gardner" in the rear, and the deed from Shoemaker to Polen calls for "land in the possession of Kime" in the rear.

The courses and distances in the deed must yield to the marks and monuments made upon the ground.

Willis v. Swartz, 28 Pa. 413; Ogden v. Porterfield, 34 Pa. 191; Cox v. Couch, 8 Pa. 147; Lodge v. Barnett, 46 Pa. 477.

The quantity of land which passes by a sheriff's sale, to the purchaser, is to be ascertained by the extent of the levy.

The right of construing the written return of the sheriff generally belongs to the court; and the quantum of estate conveyed by a sheriff's deed is usually referable to the court alone: but when, from the generality of the terms used, or from uncertainty of description, a doubt is raised as to the boundaries of the levy or the position or limits of the land sold, evidence aliunde may be resorted to; and where such evidence is received, it is error for the court to direct peremptorily how the verdict is to be rendered.

Hoffman v. Danner, 14 Pa. 25.

The question is what limits the officer had in his eye at the time of the levy, and what proportion of the land he actually levied on. If he took less than in fact belonged to the defendant in the execution, just so much passed, and no more.

Hoffman v. Danner, 14 Pa. 25, 30.

What property is embraced in a levy which is obscure in its terms may be shown by parol evidence; and it is a matter of fact to be determined by a jury.

Scott v. Sheakly, 3 Watts, 50.

A tendency to mislead in the general tenor of the charge, although no particular portion is erroneous, is sufficient grounds for a new trial or for reversal.

While a judge has a right to express an opinion upon the evidence, he must not infringe on the province of the jury so as to relieve them from pronouncing an intelligent judgment for themselves—he must not mislead them or control their deliberations.

Mohney v. Evans, 51 Pa. 84; Leibig v. Steiner, 94 Pa. 472.

Mr. Thomas F. Wells, for defendants in error:

The court left it to the jury to say whether the land was sufficiently described in the writ; and the jury found that it was. The court also told the jury that there was sufficient evidence to submit to them, as to the identity of the land described in the writ with the land in dispute.

In one case a description that gave two boundaries of the land was held to be sufficient.

Clement v. Youngman, 40 Pa. 341.

Descriptions or amended descriptions can now be filed in actions of ejectment at any time after verdict.

Act of March 14, 1872, § 1, P. L. 25.

It would, therefore, be useless for the court to reverse on the ground of an imperfect description of the land in the writ, because a correct description could be filed at any time on return of the case to the lower court, on simple motion.

Besides it is the practice in the supreme court to consider an amendment as made, which is as of course.

Jones v. Freyer, 34 Legal Int. 282; S. C. 3 W. N. C. 365.

The testimony as to the location of the fence was immaterial, however, for there was no testimony that the Gardners were in possession up to it, and even if the Kimes were it was only since 1873—years after Sharps had his deed and had assigned it to Shoemaker. Not the fence, but the true line of the Gardner lot was the dispute, and it alone the material question.

The plain request in defendants' first point was that the court should say to the jury that although Shoemaker owned the land in dispute, still under his deed to Polen he did not convey it to the latter, provided that the jury found that it was at that time in possession of the Kimes.

If Mr. Shoemaker then owned it, the possession of the Kimes was under him; and the question then was what was Mr. Shoemaker's intention when he made and executed his deed to Polen.

Means v. Presbyterian Church, 3 Watts & S. 303; Cox v. Freedley, 33 Pa. 124; Miner's App. 61 Pa. 283.

The return of the sheriff to the writ is prima facie evidence that parties served were in possession of the land described; Purd. Dig. 636 pl. 5; and by pleading "not guilty" they admit themselves to be in possession of the whole of the land in dispute, unless they disclaim.

Hill v. Hill, 43 Pa. 521.

The construction of the sheriff's deed was for the court and not for the jury; Cox v. Freedley, 33 Pa. 124; especially as there was no ambiguity in it.

Petts v. Gaw, 15 Pa. 218.

It called for a lot of land from Chestnut Street to the rear of Gardner's land; and the depth is said to be "255 feet more or less." These last words are of great force in determining the intent of the sheriff when he made the levy.

Coughenour v. Stauft, 77 Pa. 191.

In Hoffman v. Danner, 14 Pa. 25, these words were not used, and in that case the court said: "Where a return is intelligible in itself and ascertains with reasonable precision the particular tract taken in execution, no room is afforded for the introduction of explanatory proof, and none will be received in contradiction of the official act."

More than this it would seem as if they had placed themselves in a position where this court will not review this question at all, as they have not printed in their paper book the writ and levy offered in evidence on which the sale to Sharps was made.

See Philadelphia v. Riddle, 25 Pa. 259.

Even if it would have been better for the court to submit the question to the jury instead of declaring the true effect of the evidence, still, the judgment will not be reversed, as the evidence is all one way and the court would surely not have sustained a verdict against it.

Eister v. Paul, 54 Pa. 198.

An occupant of land is supposed to occupy in accordance with his legal title, if he has one.

McCracken v. Roberts, 19 Pa. 390.

A claim founded on adverse possession must be supported by clear evidence of actual, adverse, visible, notorious, hostile and continued possession for the full period of twenty-one years.

Nearhoff v. Addleman, 31 Pa. 281; Petts v. Gaw, 15 Pa. 218; Huffman v. McCrea, 56 Pa. 99; Groft v. Weakland, 34 Pa. 308.

That there was no error in the court's saying "there is no evidence to submit to you on that point" of adverse possession is plain, for there was none.

DeHaven v. Landell, 31 Pa. 120.

A fence will not be taken as a monument unless named in the description.

Sparhawk v. Bagg, 16 Gray, 583; Stuven v. Kalchreuter, 8 W. N. C. 44.

It was within the discretion of the court to give such instruction as was given; in fact the court might have given binding instruction under all the evidence to find for the plaintiff.

McCracken v. Roberts, and Petts v. Gaw, supra.

The sheriff's return of service upon both defendants was prima facie proof of their possession of all the land described.

Purd. Dig. 686 pl. 5; Dietrick v. Mateer, 10 Serg. & R. 151.

Subsequently, a general appearance and plea of "not guilty" was entered on part of defendants. This was an admission, as before said, that they were in possession of all the land in dispute.

Ulsh v. Strode, 13 Pa. 433; Hill v. Hill, 43 Pa. 521.

The court correctly applied the law, we believe; but even if immaterial errors were made it is not ground for reversal.

Galbraith v. Zimmerman, 100 Pa. 374; Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sailer, 67 Pa. 108; Bush v. Stowell, 71 Pa. 208; Hoskinson v. Eliot, 62 Pa. 403.

Per Curiam:

In the case before us there are some eighteen assignments of error, but not one of them can be sustained. There was no dispute about title on either side since both parties claimed from a common grantor, so that the true and only question was one of lines, and that was fairly left to the jury. The sheriff's deed under which Shoemaker claimed, called for the rear end of the Gardner or Kime lot, and necessarily carried the land conveyed by it to that adjoiner, while the Tripp conveyance limited the defendants' claim to a length westwardly of 150 feet from the middle of Wyoming Street.

If, therefore, we were to consult the papers alone, the west line of the defendants' lot and the east line of the plaintiffs' would be readily ascertained by a survey of the defendants' lot. The learned judge, however, thought there was some evidence to go to the jury, and so left it, although we cannot see that it was of such a character as should have changed the prima facie effect of the deeds. There was a good deal of testimony about a fence in the rear of the Kime lot in 1860 or thereabouts; but for what purpose, or by whom erected does not appear. Kime claimed up to it in 1873, but before that date we have nothing concerning its purpose.

Evidence of this kind was of little moment either to establish a line, or on which to base title by the Statute of Limitations.

The judgment is affirmed.

MERRICK THREAD CO., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
PHILADELPHIA SHOE MANUFACTURING CO.

1. To make a principal's ratification of the unauthorized act of an agent effectual it must be shown that there was previous knowledge on the part of the principal of all the material facts and circumstances attending the agent's act.
2. Where there is no evidence of such knowledge, it is error to submit the question of ratification to the jury.

(Argued Jan. 27, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 133, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 2 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of assumpsit. Reversed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial in the court below were as follows:

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by the Merrick Thread Company against the Philadelphia Shoe Manufacturing Company, for goods sold and delivered from November 11, 1882, to April 3, 1884, amounting to $969.09. The defendant pleaded payment, and, subsequently, accord and satisfaction.

The Merrick Thread Company is a Massachusetts Corporation, organized for the sale of spool cotton, having its manufactory and office at Holyoke, in that State.

Franklin S. Hovey is the agent of the Company for the sale of its goods in Philadelphia, which are consigned to him to be sold on commission, he remitting the proceeds at stated periods after deducting his commission and other charges.

Among the customers of Hovey for these goods were Samuel Dunbar & Co., to whom, prior to the fall of 1882, large quantities of goods, on four months' time were sold. This firm was changed, in the fall of 1882, to the Philadelphia Shoe Manufacturing Company, a co-operative association. Hovey continued to sell this Company the Merrick Thread Co's goods, on the same terms as he had sold to Dunbar & Co. Some time in the fall of 1882 or spring of 1883, Hovey was asked by a representative of the Shoe Company to take some stock of the Company in payment for the Merrick Thread Co's goods. This Hovey declined to do on his own account, but said he would submit the matter to his principal, the Merrick Thread Company, for acceptance or nonacceptance.

On February 15, 1883, the Shoe Company sent a letter to Hovey, by A. W. Smith, their bookkeeper, inclosing certificate of twenty-five shares of their capital stock, made out in his name in the following language:

February 15, 1886.

F. S. Hovey, Esq.

Dear Sir: Enclosed please find certificate of twenty-five shares of our capital stock. Not a share has been placed under par value. We agree, in consideration of the acceptance of this certificate, to give you for the Merrick Thread Company our trade indefinitely, averaging about $200 per month. Mr. McKnight, our treasurer, in his individual business, is a consumer of goods in your line to about the same amount, and at present not a customer of yours. We have his agreement also to give you the preference for his wants. We agree to credit our monthly payment of our purchases in your stock until full paid.

Yours, etc.,
(Signed) Philadelphia Shoe Co.
Per A.

This letter and certificate of stock were received by the bookkeeper of Hovey, who gave a receipt for it as follows:

Received, from Philadelphia Shoe Manufacturing Co., certificate twenty-five shares of the capital stock, in the name of F. S. Hovey, No. 29, to be submitted by Mr. Hovey to the Merrick Thread Company for their approval, and if approved, to be taken out in the purchase of thread.

Shortly after this time a son of Hovey, Franklin H. Hovey, went to Holyoke on business, and submitted the proposition of the Shoe Company to the president of the Merrick Thread Company, Mr. Merrick, who promptly declined to accept the stock on behalf of the Corporation, but suggested to Hovey that some stockholder might be induced to take it. Nothing more was said, and the matter was dropped.

In July of the same year, Mr. Franklin S. Hovey, the agent, visited Holyoke, and asked one or two of the stockholders to take this stock, but they all declined.

The Merrick Thread Company, until informed by Hovey, did not know that the Shoe Company was a purchaser of its goods, nor did it know that after it had declined the proposition the agent continued to furnish the Shoe Company with its goods; nor did it know that a certificate of stock had been delivered to its agent. It ships its goods direct to Hovey in large quantities, and does not know who his customers are.

Hovey neglected to notify the Shoe Company of his principal's refusal to take the stock in payment, until November of 1883, when a demand was made by his bookkeeper, on the Shoe Company, for payment of the account. The Shoe Company's agent replied that it had considered the stock accepted, and had credited the purchases on the stock, but promised to refer the matter to the board. The agent, Hovey, made repeated demands for payment, but the stock was not returned by Hovey to the defendant company until May or June of 1884. The goods were furnished continuously by the agent, Hovey, to the defendant, between the dates mentioned above, but the orders were never increased after the defendant's alleged assumption of the acceptance of its stock in payment.

The court refused to affirm plaintiff's seventh point, which was—"Under all the evidence in this case, your verdict must be for the plaintiff," and submitted the case to the jury, on the facts, to say whether the plaintiff's acceptance was to be inferred therefrom.

Verdict and judgment were for the defendant.

The assignment of error specified the refusal of the point quoted.

Messrs. Henry W. Hall and Dwight M. Lowry, for plaintiff in error:

The question is solely whether or not there was sufficient evidence, or rather whether there was any evidence at all, of ratification upon the part of the plaintiff, of the unauthorized acts of the agent, Hovey, subsequent to the refusal of the plaintiff to accept the stock of the defendant in payment for its goods.

The defendant knew that the agent had no authority to receive the stock in payment, without special authority from his principal, and that when the proposition was submitted to the plaintiff it was promptly and unqualifiedly rejected.

The act of the agent, although unauthorized at the time, may become binding upon the principal by ratification and adoption. But to make such ratification effectual it must be shown that there was previous knowledge on the part of the principal of all the material facts and circumstances attending the act to be ratified.

Adams Express Co. v. Trego, 35 Md. 69; Ritch v. Smith, 82 N. Y. 629; Pittsburgh etc. R. R. Co. v. Gazzam, 32 Pa. 340; Rafferty v. Haldron, 81 Pa. 438; Lance v. Deacon, 15 Phila. 318; White v. Langdon, 30 Vt. 599; Stewart v. Woodward, 50 Vt. 78; Wheeler & Wilson Machine Co. v. Givan, 65 Mo. 89.

The ratification of an act of an agent previously unauthorized must, in order to bind the principal, be with full knowledge of all the material facts. If the material facts be either suppressed or unknown, the ratification is treated as invalid, because founded in mistake and fraud.

Owings v. Hull, 9 Pet. 629 (34 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 254).

Where there is no evidence of knowledge of such material facts upon the part of the principal it is error to submit the question of ratification to the jury.

Moore v. Patterson, 28 Pa. 505.

Messrs. B. F. Fisher and Crawford & Dallas, for defendant in error:

The claim of the plaintiff is for the money price of goods sold and delivered by its general agent, with the largest powers arising from possession of the goods, guaranty of the sales, and a knowledge of the customers and their accounts, exclusive of the plaintiff. And it is submitted that the case is not one raising a question of simple ratification, but of a principal, under a sale by such an agent, claiming to recover upon the contract of the agent, and to repudiate the condition on which it was made with him. A party seeking to enforce a contract made by his agent, is bound by his declarations made at the time, although he exceeded his authority. If he would have the benefit of the bargain, he must adopt it as his agent made it.

Keough v. Leslie, 92 Pa. 427, 428.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's demand is admitted. To defeat the action the defendant alleges a contract made with the plaintiff's agent who sold the goods, for sale of twenty-five shares of stock at the par value of $1,250, to be paid by credit of purchases of goods from the plaintiff. Previous to the time of making this contract the defendant had repeatedly purchased goods from the same agent of the plaintiff, always to be paid for in money.

It is not pretended that the agent had authority to buy the stock for his principal. The written proposition of the defendant contemplated an acceptance of the stock by the plaintiff, and the agent's receipt stated that it was to be submitted to the plaintiff, and "If approved to be taken out in the purchase of thread."

There is evidence tending to show that the agent did submit the proposition, as he promised, and that the stock was at once refused. There is no evidence that the plaintiff knew that the agent held the certificate after said refusal, or that any goods had been sold or purchased with an understanding that the price should be applied in payment for the stock. The defendant not only failed to adduce testimony of authority in the agent to sell goods for stock, but very clearly showed its own knowledge that the agent had no such authority. It was proved that Hovey agreed to communicate with the plaintiff, inform the defendant of the result, and if the stock should not be accepted to promptly return the certificate; but it was not proved that the plaintiff had any knowledge of what Hovey had promised the defendant.

The principal is not liable to a third party when such party had knowledge that the agent in the contract acted out of the scope of his authority. But it is unnecessary to refer to this principle, for Hovey did not make a contract for the stock as agent for the plaintiff. Whatever agency existed in Hovey in relation to the stock was created by the defendant, at whose instance Hovey acted and promised, and no promise made to or by the plaintiff was broken.

Nor is there any question of ratification, in absence of proof that the plaintiff had knowledge of the facts; and for like reason there was no implied acceptance of the proposition for sale of the stock. Hovey allowed longer time without payment for the goods, after his negotiation about the stock, than before. Prior sales and payments were through Hovey, and his delay in demanding the money, in itself, does not warrant the inference of an acceptance of the proposition, or of a ratification by the plaintiff.

The principle which controlled in Keough v. Leslie, 92 Pa. 424, cited by defendant, has no application when the declarations made by the agents were neither inducement to the making of the contract, nor part of its conditions.

The plaintiff's seventh point ought to have been affirmed.

Judgment reversed, and venire facias de novo awarded.

(Argued March 3, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 2, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Columbia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action of trespass for cutting timber. Affirmed.

This action was brought by James Bird against Darlington R. Kulp, Curtis G. McWilliams and William C. McConnell doing business as Kulp, McWilliams & Co.

The facts sufficiently appear from the charge of the court given below.

The plaintiff offered in evidence a certified copy of the will of Henry Fisher, deceased, dated September 24, 1816, to show that the land was devised to the mother of James Bird and that from her, title vested in James Bird, the plaintiff; to be followed by proof that her title became vested in the plaintiff.

Objected to by defendants: 1, because by the second section of the will, the tract of land surveyed on warrant to Henry Fisher, given in evidence, was devised in fee unto John Fisher, and Caleb Fisher, without reservation; and if Sarah Bird acquired any right to the ten acres from said land devised by the second section to Caleb and John Fisher, by words expressly conveying the fee, it was only a life estate, as the will was executed and probated before the Act of April 8, 1833; 2, it is irrelevant for the purpose for which it is offered.

By the Court: These objections are overruled; the plaintiff alleges that he can show title in himself; we will have all the evidence out and then we can judge of the title.

Plaintiff offered in evidence the agreement between the plaintiff and his mother, brothers and sisters, for the purchase by him of this ten acres of woodland, to be followed by regular deeds of conveyance, executed and delivered according to law.

Objected to by defendants: 1, because according to the terms of the offer it is merged in the deeds subsequently executed and delivered to the plaintiff; 2, because it is signed by three married women, whose husbands did not join and did not acknowledge it as required by the Act of Assembly; and it is as to them, null and void; 3, because it is irrelevant for the purpose for which offered or for any purpose in this case.

By the Court: We will allow this to be read in evidence; it is void as to third parties.

Defendants, inter alia, presented the following points:

2. The plaintiff having alleged in his declaration that he was seised in his demesne as of fee of and in the ten acres of land described in his declaration filed in this case; and, having claimed triple damages for cutting timber trees upon the same, is bound to show that he was the owner of said land prior to the bringing of this suit; and, having failed to establish such ownership, cannot recover in this suit, and the verdict must be for the defendants.

Ans. I answer, substantially, as I have already charged, that if James Bird acquired an equitable title to an interest in the land on which the alleged trespass was committed, by purchasing from the legal owner, and continued to hold the same by virtue of articles of agreement until a trespass was committed thereon before the commencement of this suit, the allegation of his seisin and title as owner is sufficiently sustained for the purposes of the suit.

3. The plaintiff, having shown by the patent to John Fisher, offered in evidence by him, that the complete title was vested in the said John Fisher on the 15th day of July, 1873, and having failed to show any conveyance of this title to him, or that the same became in any way prior to the bringing of this suit vested in him, cannot recover.

Ans. I refuse to affirm that point. Under the evidence in the cause, John Fisher, having obtained a patent in 1873 of the land granted to Henry Fisher in 1814, the purchase money having been paid by Henry Fisher, and he John being the devisee of Henry Fisher of the amount of land in the contract except the ten acres, was trustee of the portion devised to his sister, Mrs. Bird. The rule of law is that the patent is granted by the Commonwealth to the persons who are entitled and who have paid. Here John Fisher was the devisee, along with his brother Caleb, of a portion of the land; it was therefore proper enough for him to procure a patent and to complete the title which had come down to him as devisee under his father; and therefore he applied to the land office and obtained a patent, which has been read in your hearing, for the whole of it covering the ten acres, an undivided patent. From what transpired in the trial of the cause, we may fairly presume that he claimed the whole of it on the ground that he and Caleb were first named in the will, and that therefore he had a right to it. He having taken a patent for the whole, and the Commonwealth in that patent setting forth that the purchase money had been paid by Henry Fisher at the time of granting the warrant, and that he, John, had derived title from Henry, that was true in part, because he had so derived it and his patent covered the whole.

It is claimed here that the plaintiff, having given this patent in evidence, cannot say that anybody else than John Fisher had the title; but when you take into consideration all the circumstances: that his sister Sarah, his brother Caleb, and he, were devisees under the same will and for portions of the same tract, and the recital that his title had come from Henry Fisher; in the judgment of the court, it does not preclude the defendants (plaintiff) claiming under Mrs. Fisher (Bird) from setting up whatever title she had to the property.

4. The plaintiff having shown that the title to the land vested in John Fisher in 1873, and the uncontradicted testimony being that the said Fisher title vested in defendants, and that they were the owners of the said lands at the time of the alleged trespass, the verdict must be for the defendants.

Ans. I decline to charge as requested in this point. The defendants stand where John Fisher stood; they have the rights of John Fisher, and what John Fisher had the right to do in respect to this property they had the right to do, and no more; they acquired his right, title and interest; and under that they make their defense. We have already said to you that for ten acres, wheresoever they lie, John Fisher was trustee for his sister, who died in 1879. She at that time was living, and he took it as trustee for her; of course when she died, the residue which she had descended to her children, provided she had not bargained it away or contracted to its being bargained away, as already stated.

5. That the plaintiff has shown no such title or possession as entitles him to recover.

Ans. This point is refused in what we have already said; we have explained our views on that subject.

6. If the court decline to affirm the above, then they are respectfully requested to charge the jury that the ten acres of land mentioned in the fifth section of the Henry Fisher will is required to be located at the northeast corner of the Henry Fisher survey, and not taken from the east end of said tract as claimed by the plaintiff, and should be located in the northeast corner, the course of the eastern line of said tract for the distance of twenty-one perches and thence by a line parallel with the northern line of said tract, a sufficient distance to make ten acres.

Ans. I decline to charge as requested in this point, and I submit to the jury the question upon the drafts and the evidence before the court of the location of the line of the ten acres, on the Henry Fisher tract. You know by drafts, what is called for on the east end of the tract and you have seen and will have before you the shape of the Henry Fisher tract, at the east end along the narrow piece of land. It is claimed by the defendants that this division would split the east end which is forty rods wide into two parts, making it forty-one or forty-two; that the division line ought to be in the center so as to be within the meaning of the will as to the northeast corner.

You are to take into consideration all the circumstances, among other things the shape of the tract, whether the meaning of it would be that it should be so as to include nothing but the northeast corner, and so run far enough down to make ten acres, or whether the language of the testator means in effect off the east end of the tract, or whether it is confined to that particular corner; I do not think that this is a matter of law for the court to determine under the evidence; especially, as it is shown before you that the grantee, James Bird, never laid off the ten acres in the way that is now claimed by the defendants, but laid it off many years ago from the east end of the tract, and, so far as appears, claimed that end of the tract down to the present time; and, if the east end of the tract was to be divided so as to make the ten acres lie upon the one side, the one half, whatever the course or location would be, then the proper way is to say that what lies on one side of the middle line, between this and the northeast corner on that side, the plaintiff is entitled to, and to no other portion of the land.

The court charged the jury as follows:

"In 1824 an Act of Assembly was passed, which provides that 'In all cases where any person or persons shall cut down or fell, or employ any person or persons to cut down or fell, any timber tree or trees growing upon the land of another, without the consent of the owner thereof, he or they so offending shall be liable to pay to such owner double the value of such tree or trees so cut down or felled, or, in case of conversion thereof to the use of such offender or offenders, triple the value thereof.'

"The action which we are now trying is brought under that Act of Assembly; the plaintiff, Bird, declares that timber was cut upon his land contrary to the provisions of that Act. Whether the defendants knew that they were trespassing, if they were, is immaterial; the law was unquestionably intended to preserve the timber in the then more sparsely settled portions of the Commonwealth, where it might be somewhat difficult to ascertain who cut the timber; and hence, rather in the nature of a penalty, damage was given beyond the value, for the purpose of preventing the depredations of marauders; so that the Act makes no distinction between those who cut knowingly and those who do not; if they cut upon the land of another and without his consent, it is a trespass for which the owner can recover under this Act of Assembly more or less, according to what the trespasser did upon the ground. If he merely felled the timber, double damages were given; if he felled it and converted it to his own use (which properly means carried it away), he incurred the penalty of triple damages, partly by way of compensation to the owner and partly to prevent trespasses.

"By this same Act, if the trespasser knew that he was cutting timber on the land of another, he might be indicted; but that would make no difference with the right of the owner of the land to recover for the damages which he sustained.

"The plaintiff here, seeking to establish title to the land on which the alleged trespass was committed, produced in evidence a warrant to Henry Fisher for a tract of land described therein, dated on the 8th day of September, 1824. In pursuance of that warrant, the deputy surveyor laid off ninety-three acres and some perches, and returned the survey to the land-office. This of itself did not confer a legal title; that passes from the Commonwealth only when it has given its deed, called a patent; but applying for a warrant for a quantity of land, having that land surveyed and returned to the land office, and paying the purchase money, gives an equitable title, which descends to the heirs of the warrantee.

"Henry Fisher died on the 11th day of September, 1824, having first made his will, the second clause of which gives to Caleb and John, sons of the testator, 'All that certain messuage' etc., describing it, 'with all the appurtenances thereto belonging or in anywise appertaining; to have and to hold to the said Caleb and John Fisher, their heirs and assigns forever, as tenants in common and not as joint tenants'—subject to their making certain payments. That was actually conveying the fee simple to the land therein described.

"In the fifth clause of the will, the testator provides: 'I do give and devise to my daughter Sarah, intermarried with James Bird, and to her heirs and assigns forever, all that certain messuage and tract of land, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, situate in Catawissa Township, Columbia County, containing ninety-two acres and forty-six perches, be the same more or less; also ten acres of woodland, to be taken off the northeast corner of the ninety acre tract which is devised to Caleb and John Fisher, and adjoining the Philip Mettler.' The larger tract is given to the sons and to the widow (daughter) and her heirs as strongly as language could provide, and then follows the clause that raises the question here, 'and also ten acres of woodland to be taken off the northeast corner.'

"It is claimed by counsel for the defendants that the clause giving the whole tract to the two sons in fee is inconsistent with the clause giving a part of the same tract to Sarah, and that the latter has not the same strength, not having the words, 'heirs and assigns forever' following it, and that therefore there was but a life estate in Sarah, the daughter; that the two clauses are, upon any other interpretation, irreconcilable, or that there is no way by which this will can be construed so as to make both these clauses consistent and operative.

"It is the duty of courts, in construing wills, to carry out if possible the intention of the testator; and that intention is to be gathered from the whole will and from all its parts, and if necessary, there may be a transposition of words in order to accomplish that matter, the carrying out of the intention of the testator; but where it is found, after proper endeavor, impossible to reconcile two clauses of a will, then the rule applies that a latter clause prevails over a former clause, just as the last will and testament must prevail over previous wills.

["Where the latter part of a will varies from the former part, so that both cannot stand together, then the latter, as being the last thought the testator had upon the subject, controls. I therefore instruct you that the ten acres off the northeast corner was by the will of her father given to Sarah; when he died in 1824 the ten acres became hers absolutely, in fee. I come to this conclusion from the phraseology of the will, which, after giving the ninety acres, then says: 'Also the ten acres,' mentioning where it lies. The word 'also,' as there used, means, 'in like manner,' 'I give her the ten acres as I have given her the ninety acres;' that is the meaning of the word 'also,' as I construe it, the same estate in the ten acres as was given in the ninety acres. The ninety acres were given to her and her heirs and assigns forever.]

"[Matters remained in that way down to 1837, when an article of agreement was entered into, purporting to be signed by the heirs of James Bird, the husband of Sarah Fisher, who had died in September, the exact date, I think, is not in evidence; the parties to this agreement called themselves his heirs; they were not his heirs as to this land; they were his heirs as sons and daughters, and therefore his heirs of whatever interest he had in this land; but he had no interest in this land, because the fact that he was the husband of Sarah, which made him tenant by the curtesy, gave him only a life estate; and when he died nothing descended from him to his heirs.]

"[That article of agreement is signed by three sons, I think, and three daughters of Mrs. Sarah Bird; we allowed it to be read in evidence, because there were upon it the names of parties who were competent to enter into such a contract; but these three married women could not dispose of their land except in the way pointed out by law, namely: by a writing executed jointly with the husband, and separately acknowledged by the wife, examined apart by the magistrate; that was not done in this case; therefore their signatures to the paper are absolutely void, and it passed no title whatever to James Bird.

"A contract signed at that time by the brothers alone would have bound them, and would have conveyed an equitable right, if they at that time had any title to the land; but their mother was living and they were not heirs of their mother while she lived. But Sarah Bird, who owned the land, signed that paper along with the others; her name, I believe, is not in the body of the instrument; but she signed it along with them, knowing that the land was to be sold to James Bird for the consideration mentioned in the deed. By assenting to the sale to be made by her daughters and her sons to her son James Bird, she acquiesced in the transfer; and although her children at that time had no title in the land whatever, she had; and if she agreed that they might make sale for valuable consideration, she had the right to do so, and, doing so, bound herself; and if she was bound, when she died her heirs were bound by her act in her lifetime; so that by her assent and acquiescence and joining in the contract, by which this land was conveyed to James Bird, he acquired an equitable title to it, such a title as any man acquires when he enters into a contract for the purchase of land for the consideration named; and when, from the terms employed, it is fair to conclude that he has the right of possession, he sustains any loss that accrues to the property bought.

"If one should purchase a dwelling house by contract with the former owner; and if before deed made, and before the purchaser paid, the house should burn down, it is the loss of the vendee and not of the vendor. So in the purchase of timber land; if one has acquired an equitable title and bound himself to pay, and a trespass is committed upon the land, he is the owner to such an extent as to entitle him to maintain trespass under the Act of 1824;. he sustains the loss, and ought to have the remedy which the law gives to redress the wrong committed upon him. Mere possession would not of itself entitle a claimant to recover against a trespasser under this statute; one having the possession or (and) the immediate right of possession can maintain trespass for any injury he has sustained. Cutting down timber is an injury to the inheritance, and he who has the equitable title may maintain trespass.]

"Counsel for the defendants request us to charge:

"If the cutting of timber trees was upon the ten acres at the east end of the tract, and if that was the land devised, then of course you will have to ascertain how much timber was cut upon that portion; if, on the other hand, it is divided so as to split the tract in two, then you have the difficult task of ascertaining how much timber was cut on the one side and how much on the other. If you say the trees in question were cut on the ten acres, taking them off the east end, you will go through the evidence to see how many trees or how much timber was taken from that quarter; if you come to the conclusion that the tract should be divived so as to make the ten acres in the northeast corner, then you will have to ascertain, as best you can, the value of the trees cut off that. But where a party seeking to recover damages fails in his evidence to show the amount of the injury that was done him, the jury have no right to guess at how much it would be.

"Much has been said in the course of this trial in regard to the possession of this land. It is unseated land, uncultivated land. The only possession that has been had, so far as the evidence goes to show, is the occasional (not every year) taking some timber for wood, or ties, or something else, in the course of a long period of time, off this tract. There is no evidence that either party has gained title by the Statute of Limitations, by peaceable, notorious, hostile possession, uninterrupted for the period of twenty-one years.

"The occasional coming for fire wood does not give title by possession, however long continued, at intervals, these trespasses may be; but if the person has an equitable title, and if the land has been taxed to him and he has for a long period of years paid the taxes, or those under whom he claims have for a long period of time paid all the taxes assessed against him, this payment of taxes, in connection with the equitable title, is worthy of some consideration on account of his right to the land and his possession of the property. While the title to the land of another cannot be gained by simply paying taxes upon it, yet, if there is payment of taxes, and the claimant exercises acts of ownership over the land, the fact of the payment of taxes may be taken into consideration in deciding the question of his possession.

"Something also has been said about the sale for the taxes of 1874 and 1875. The evidence shows an assessment of taxes during these years and a sale in 1876 to John Fisher, and it is claimed that that sale covered this land. In order to make a valid sale of unseated lands, there must be a valid assessment made by competent authority, and the taxes must have remained unpaid for one whole year before the sale. If the taxes were paid by the claimant of the land, a sale for taxes would not be valid, because the taxes were paid; a sale of the land where the taxes are paid is simply void, carries no title.

"Did James Bird pay the taxes for the years 1874 and 1875, the sale for which was made in 1876? He testifies that his father paid the taxes before; and that he, although he took no receipt, paid taxes for these later years, for years before and some afterwards, and all the time down to 1886; that being the case, the tax sale in 1876 was invalid and passed no title to John Fisher. The case stands then upon the title that he held before that time. I believe these are all the questions raised relating to the title.

"You turn your attention to the question whether the defendants either cut, or procured to be cut, timber upon this land. They claim to be the owners of the property through their purchase from John Fisher. It seems that they employed a man by the name of Shields to cut timber on that tract; and evidence has been given here (which you will call to mind) as to what these defendants did do in reference to cutting that timber. If they employed Shields to cut the timber, and knew and understood that he was cutting this timber on these ten acres, and if they employed men to haul off the timber that was cut, the cutting would be for their benefit and assented to by them; it would make them trespassers. If they employed Shields to cut the timber on a particular portion of the land, as a contractor, and restricted him to their land, and he cut over upon somebody else's, they would not be responsible; but, if they acquiesced in his act, drew off the lumber, they would be responsible for the acts of one who was their agent in that respect. If you find that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, the next question is the amount. You will have, I presume, from the counsel, a statement of the number and size of the trees alleged to have been cut and the quantity of lumber in them and the number of ties taken; it will be impossible for you to remember all these items without some such memorandum.

"The price of timber land is not the sole test of the value of the timber upon it, although it is worthy of your consideration. The value of the trees, where they stood when they were cut down, as standing trees, is the question, not as trees felled and the bark peeled off and carried away and sold; the law gives the value of the trees as trees, not as manufactured lumber or anything else, but as trees as they stood there on that ground. In ascertaining that, the character and quality of the timber, the size of the trees, the amount of lumber that was in them, what trees of that size and location would sell for, may be considered.

"If you believe the testimony on the part of the defendants, there is nothing in their acts or conduct that goes to show that they intended anything more than pursuing what they believed to be their rights; but I have already instructed you that this matters not, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, whether they acted sincerely or otherwise. It is not a case for vindictive damages; you have no right to go beyond the value of these trees, no matter what the conduct of these defendants was. In estimating the damages, you should be just to both parties, ascertaining the value of the timber cut.

"If you find for the defendants, the verdict should be, generally, 'For the defendants.' If you find that a portion of the property was cut down and was left on the ground, not converted, you will give double damages for that portion; but for what was converted, if any, triple damages; designating how much you find of double damages, and how much of triple damages; this may be difficult for you to ascertain, but you have to take the case where the parties leave it. As I understand it, at the time of bringing this suit, a good deal of timber beyond a certain size still lay upon the ground where it was cut, and has been taken away by these defendants since suit brought and within the last year. The plaintiff is restricted to damages sustained up to the time of bringing this suit in October, 1882, and cannot recover for anything this side of that; the rights of the parties are to be determined as of that date: whatever has been taken away since suit brought is not a subject for damages here; for the timber that lay there on the ground the plaintiff could have maintained trover, provided he has a right to this land. You may find, in looking at the testimony, that the witnesses upon the one side or upon the other put the damages beyond any reasonble amount, beyond anything that you ever heard of in the way of damages for timber cutting; or you may find them too low in their estimates; the facts are for you; and between the evidence that is given on the one side and the other you must endeavor to get at such a medium as will do justice between these parties, giving due consideration to all the evidence in the case. You have no right to compute any interest."

The jury returned the following verdict:

"We find a verdict for the plaintiff for $625.10.
447 oak at 70cts., $312.90 single damage.
223 chestnut at $1.40 $312.20 double damage.
———
$625.10."

Counsel for plaintiff moved the court to double the $312.90, single damage for oak; and increase the $312.20, double damage for chestnut to such an amount as would be treble the amount of single damage.

By the Court. "The declaration alleges the cutting of timber by the defendants on lands of the plaintiff and converting them to their use. The timber shown on the trial to have been cut was oak and chestnut, all that was cut was not converted by the defendants. * * *

"If the first words (of the verdict) are to be taken as the whole verdict, this motion ought not to prevail. It is manifest, however, that the jury did not so intend. Whether the verdict is strictly according to the evidence on the trial is not now the question, as neither party has asked for a new trial. It must now be construed by itself. And in order that it be rightly understood, or rather in order that it may be construed so as to be consistent with itself, the several parts must be considered with the whole.

"When a jury in such a case say that the damage which they find is double damage, the court has no right to double the amount so found. In this case the item, 223 chestnut, $1.40, $312.20, double damage, means just what it says, that the value and aggregate as put down are found to be double damage. Suppose the jury in any case under the statute should say in their verdict that they find for the plaintiff a named sum treble damages; it would be error for the court to enter judgment for treble the amount so found.

"The verdict declares that the damages have been already trebled by the jury. The same reasoning applies with equal force when the verdict finds a sum said by them to be double damage. If the jury intend in such a case that the amount shall be doubled by the court, that intention must be indicated in some other manner than by finding that the double damage is so much. When a sum is found by the jury as 'single damage,' they already show that they have neither doubled nor trebled the amount of damage which they have found for the plaintiff, leaving the increase for the action of the court, as shall be in acccordance with the law.

"Thus construed, this verdict is consistent with itself throughout, and means just this: We find for the plaintiff a verdict of $625.10, made up in this $312.90, damages subject to increase by the court and $312.20, damages which we find to be double the actual damages; total, $625.10, subject as aforesaid. Whether the jury so intended is to be gathered from their written verdict, and not from what the court might have found as fact under the evidence.

"In view of the fact that some of the oak cut was shown to have been converted by the defendants and some was not, we concluded that the counsel for the plaintiff, in view of the difficulty of ascertaining the proportions of each, have moved the court to double damages found for the oak. The motion to that extent we are of opinion ought to be granted, but as to chestnut I am of opinion that the amount of damages fixed by the jury cannot be either doubled or trebled by the court.

"Double damages for the oak, $625.80.
Damages for the chestnut as found by the jury, 312.20.
Interest from date of verdict. ———
$938.00."

The assignments of error specified the admission of evidence as above noted, the answers to defendants' points, the portion of the charge inclosed in brackets, and the action of the court in increasing the amount of the verdict rendered by the jury.

Per Curiam :

We have given to this case a thorough examination, and have carefully considered all the specifications of error; yet we are not able to find any error in the record. We do not discover that the learned judge, in his able and clear charge, stated either the law or the facts incorrectly. The rulings relating to the admission of evidence are free from error. The record shows affirmatively that the jury gave single damages only for the oak; this gave a clear right to the court to double those damages. Clark v. Sargeant, 2 Cent. Rep. 352, 112 Pa. 16.

(Argued Feb. 22, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 36, E. D., before Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Certiorari to the Common Pleas of Wayne County, to review a decree designating a curtilage subject to mechanics' lien under the Act of June 16, 1836. Affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion of the court below.

The following exceptions to the report of the commissioners were filed by judgment creditors of W. H. Dimmick, the owner of the premises:

I. The report and draft accompanying the same is imperfect, defective and insufficient for the information of the court, in not indicating the situation or location, upon said tract of land, of the three story building, known as the Irving Cliff Hotel building, mentioned in the petition, and in not setting forth that said building is situate upon the tract of land designated in the report as "necessary for the convenient use of said hotel building."

II. The report and draft accompanying the same is imperfect, defective and insufficient for the information of the court, in not mentioning or describing any of the improvements upon said tract of land.

III. The report and draft forming part thereof is imperfect, defective and insufficient for the information of the court, in not indicating the location of the following described buildings, situated upon said tract, and in not setting forth that said buildings are situated thereupon, viz.: 1, a two story frame dwelling house, sixteen by twenty-four feet, with two story wing, fourteen by sixteen feet, and a one and a half story wing, fourteen by eighteen feet; 2, a two story frame barn, twenty-six by thirty-six feet; 3, a one and a half story frame dwelling house, twenty by thirty feet.

The first mentioned house is situated about twenty-five feet from the road indicated in said draft as the "public road to Honesdale;" said barn, about fifty feet west of said house, and the last mentioned house about 200 feet from said road; said buildings, in fact, being all situate upon said land, about one quarter of a mile from the hotel building aforesaid, having no connection therewith, and not being at all necessary for the ordinary and useful purposes thereof; and none of the labor and material, for which the claims of the petitioners are filed, having been done, used or furnished in or about their erection and construction, or upon the credit thereof.

IV. The building mentioned and described in the third exception were erected many years before said hotel building was thought of, are remote from and in no way connected with it, are not necessary for its convenient use; the labor and materials for which the claims of petitioners are filed were not furnished upon the credit of said buildings, and they cannot by law be subjected to mechanics' liens for such labor and materials.

V. The amount of land set apart in said report, viz.: twenty-three acres and 62 perches, is an unreasonable quantity and excessive amount to subject to mechanics' liens. Such tract is not properly curtilage appurtenant, nor is it necessary for the convenient use of the said hotel building, for the ordinary and useful purposes thereof.

VI. The report includes a lot of land situate a considerable distance from the hotel building aforesaid, upon which is erected a pavilion, or dance platform, constructed of lumber furnished upon the credit of Wm. H. Dimmick, after the Irving Cliff Hotel Company had purchased the land, and after the said Irving Cliff Hotel Company had distinctly notified the person so furnishing the same, that he must look to Wm. H. Dimmick for his pay therefor; the said dance platform being altogether a distinct building, not having been intended to be used in connection with said hotel, and not being necessary for the convenient use thereof. Gross injustice would therefore be done judgment creditors, were such structure and lot now made liable for the debt incurred in the erection of said hotel building.

VII. The report, if confirmed, would work great and irreparable loss and damage upon these exceptants, who advanced many thousand dollars to aid in completing the building, at a time when the foundation alone had been erected, and before the mechanics' liens had attached. If such report is confirmed, great injustice will be done exceptants.

VIII. Exception is filed to the statement in the said report in which the commissioners return "That having been duly sworn, they went upon the premises, examined the building and the land carefully, all of us," as false and misleading.

IX. Improper conduct upon the part of all of the said commissioners; they having come to Honesdale in response to personal letters sent them by attorneys for mechanics' lien creditors, and having almost immediately upon their arrival, gone upon said premises, at the suggestion and instance of one of said attorneys, in his private conveyance, and accompanied by him alone; the said commissioners examining the premises and building aforesaid with said attorney, and without any other person being present, the circumstance of their so going upon the said premises being at the time wholly unknown to said exceptants, and no notice of their intention of so doing being given them, although the interests of exceptants are in every respect largely adverse to the interests represented by the attorney, who, as aforesaid, took said commissioners upon said premises.

X Great unfairness and partiality shown and manifested by said commissioners; they having immediately upon their return from their visit to said premises, with the said attorney, notified the parties in interest, resident in Honesdale, to appear before them at the Allen House about two hours thereafter, and at said hearing, unjustly and improperly refusing to hear the evidence of any witnesses whatever, and also refusing to go upon the premises a second time, in order that such of the creditors as were dissatisfied with the circumstances connected with their previous visit thereto, might go with the said commissioners and ascertain what land had been pointed out to them, and also present their views.

XI. Improper conduct upon the part of all of said commissioners, in making up said report hastily, imperfectly, unjustly and without any apparent consideration or wish in the matter except to fulfill the wishes and demands of the mechanics' lien creditors; in not affording all the parties in interest an opportunity to be heard, and in making up the report wholly in the interest and according to the expressed wishes of the attorney who, as aforesaid, was alone with them in their first and only examination of the premises.

Upon dismissing these exceptions and confirming the report, the court below filed the following opinion:

"In August, 1884, the Honorable William H. Dimmick purchased a lot containing about twenty-three acres of land and commenced the erection of a large building, to be occupied as a summer hotel. Subsequently the Irving Cliff Hotel Company was organized and the lot of twenty-three acres was conveyed by Mr. Dimmick to this hotel company. The curtilage to be covered by mechanics' lien and material men was not defined by the owner, but mechanics' liens for considerable amounts have been filed. The record shows also a judgment for purchase money given by Mr. Dimmick, which, with accumulated interest, amounts to between $1,600 and $1,700; and other judgments also were entered against Mr. Dimmick before his conveyance to the hotel company and after the erection of the building was commenced, amounting to about $8,000, which was shown to be for money borrowed, to be used in the erection of this building.

"In January last the mechanics' lien creditors presented a petition to the court asking for the appointment of commissioners to define the boundaries of this curtilage. Three commissioners were appointed, all of whom declined to serve. Three others were then, on the first of February, appointed, men whom the court believed to be fair and impartial and of good judgment. After considerable delay, by reason of the illness of one of the commissioners, and sickness in the family of another, and the severe weather of February, they reported, defining the boundaries of a curtilage containing 4¼ acres, giving no access from the hotel to any public road, but creating an easement on the twenty-three acres, for the gas, water and sewer pipes, already laid, and subjecting this whole twenty-three acres to the right of the hotel property, to lay any further or additional gas, sewer or water pipes, proper or convenient for the use of said building. It would seem from this report that the commissioners were unable to designate any portion of the twenty-three acres which might be liberated from subserviency to this hotel building.

"This report was set aside because of the indefinite easement created. Another commission was then appointed. The commissioners were selected with very great care, in order to avoid all suspicion of prejudice against or favor toward one side or the other. Three men, living distant from each other, each man of very high standing in the community where he lived, were elected by the court because of its belief in their integrity, good judgment and special fitness to pass upon the questions to be presented them. These three commissioners, after notice of their appointment, came together to the president judge for instruction. The Acts of Assembly bearing upon the subject were read and explained to them, and the purpose of this legislation was explained to them. They were informed that the lien of mechanics was primarily against the building into which their labor entered, and only against land because without land the lien against the building would be worthless; that judgment creditors had rights which must not be disregarded; that they were so to define the curtilage as to make the mechanics' lien effective, by embracing in it so much land as in their judgment was necessary for the ordinary and useful purposes of the building, but that they should not diminish the security of the judgment creditors by taking for the benefit of the mechanics' lien creditors any more land than was necessary for the enjoyment of the building for a summer hotel. The matter was discussed until the commissioners seemed fully to understand their duty. They reported, including the whole twenty-three acres in the curtilage.

"Exceptions to this report were filed and evidence taken, upon which we are asked to set it aside. We have examined this evidence carefully. It must be said of it that, taken alone, its weight is against the report of the commissioners and against the proposition that this whole twenty-three acres is necessary for the purposes of the hotel; but we do not think it is sufficient to overcome the judgment of three such men as the commissioners who have gone upon the premises for the express purpose of ascertaining how much land is necessary for use with this hotel building; especially when the last report of the commissioners is so strongly supported by the report of the former commissioners, who found that the entire lot must be made subservient to the hotel property. Both sets of commissioners examined the premises with this question directly in view. The witnesses who have testified have made no such examination, and while personally, with our indefinite knowledge of the premises, we are somewhat surprised at the report, it may be that more particular information would lead to the same conclusion reached by the commissioners. The law was too carefully explained to the commissioners to permit belief that they have misunderstood their duty.

"At the request of counsel for the mechanics' lien and judgment creditors and with the consent of all counsel, we have directed that a draft of the premises, showing the location of the buildings and their distances from each other, should be attached to and made a part of the commissioners' report.

"We know of no Act of Assembly, or order of court or practice, which requires that commissioners, to define boundaries of a curtilage, should note improvements. The draft now annexed to the report shows substantially what the exceptants desire, excepting the description of the buildings; and the first three exceptions are dismissed.

"That some buildings, erected years ago, stood upon the lands did not prevent the commissioners from embracing these lands within the bounds of the curtilage, if such lands were necessary for the enjoyment of the hotel building. The existence of such buildings, their location, size, comparative value, etc., were all matters for the consideration of the commissioners. The fourth and sixth exceptions are dismissed.

"The fifth exception involves directly the question, which by this Act of Assembly we were required to submit to the commissioners, and the exception is dismissed.

"The seventh is not properly an exception to any matter in the report, but only presents the fact that interests of judgment creditors are affected by the report.

"The eighth exception is dismissed. We do not recall any evidence to sustain it, but whether the fact be that the commissioners were sworn before or after viewing the premises, it is immaterial.

"The evidence does not, in our judgment, sustain the charge of misconduct against the commissioners, nor of partiality or unfairness, and the ninth and tenth exceptions are dismissed.

"And here, to prevent misconstruction, we desire to say that when the president judge called Mr. Waller into his chambers (as testified to by Mr. Waller), the commissioners, or one of them, had already informed him that Mr. Waller proposed to take or send them up to the hotel with his team, that they might view the premises, and Mr. Waller was called into the room by the judge for the purpose of suggesting to him and to the commissioners the prudence and propriety of taking with Mr. Waller some person who represented the adverse interests. Mr. Dimmick's name was suggested, if Mr. Waller intended going himself with the commissioners. This suggestion seemed to meet the approval of Mr. Waller and the commissioners, and they agreed to, and the evidence shows they did, invite Mr. Dimmick to go with them. It does not appear that any improper influence was brought to bear upon them, and they should not be convicted of misconduct.

"For the past three months these mechanics' lien creditors have been endeavoring to obtain a definition of boundaries of the curtilage appurtenant to the hotel building, so that they may have process for the collection of their claims. If this report should be set aside, their remedy is postponed past the summer; and so far as we can now see, the property must lie idle for another year. Such a delay would work great wrong to all parties in interest, and forbids that we should refuse our approval of this report, without clearer evidence against it than is presented, and the report is approved."

The judgment creditors thereupon took this writ, and assigned as error the action of the court below in setting aside the first report and confirming the second report.

Mr. Edward O. Hamlin, for plaintiffs in error:

This proceeding, so far as it affected the rights of the creditors who received no notice, is in violation of the principle that forbids an adjudication without giving an opportunity of being heard.

The Act of Assembly, it is true, does not in terms require that notice be given the parties interested. Neither, however, does the road law require such notice; yet it is well settled that notice must be given to land owners before any valid assessment of damages can be made by road viewers.

The general principle is uniformly recognized, that notice and opportunity to be heard are due to all whose rights are to be affected, in any proceeding, whether such notice be specifically provided for by statute, or not.

The principles that govern the subjection of a building already completed to a lien for the erection of other buildings, on the same lot or piece of land, have been settled by a variety of decisions.

When the land and the several structures erected upon it are intended for a united enjoyment, and are not capable of separation without injury.

Lauman's App. 8 Pa. 477.

When the new structure, detached from that already existing, would be comparatively valueless.

Parrish's App. 83 Pa. 111.

When the new structure is an accession to that already existing, largely increasing its productiveness and value.

Id. 125.

The present case is an attempt upon the part of mechanics' lien creditors to subject buildings already existing to a lien for the construction of a new building, in total disregard of these principles.

An entire tract of land cannot be subjected to a lien for the construction of a building in no way necessary to the use and enjoyment of the greater portion of the tract, only a small part of which is required for the purposes of the building, particularly when such a lien will operate to exclude judgment creditors from recourse to any part of the tract. Under the Mechanics' Lien Law of 1806 it was held that a farm or plantation (the extent of which does not appear) cannot be subjected to a mechanics' lien, for the erection of a barn, to the exclusion of judgment creditors.

Werth v. Werth, 2 Rawle, 151.

The Act of 1806 did not designate the quantity of land subjected to the lien, or even provide that the land covered by the building should be subject to it. The Act of 1836 provides that "The lien shall extend to the ground covered by the building, and to so much other ground immediately adjacent thereto, and belonging in like manner to the owner of such building, as may be necessary for the ordinary and useful purposes of such building."

"The legislative intention in passing laws to secure a lien to mechanics and material men, on the buildings erected, must not by construction be carried beyond the design of the enactment, and extended to other buildings, on which no labor was bestowed, and for erecting which no commodities were furnished. The ground upon which the building stands must from necessity be held within the grasp of the lien, else it could afford no security; and to the immediate site is added the necessary curtilage, to be determined either before or after the sale. This curtilage embraces no more land than is requisite for the enjoyment of the building, taking into consideration the object of its erection; and in no event can it include other buildings on which no labor was bestowed or materials furnished, unless they are connected with and indispensable to the enjoyment of the main construction."

Miller v. Lenhart, 1 Pearson, 95.

Wismer's Estate, decided in the Common Pleas of Bucks County, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 387, presents but a limited analogy to the present case, and goes beyond all limits heretofore recognized, as to the extent of the lien.

Messrs. E. C. Mumford and George S. Purdy, for defendants in error:

The commissioners alone were competent to judge what was necessary to the convenient use of the building for the purpose for which it was designed. The formation and character of the land, the approaches, the location of the spring, of the water and gas pipes, as well as the sewer pipes, would necessarily enter into their consideration. By a careful examination of the grounds, with all of these things before them, they formed their opinion and made their report. The court says it does not find any evidence of misconduct or partiality on the part of the commissioners.

Per Curiam:

This case coming before us as it does, on a certiorari, we can examine nothing but the record, and our inspection of that fails to reveal any irregularity. That the court had the power to set aside the report of the commissioners first appointed cannot be doubted; and as we have nothing by which to test the rectitude or wisdom of that act, we must decline to sustain the first assignment of error.

To the confirmation of the report of the second commission several exceptions have been taken. One is that there was no notice given to those interested of the time of the view. But this was not necessary. The Act requires notice of the appointment of the commissioners, which, as the record shows, was properly given; but it requires no other notice. Another complaint is that the curtilage designated by the commissioners is larger than necessary for the use of the building; but as this was a matter resting in the discretion of the commissioners and the court, we cannot review their action. So whether the mechanics' lien is made to embrace more than the Act of Assembly warrants is a matter not now before us.

Decree affirmed.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 92, E.D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Delaware County, to review a judgment for the plaintiffs in a feigned issue in estrepement. Affirmed.

At the trial before CLAYTON, P. J., the following facts appeared:

In February, 1881, Benjamin F. Folsom, the defendant below, was the owner of a sugar house in the City of Chester. The house was fitted up with machinery, piping, vessels, etc., adapted to the manufacture of sugar from corn meal. William L. Cook, one of the plaintiffs below, applied to Mr. Folsom at that time for a lease of the sugar house, saying that his firm wanted it for the purpose of manufacturing sugar from starch; that they expected they would not go into the business very largely, but that they would want the whole house, and that the business would be somewhat experimental. Mr. Folsom proposed to rent them the house, with certain wharf privileges and some appurtenant ground, for an annual rental of $4,000. To this Mr. Cook objected, and upon stating that they expected to manufacture about 200 barrels per week, Mr. Folsom proposed to lease the house for $3,000 per annum, with a proportionately increased rent, regulated by the excess of product over 200 barrels per week, and certain other conditions.

The house was delivered to them as tenants, and the task of having the contract reduced to writing was assigned to Mr. Folsom. Some conversation was had at this interview, about the outlay which would be required to put the house in running condition. The parties differed as to the exact character of this conversation—Mr. Folsom alleging that he told Mr. Cook that the former lessee had represented to him that it would not require more than $300 for this purpose, but that personally he knew nothing about it; Mr. Cook on the other hand asserting that Mr. Folsom made this representation as of his own knowledge. The tenants had had no experience in the manufacture of sugar, and were led into the experiment by Mr. Marr, who had a secret in the process, and the mill was to be adapted by him, for his process—the Messrs. Cook furnishing the money for the purpose. It cost more money than the tenants had anticipated, and they began to complain about the outlay, and to put the blame on Mr. Folsom. They had Mr. Marr make the following written statement of the terms of the lease:

"Statement of William Marr. Dated March 29, 1881. Mem. The following are the terms and conditions upon which Mr. Folsom agreed to rent the Chester refinery:

"The rent was to commence on the first day of March, 1881, and to be paid monthly, and the tenancy was to be for one year from the first day of March, 1881. The rent was to be $3,000 for the year, and upon the basis that the quantity of goods to be manufactured would be 200 barrels per week: and for any excess in quantity over and above 200 barrels per week, for any one month a proportionate increase of rent was to be paid for said month. That the tenant was to have the use of the whole of the sugar house building, with the boilers, machinery, pumps, fixtures, materials, in fact all there was about the place relating to a sugar house or glucose factory, with the right to rearrange any portion or articles to suit his business with the proviso that any removals that might be made should be reinstated if desired by the landlord. The tenant was also to have the use of the ground around the buildings, with the use in common of the landing wharf; but not the use of covered inclosed sheds used for bonded stores.

"As a ground for the foregoing terms and conditions representations were made by the agent of the landlord, and confirmed by the landlord, that at the time of the former parties ceasing operations the boilers, machinery and other appliances were in good working order, and that proper care had been taken of them, and they were then in good working order and required only cleaning up and a small outlay, amounting to about $300, to set the whole again in operation."

After some efforts on the part of Mr. Folsom to have Mr. W. L. Cook join him in having a written lease prepared, Mr. Cook came to his office shortly before the 26th of April, and (influenced no doubt by the fact that preparations had been made for more extensive operations than had been at first contemplated) he proposed to Mr. Folsom to make the annual rental $4,000 instead of $3,000, leaving out any pro rata increase, and that on account of the great expense incurred and to be incurred in the adaption of the house for their purpose, the rent should commence on May 1, instead of March 1. This proposition was accepted by Mr. Folsom; and on the 27th of April Mr. Folsom had the lease reduced to writing. The part of it which was the subject of this controversy is, "out of the first quarter's rent the said lessees shall be allowed to retain the sum of $666.67, in consideration of the repairs, additions, alterations and improvements they have made or may make to the said building and machinery; and these repairs, additions, alterations and improvements shall remain, at the expiration of this lease, as the property of the said lessor; but should the lessor give to the said lessees ten (10) days' notice before the termination of this lease of his desire to have the machinery, fixtures, pipes, etc., restored to the position they occupied at the beginning of this lease, then the said lessees shall make such restoration at their own proper cost and expense. At any event, however, whether restored to their position or not, all these additions, repairs and improvements shall be the property of the lessor, without any liability on his part to account to the lessees therefor."

This document was placed in the hands of Mr. W. L. Cook on April 27 by Mr. Folsom, at the Girard House in Philadelphia, for the purpose of having it executed by the tenants. It was taken by Mr. Cook to Baltimore; and on May 7, he wrote the following letter to Mr. Folsom:

"My arrangement when I last saw you was for me to see my brother on my return to Balto. Saturday, as he was to come up Monday, and send it back with him. He took a notion to come Saturday instead, and we passed each other on the road, and I have been intending to come over each day since, but the first of week was too busy, and latter part been very unwell. I intend coming over Tuesday or Wednesday next, and if you can meet me at Chester then, telegraph me to that effect; if not, then please wire me when you can. However there is now no issue between us, and when rent is due you can get check for amt."

The lease was never signed.

The tenants paid the rent for two quarters, maturing on August 1 and November 1, at the rate of $4,000 per annum, and in the latter part of December commenced to remove the additions to the machinery which they had put in, when they were estopped by a writ of estrepement issued by the landlord; and an issue was framed in this case to try the right of the parties to the property which the tenants claimed the right to remove.

As to this letter Mr. Cook testified:

Q. What does this refer to? "If you can meet me at Chester, telegraph me to that effect —however there is now no issue between us and you will receive your rent when it is due."

A. It only refers to the difficulties we had had over the excess above the amount which he said would place the machinery in running order.

Mr. Cook also testified that he wrote, and mailed, properly addressed to Mr. Folsom, another letter "telling him that he surely did not mean that he should take all our machinery."

The court charged, inter alia, as follows:

Where the right is claimed by one party, which the law would otherwise vest in another, the evidence ought to be enough to satisfy the jury that the right really exists, and that the contract was made. If, therefore, you conclude from all the evidence that at the time of this letting, or afterward, the plaintiffs (the tenants are the plaintiffs), agree that the new machinery, which they brought upon the premises, should belong to the landlord, at his option, then your verdict should be for the defendant—that is, the landlord. [If, however, from all the evidence, you come to the conclusion that they did not agree, but that their agreement was that all the repairs and additions and improvements to the old machinery only should be and remain the property of the landlord, if you find that that is all the plaintiffs agreed to, then they have the right to remove the new machinery, and in that event your verdict should be for the tenants, the plaintiffs. * * * First assignment of error.

One of the tenants says that after he read over the lease the second time, giving the reason for not signing the lease that there was something ambiguous in it and that did not convey the meaning he had intended, he thought he did write a letter to that effect. Now whether the letter was received or not, if he wrote it and mailed it, it is evidence in the case; it does not bind the landlord, but it is evidence to relieve the tenant of the presumption that would otherwise arise, that he assented to the lease as it was written out. Therefore, whether that letter was received or not, if he mailed it, it is evidence and proper evidence for the jury, even though the defendant never received such a letter. Second assignment of error.

Now, this letter of May 7, you will notice is a very important piece of testimony, because it seems to intimate that the parties met and had some further talk; it winds up with the expression, or at least with the intimation, that it was not material whether the lease was signed or not, as he says all matters at issue are now settled. Listen again:

"My arrangements were, when I last saw you, for me to see my brother on my return to Baltimore, Saturday, as he was to come up Monday, and send it back with him; he took a notion to come up Saturday, instead, and we passed on the road."

You will remember that this is in answer to a letter from Mr. Folsom, wanting to know why the lease had not been signed and returned. And again: "I have been intending to come over every day since;" he had nothing to do but sign the lease and send it back; "but the first of the week I was too busy, and the latter part I have been too unwell; I intend coming either on Tuesday or Wednesday next; if you can meet me, telegraph to that effect, and if not, please wire me when you can."

I do not remember any evidence that he was telegraphed to, and I do not remember that the parties met; then comes the closing clause: "However, there is now no issue between us, and when the rent comes due you can get a check for the whole amount." What did he mean? That he had read over the lease and found that it was all right, or that he did not want to sign the lease until he saw Mr. Folsom; or that there was really no issue between them now, as it had been settled before in the trouble over the extra expense he had undergone? Third assignment of error.

If you find that the lease does not express what the parties meant, but that it contains something that the parties did not agree to, then you will say whether this paper (Marr's memorandum) is a correct memorandum of their contract. This is, therefore, a very important paper for the tenants; it is almost as strong testimony for their side of the case as the lease is for the side of the landlord. Fourth assignment of error.

The defendant submitted, inter alia, the following point:

"2. If the jury believes that the written lease is the terms upon which the property was demised, the verdict should be for the landlord."

Ans. This point I will answer after I have received your special verdict. Fifth assignment of error.

General verdict for the plaintiffs and judgment thereon.

Messrs. W. B. Broomall and Richard C. McMurtrie, for plaintiff in error:

The court ought to have construed the written lease to the jury. It is the right of every suitor to have the opinion of the court on the construction of written contracts.

Denison v. Wertz, 7 Serg. & R. 371; Reaney v. Culbertson, 21 Pa. 507; Miller v. Fichthorn, 31 Pa. 252; Heath v. Page, 48 Pa. 130; Gass App. 73 Pa. 39; Bryant v. Hagerty, 87 Pa. 256; Nellis v. Coleman, 98 Pa. 465; Pegg v. Rist, 15 W. N. C. 70.

It makes no difference that the writing is not directly the matter in controversy.

Foster v. Berg, 14 W. N. C. 215.

A suitor cannot give evidence of the contents of a letter mailed to his opponent, without first having given him notice to produce it.

Eilbert v. Finkbeiner, 68 Pa. 243.

If it be answered that Mr. Folsom denied on trial the receipt of such a letter, then clearly it is evidence of nothing. How can a tenant, after giving his acceptance of a lease, and after receiving the advantage of it, by the abatement of two months' rent under it, and paying the rent at the times prescribed in the writing, be permitted to introduce evidence of an uncommunicated objection to it, entertained after the acceptance of it?

There is no presumption of law that a letter mailed to one at the place he usually receives his letters was received by him.

First Nat. Bank v. McManigle, 69 Pa. 156.

Messrs. George H. Earle, Jr., O. B. Dickinson, and Richard P. White, for defendants in error:

It is the duty of the court to interpret a contract, and of the jury to determine whether it is established by proof.

Stokes v. Burrell, 3 Grant, 241.

In any event, as the finding of the jury made the construction of the paper immaterial, any error in this respect is no cause for reversal.

Bunce v. Stanford, 27 Pa. 265.

Parol proof of the contents of the letter of the plaintiffs, properly mailed to the defendant, was evidence, because there was no objection to the admission of it.

M'Cullough v. Wallace, 8 Serg. & R. 181; Weckerly v. Geyer, 11 Serg. & R. 35; Powell v. Sedgwick, 5 Whart. 336.

And also because no notice to produce was necessary, as the defendant denied ever having had such a paper.

The rule as to notice to produce is that it must be given to a party who is in possession of the paper; and its admitted purpose is to enable such party, so having the paper, to produce it at the trial; so that the very terms of the rule, were there no authorities, show that it cannot apply to a party who absolutely denies having ever had the paper, as, in such cases, the notice could serve no possible purpose.

Reading R. R. Co. v. Johnson, 7 Watts & S. 317; 1 Whart. Ev. § 161.

Mailing the letter raised a presumption of the receipt of the letter which made its admission perfectly proper.

Pearce v. Langfit, 101 Pa. 507; 2 Whart. Ev. §§ 1323, 1324.

The question whether it was conclusive evidence, or a presumption of law, or not, has nothing to do with this case.

The depositing in the postoffice, of a letter properly addressed, with the postage prepaid, is prima facie evidence that the person to whom it was addressed received it. The fact that the defendants had no additional proof that the letters were actually received is immaterial.

Briggs v. Hervey, 130 Mass. 186.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

After the parties had made an oral agreement, the landlord prepared a writing and sent it to the tenants for their signatures. This writing, referred to in the testimony as the lease, was not signed by the parties and it is not evidence of their agreement unless it is established that they assented to its terms. The landlord claims that it sets forth the contract, but the tenants deny that they so agreed. It was submitted to the jury whether the "lease" expresses the contract, and if so they were instructed to find for the plaintiffs and annex a list of the property which could be lawfully removed; subject to the opinion of the court whether the contract set out in said paper gave the landlord the right to remove new machinery.

The defendant's second point was reserved. Had the lease therein mentioned been signed by the parties, it would have been competent for the court to reserve the question of construction. It was equally the right of the court to make the reservation when it was the province of the jury to determine whether the unsigned instrument set out the terms of the lease. Had the jury found that it did, then its construction would have been for the court. But the verdict put the alleged written lease out of the case, and the fifth assignment is not sustained.

As the cause was submitted, the jury found that the memorandum made by Marr is not a correct statement of the contract. That memorandum was made near the time of the making of an oral agreement testified to by the witness called by the defendant. It contains no note of obligation to leave new machinery on the premises. Although not established as evidencing the contract, the paper was important as effecting the testimony of the witness, Marr. The portion of the charge complained of in the fourth assignment is part of the instructions relative to the testimony of Marr, and we think it is not erroneous.

The plaintiff in error cites numerous authorities in support of the proposition that the construction of a written contract is exclusively the province of the court; and when a party requests the court to construe a writing in evidence, it is the duty of the court to do so and not submit it to the jury for construction. That is denied by nobody. But when the making of such contract is in dispute it is in the province of the jury to say whether it is established.

The jury failed to find that the contract is set out in either the unsigned lease or memorandum; but they did find that the tenants were entitled to recover certain machinery which they had furnished for use in their business. They were instructed as to the right of the tenants to remove the fixtures furnished by them, in case there was no agreement that they should become the property of the landlord, and that if the tenants agreed that the new machinery put on the premises should belong to the landlord, the verdict should be for defendant. Of all that the court said upon this subject there is no complaint, except the following sentence:

"If, however, from all the evidence you come to the conclusion that they did not agree, but that their agreement was that all the repairs and additions and improvements to the old machinery only should be and remain the property of the landlord, if you find that that is all the plaintiffs agreed to, then they have the right to remove the new machinery, and in that event your verdict should be for the tenants, the plaintiffs."

That is taken from the body of the charge. The first clause obviously relates to an alleged agreement mentioned in the sentence immediately preceding. With the context, the sentence complained of is free of error. By itself it might seem inconsistent, if not confusing, to say that if the parties did not agree, and did make an agreement; but read in connection with what preceded the meaning is plain. The first assignment of error is not well taken.

Without objection or exception one of the tenants testified that after he received the "lease" he sent a letter by mail to Folsom, properly addressed, "telling him that he surely did not mean that he should take all our machinery." It is not alleged that the court erred in admitting the testimony; but it is contended that the instruction (that whether the landlord received the letter or not, the sending of it by the tenant was evidence to repel the presumption that would otherwise arise that he assented to the lease as written) is error. The depositing of a letter properly addressed, with the postage prepaid, in the postoffice, is prima facie evidence that the person to whom it was addressed received it. Evidence that a letter was so sent, demanding payment of rent, is competent to rebut the allegation that no demand had been made. Briggs v. Hervey, 130 Mass. 186.

The second assignment cannot be sustained.

Nor is there error in the instructions set out in the third assignment. Cook's letter, dated May 7, 1881, was an acceptance of the lease, if Folsom was not mistaken in his testimony. If Cook testified the truth, that letter was not intended as an acceptance, for the parties had not agreed on the terms as written in the lease; and the clause stating that there was no issue between them, referred to the condition of the fixtures and the cost of their repairs. The references and meaning of the letter could only be determined by the aid of other testimony, and the whole was properly submitted.

Judgment affirmed.

JULY Term, 1886, Nos. 182, 183, 184, E. D. (in Common Pleas, No. 153, January Term, 1885, Nos. 162, 163, September Term, 1885), before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lehigh County, to review judgments on verdicts for defendants in three actions to recover insurance assessments. Affirmed in first action. Reversed in others.

Three cases brought by the Susquehanna Mutual Fire Insurance Company against Charles W. Gackenbach and George Seislove, partners, to recover the amount of three assessments for losses incurred during the time certain policies issued to the defendants were in force.

At the trial before ALBRIGHT, J., the following facts appeared:

On March 17, 1879, the defendants, Gackenbach & Seislove, made application for a policy of insurance in the company plaintiff for $2,000 for five years, on a stock of carriages and sleighs, finished and unfinished, and material contained in a frame carriage factory situate in the City of Allentown, the policy to be issued subject to the conditions contained in the application and the constitution and by-laws of the Company. The policy was issued March 19, 1879, for five years, but on October 4 was by agreement surrendered to the Company and canceled.

By the terms and conditions of the application and policy and the constitution and by-laws of the Company the insured became liable to assessments for losses incurred by the Company during the period of time their policy was in force.

During this period the Company sustained a large amount of losses, for a part of which they made four assessments, Nos. 9, 10, 11 and 12, to recover which this suit was brought. All of these assessments were made after the date of the surrender and cancellation of defendants' policy, but all policies liable to assessment and in force at the time the respective losses were incurred were included in the assessment, irrespective of whether the holders thereof were solvent or insolvent.

As soon as these assessments were made notice thereof was sent to the defendants, in accordance with the provisions of the by-laws of the Company, and payment demanded, and on the defendants' refusing to pay, these suits were brought.

The three cases were tried together. Before trial the defendants filed affidavits under the provisions of section 56 of the Act of May 1, 1876.

The provision of the charter of plaintiff corporation, material to this action, appears from the opinion.

The court answered plaintiff's first and second points, which are set forth in the opinion as follows:

"The Company is required to prove its claim, that is, that there were losses and expenses, and that it levied upon the members liable for said losses and expenses. In fixing the amount to be raised by an assessment the directors may exercise a reasonable discretion; proper allowances may be made for expense of collection and for losses, because of the insolvency of some of those liable. If the allowances are reasonable in amount and consistent with good faith on the part of the directors, they will not vitiate the assessment. As affidavits by the defendants, under Act of 1876, have been filed, there is no presumption that the assessments are valid and not excessive. The burden is not on defendants, as stated in the second point. The points are answered in the negative."

Plaintiff further presented the following:

3. There is no evidence in these cases from which the jury could find that the assessments for which these suits are brought are excessive. Ans. Negatived.

4. Under all the evidence in the case the verdict of the jury must be for the plaintiff, for assessments Nos. 9, 10, 11 and 12. Ans. Negatived.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

One of the cases, marked No. 158, January Term, 1885, is not supported by any evidence. The plaintiff does not claim in that case, and therefore in that case your verdict will be recorded in favor of the defendants.

An Act of Assembly passed in 1876 provides that a certificate of a mutual insurance company, setting forth that an assessment was made, and how much the share of each party assessed is, shall be received as evidence in court to prove the claim in the first instance, unless the party sued will make a certain affidavit alleging certain things. In that event, the company must prove its claim as other claimants do.

In the cases you are trying, the defendants made the affidavits provided for in the Act of 1876, and therefore the Company must prove its claim; and we decided that the Company must prove that there were losses for which the Company was liable and must then show that an assessment was made, and that the defendants' share of the losses thus sought to be provided for in the assessment, was their just share.

The main question in this case is as to whether the corporation plaintiff has shown you that the assessments were valid; that they were made for losses that occurred while the defendants were insured, and were not made for more than was necessary; and as to each one of these four assessments you will make inquiry, and if the plaintiff has not proved that the assessments were necessary and reasonable, under the limitations which I will explain to you presently, you will say that it has failed as to that assessment, and your verdict must be in favor of the defendants.

Taking all and any one of these assessments, is it shown that there were such losses occurring during the time the defendants' policy was in force, and was it necessary to levy a margin for expenses of collecting and insolvency of some of those liable, and if so, were these assessments for too large a sum? If it appears they were not, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover. If any one of them is invalid, because of excessiveness, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover as to it.

I believe these are all the instructions it is necessary for me to give you. The plaintiff must prove its case, and must show that there were losses which had to be provided for, and that there were losses for which the defendants, along with others were liable; that the assessments were justly made, and fell ratably upon all who were liable to bear them, and that they were not excessive, making a reasonable allowance for a margin, as has been explained; that the assessment was not for more than was necessary. If the plaintiff has proved that as to one or all of these assessments it is entitled to recover.

Verdict and judgment were for defendants.

The assignments of error specified the answers of the court to plaintiff's points, and the portions of the charge given above.

Messrs. John Rupp, Thomas B. Metzger and G. W. Van Fossen, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff is a Mutual Insurance Company, organized under the laws of this Commonwealth. When the defendants made application for and obtained a policy of insurance in the company plaintiff, they became members of the Company and liable, by the terms of their contract, to assessments for the payment of all losses and debts incurred by the Company during the time their policy was in force, but not for any losses or liabilities incurred either before they obtained their policy or after its expiration or cancellation.

Peoples Fire Ins. Co. v. Hartshorne, 90 Pa. 465; Akers v. Hite, 94 Pa. 394; Wilson v. Trumbull Mutual Fire Ins. Co. 19 Pa. 372.

The directors are vested with the power to make assessments to pay the losses and expenses incurred by the Company. In making these assessments they may exercise a reasonable discretion in fixing the amount to be raised, having in view the losses and the practical workings of the Company; and they may make allowances for expenses likely to be incurred in the collection of the assessments, and losses likely to be sustained in consequence of the insolvency of some of the members.

Rosenberger v. Washington Mut. Fire Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 207; Jones v. Sisson, 6 Gray, 288.

Assessments so made by the board of directors are presumed to be fairly and properly made; and they are binding upon all the members of the Company, unless they can show fraud or gross mistake.

Hummel's App. 78 Pa. 320; Buckley v. Columbia Ins. Co. 92 Pa. 501; Rosenberger v. Washington Mut. Fire Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 207.

But it is contended, on behalf of the defendants, that section 56* of the Act of May 1, 1876, P. L. 1876, Purd. Dig. p. 918, pl. 73, changes this rule of law; and that the filing of the affidavit, by the defendants, provided for therein, overthows this presumption in favor of the regularity of the assessments.

It is evident that the Act was intended for the benefit of mutual insurance companies. Recognizing the fact that all the insured are members of such corporations, and that the officers thereof are the agents and representatives of the insured, it was intended to facilitate and not to hinder and obstruct the collection of such assessments. The Act must, therefore, be so construed as to give effect to this evident intention and object of the Legislature.

The last clause of the section, providing that if the defendant files the affidavit provided for, then the certificate shall cease to be evidence of anything whatever, and the company shall then be compelled to prove its claim as other claimants do, obviously means that when the affidavit is filed the company must prove its claim, the same as if the Act had never been passed. The affidavit prevents the company from proving its claim by the secondary evidence furnished by the certificate, and compels it to prove its claim as other claimants do, by primary, instead of secondary, evidence. That is its only effect.

* "The certificate of any mutual fire insurance company now in existence, or hereafter incorporated, signed by the president and attested by the secretary of such company, with the seal affixed, setting forth that an assessment has been made upon the premium note, or notes of any member, and the amount due by such member, upon such note or notes, shall be prima facie evidence thereof in all the courts of this Commonwealth. But in all cases now pending, or hereafter instituted, in any of the courts of this Commonwealth against any member of any such company, in which such member has or may hereafter, within the time prescribed by law, file an affidavit setting forth that he, she or they, has or have, already paid his, her or their proportion of the loss for which the assessment was levied, or that the assessment is for more money than is necessary to pay the losses and necessary expenses of said company, or that his, her or their signature or signatures, was or were obtained by the practice of fraud or false, or fraudulent representations, such certificate shall cease to be evidence of anything whatever, and said company shall be compelled to prove its claims as other claimants do," etc.

The tenth assignment of error should also be sustained. Case No. 158, January Term, 1885, was brought to recover the amount due on assessment No. 9, the only one due when that suit was brought. Certainly we did claim to recover the amount due on that assessment in that suit. It needs no argument to show that the court erred in directing the jury to render a verdict for the defendants in that case.

Messrs. Henninger & Dewalt, D. D. Roper and Edward Harvey, for defendants in error:

It is not true, as the plaintiff contends and alleges, that its case is prima facie upon proof of the passage of a resolution, by the board of directors, levying an assessment. The proof of the plaintiff must go farther.

May, Ins. 2d ed. § 557; Pacific Mut. Ins. Co. v. Guse, 49 Mo. 329; American Ins. Co. v. Schmidt, 19 Iowa, 502; Atlantic Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Fitzpatrick, 2 Gray, 279; Bliss, Life Ins. 2d ed. § 428; Thomas v. Whallon, 31 Barb. 172; Buckley v. Columbia Ins. Co. 92 Pa. 501; Rosenberger v. Washington Fire Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 207; Hummel's App. 78 Pa. 320.

Conceding, for the purposes of this argument, that there was error in answering the points of the plaintiff, it does not follow that the judgment must be reversed. If, upon another trial, the verdict must, as matter of law, be the same, the judgment will not be reversed. No injustice having been done, and the plaintiff not being entitled to recover upon its own showing, it would be useless to subject the parties to the expense of further litigation.

It was admitted and not disputed that all of the assessments in suit were not laid as provided for in this by-law. Instead of assessing all the policies in force when the assessment was laid, the Company assessed only those that were in force when the loss occurred.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

When the charter of a mutual insurance company provides that in an action for the recovery of the assessment, the certificate of the secretary of the company shall be prima facie evidence of the assessment and the amount due, the burden is on the defendant to show that the assessment is invalid for fraud or gross mistake. Buckley v. Columbia Ins. Co. 83 Pa. 288; 92 Pa. 501.

In the absence of such provision in the charter, or in the statute relating to such companies, the company is bound to prove the facts establishing the claim. The burden was on the plaintiff to show liabilities which made an assessment necessary, and that it was made according to the terms of the charter and by-laws. A reasonable amount may be included in the assessment for expenses and for losses likely to occur by reason of insolvency of members of the Company. If the plaintiff proves its claim without showing so large an excess in the assessment as in itself satisfies the jury of fraud or gross mistake, it is entitled to recover unless the defendant adduces evidence of matter which defeats the action.

There is no presumption that the officers committed fraud or gross mistake; the presumption is that they acted honestly and with reasonable skill. The burden of showing fraud or misconduct is on the defendant, when he relies upon that as a defense. Rosenberger v. Washington Fire Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 207.

The affidavit filed by the defendants precluded the use by the plaintiff of the certificate as evidence; and the plaintiff was bound to prove its claim as if the statutory provision relative to the certificate had not been enacted. The learned judge of the common pleas charged that the assessment had been shown to be legal and that the plaintiff "must prove that there were losses for which the Company was liable, and must then show that an assessment was made, and that the defendants' share of the losses thus sought to be provided for in the assessment was their just share."

The plaintiff's first and second points were in accord with that instruction, and they ought to have been affirmed. They are as follows:

"First. The board of directors of a mutual insurance company, in making assessments, may exercise a reasonable discretion in fixing the amount to be raised, and an assessment so made is presumed not to be excessive until the contrary is shown."

"Second. The burden is upon the defendants in these cases, to show that the assessments for which these suits are brought are so excessive as to be in themselves evidence of fraud or gross negligence."

If it was the misfortune of the plaintiff, in the attempt to establish its claim, to put in evidence a fact which would defeat recovery, that does not change the law of evidence. The defendants may avail themselves of that fact, or evidence tending to show it; but whatever the evidence relied on to establish fraud, or other matter affirmed to defeat the claim, the burden is on the defendants. The presumption that the officers, whose duty it was to make the assessment, acted with due care and fidelity stands until overcome by sufficient proof. The rule is the same where the defendant relies on the testimony on part of the plaintiff as when upon his own.

None of the remaining assignments of error, except the tenth, need be remarked; for there is no error in the instructions therein complained of, save that resulting from the refusal of the plaintiff's first and second points.

The tenth assignment is to the ruling of the court, that the action No. 158 was not supported by any evidence.

One of the by-laws provides "That all members, whose policies are in force at the time the assessment may be declared, shall be liable to assessment for all losses adjusted properly and unpaid, and all other liabilities then existing against the Company shall be subject to abatement as hereinafter specified. All members whose policies have expired, and are not in force at the time such assessment is declared, shall, nevertheless, be liable to assessment for all unpaid losses and other liabilities which existed at the time of the expiration of such policy or policies pro rata with those then in force; and the amount thus ascertained and levied upon such policies is to be deducted from the gross amount of liabilities of the Company for which such assessment is to be made, and the balance of liabilities remaining to be assessed upon the policies then in force."

This by-law is part of the contract of insurance and plainly designates what members are liable to be assessed for losses at the time the assessment may be declared. All are liable whose policies are in force; and all are liable whose policies have expired for unpaid losses which existed at the time of the expiration.

It is competent for the members to so contract, and the directors have no right to make an assessment on another basis. Decisions in cases where the contract contained no similar provision do not apply. Were this by-law not in the contract, the authorities cited by the plaintiff would sustain the contention that members are liable "to assessments for the payment of all losses and debts incurred by the Company during the time their policy was in force, but not for any losses or liabilities incurred either before they obtained their policy or after its expiration or cancellation."

The plaintiff concedes that the policies in force at the time the assessment was declared, which were not in force at the time the losses and liabilities were incurred, were not included in the assessments. Its secretary, called to prove the claim, testified that there were a large number of such policies, and that they were not included. It follows that assessment "No. 9" was invalid, and that the court rightly ruled that the plaintiff could not recover.

The ruling may have been based on other ground; yet, being free of error, it must be affirmed. In effect, the jury were instructed that the plaintiff had failed to adduce evidence to establish its claim. That the court erred in refusing the plaintiff's first and second points, as propositions, did the plaintiff no injury, for the court could properly have ordered a nonsuit, or could have directed a verdict for the defendant, without answering any proposition.

In two of the cases no assignment of error raises the question whether the plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to submit to the jury. The defendants urge that if it be conceded that the court erred in answering the plaintiff's points, it does not follow that the judgment should be reversed. But no precedent is cited for going outside the assignments which must be sustained, for a cause to ground a refusal of reversal. Where an assignment reveals a fatal defect in the case of the plaintiff in error, he shows cause for affirmance of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed, No. 153, January Term, 1885. In each of the other causes, judgment reversed and venire facias de novo awarded.

Jacob D. HEFT'S APPEAL.
ESTATE OF John F. JACKSON.

1. Possession, on the part of a mortgagee of personal property, capable of actual, corporeal occupation, is essential to the validity of his lien as against other creditors.
2. The death of the debtor gives to general creditors the right to deny the validity of such a mortgage when possession has not been taken in the debtor's lifetime.
3. By the death of the debtor his personal estate in possession passes into the custody of the law for administration; and the mortgagee has no right to undertake to administer any part of it for the satisfaction of his own debt.
4. But where the mortgagee in good faith intervenes, and in administration of the estate sells the pledge and settles an account of the proceeds, he is entitled to commissions, although he must pay interest for the proceeds in the meantime appropriated and used in his business, in the belief that they belong to himself.

(Argued Jan. 14, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 194, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia County, in the estate of John F. Jackson, deceased. Affirmed with modifications.

The facts as they appeared at the audit of the first account of Jacob D. Heft, administrator of John F. Jackson, deceased, before ASHMAN, J., were as follows:

The decedent died May 16, 1882, intestate, and letters of administration on his estate were granted to the accountant May 23, 1882. His estate was insolvent.

At the audit the following claims were presented:

E. K. Lemont & Son, on note and bank accounts, with interest to date of death, $533; Delp & Groff, on book account, with interest to date of death, $164.59.

These creditors claimed to come in on an equal footing as creditors of the estate with the accountant, who was also a creditor, and to whose claim of $2,525, with interest, the proceeds of the sale of the personal estate of the decedent, amounting to $2,530, had been appropriated by the accountant.

The decedent on September 7, 1879, borrowed from the claimant $2,000 and with the money purchased the stock and fixtures of a livery stable. Upon the day of the purchase he executed and delivered to the claimant, on collateral security, a bill of sale of the articles purchased. Decedent went into the possession of the premises and carried on business there in his own name until his death. The claimant afterwards loaned him the further sum of $525, for which the decedent gave his promissory note. The latter was still unpaid at the time of his death. On the day the decedent died, the claimant entered upon the premises by virtue of the bill of sale; and after continuing the business as his own for several months, he sold out for $2,530. The actual receipts of the business during his charge over the expenditures for conducting it showed a gain of $37.07.

The auditing judge, in his adjudication, said:

"The accountant, as creditor, certainly had the right at any time during the life of the debtor to take possession of the property which was the subject of the bill of sale; and the right would not seem to have been taken away by the death of the latter: if the instrument had been a mortgage, which is a conditional sale, and had provided for the delivery of the property within a given time, it would have bound even creditors if possession had been taken under it before process by creditors had been taken out. Boyle v. Rankin, 22 Pa. 171.

"The accountant insists that he is not to be charged with their value as assets of the decedent's estate, but sets up a title in himself. The auditing judge is of opinion that this title would prevail as against volunteers; and that the accountant might retain the goods or their proceeds in an amount sufficient to satisfy his debts, when the contending parties are legatees or next of kin. But he is entitled to no preference over other creditors. He permitted the decedent to act as owner and to obtain credit upon the faith of an ostensible ownership. He will therefore be charged with the proceeds of sale, and will prorate with the claimants in the fund for distribution. See Boynton v. Isaacs, 10 W. N. C. 190; Martin v. Mathiot, 14 Serg. & R. 214; Crawford v. Davis, 99 Pa. 576.

"The accountant showed that certain book debts which remained open on the books of the decedent were uncollectible, and that efforts had been made to secure their payment. The demand to surcharge him with their amount and to disallow his commission as administrator is refused.

"The account, vouchers having been produced for its credits, exhibited a balance due by the estate to the accountant of $75.93.

"Against which must be surcharged commissions improperly claimed on $2,530, which sum was charged in the debits, but were retained by accountant in payment of his own claim, and was not carried into the totals."

Exceptions to the adjudication were filed by the accountant because it surcharged the accountant with the sum realized from the property pledged to him by the decedent for his debt, viz.: $2,530, and because it disallowed commissions upon the sum of $2,530, although charging the accountant with said sum.

Upon dismissing the exceptions and confirming the account, PENROSE, J., delivered the following opinion:

It is conceded that the bill of sale under which the accountant claims was given to secure moneys loaned by him to the decedent; his rights, therefore, were simply those of a mortgagee, the form of the transaction being immaterial. Spering's App. 60 Pa. 199.

That possession on the part of a mortgagee is essential to the validity of his lien as against other creditors where the subject of the mortgage is personal property capable of actual, corporeal occupation, is too well established to require the citation of authority; and that the death of the debtor gives to general creditors the right to deny the validity of such a mortgage when possession has not been taken in his lifetime, was expressly decided in Kater v. Steinruck, 40 Pa. 501.

"By the death of the mortgagor," it was there said, "his personal estate in possession passed into the custody of the law for administration, and the mortgagee had no right to undertake to administer any part of it for the satisfaction of his own debt. Even if there is enough to satisfy all the creditors, he cannot decide the question, but must leave it to the decision of the orphans' court. If there is not enough, his mortgage without possession became void as to creditors by the death of his debtor, for then the law took hold of the estate for the benefit of all. If there is enough, he cannot suffer much by waiting the due course of administration."

In that case an action of trover by the administrator against the mortgagee was sustained, and it was held that the debt intended to be secured by the mortgage could not be set off. The fact that the default, which, under the terms of the mortgage, first gave the right to take possession, did not occur until after the mortgagor's death, is not material. The point decided was that unless the lien is complete at the death of the debtor, priority cannot be claimed over other general creditors. See also Merchants Bank v. Shouse, 102 Pa. 488.

It is true that in Collins' Appeal, 107 Pa. 590, it was held (Clark, J., dissenting) that the principle did not apply in favor of a decedent's general creditors in the case of a pledge of an intangible interest, incapable of delivery or manual occupancy, or of an expectancy to come into existence after the contract of pledge is made, and when the personal effort of the pledgeor is necessary, both to its subsequent existence and its actual maintenance. But this was not because the creditors of the decedent had only the rights of the general creditors of a living debtor, but simply because of the character of the pledge.

The same principle was held, therefore, to apply as against execution creditors, in Wallace's Appeal, 104 Pa. 559.

"The general rule," it was said in that case, "that possession of the thing pledged must be taken by the pledgee, to make the pledge valid against the creditors of the pledgeor, was recognized in Collins' Appeal, and the pledge of an interest in expectancy, or of an intangible interest, under certain circumstances, was considered an exception."

"Whether," it was added, "in Pennsylvania there can be any other exception need not now be determined." Certainly the present case furnishes no ground for another exception, and nothing short of the complete overthrow of the general principle itself can sustain the claim of priority on the part of this mortgagee.

There is nothing in the doctrine of McClintock's Appeal, 29 Pa. 360, or of Yorks' Appeal, 1 Cent. Rep. 354, 659, which, as we understand those cases, affects the question. Yorks' Appeal simply decides that creditors of a decedent do not become the equitable owners of the personal estate of their debtor so as to prevent the plea of the Statute of Limitations as against their debts; and there is no suggestion that while the debt continues the personal estate is not held, in the regular course of administration, subject to the duty of the administrator to see to its payment. To this extent the administrator is a trustee for the general creditors, although his obligation to them ceases, of course, when the debt is paid or when it has lost, by operation of law, the right of enforcement. The Act of Assembly declares that after payment of certain preferred debts all others shall come in on a footing of equality. Nothing less than a lien perfected during the life of the debtor can give a right of priority as between general creditors.

The auditing judge has found, and the account shows, that immediately after selling the property covered by his bill of sale the accountant appropriated the proceeds for the payment of his own debt. In so doing he was acting in hostility to the rights of other creditors; and, so far as this portion of the estate was concerned, it was entirely proper to disallow his commissions as against such creditors. Greenfield's Est. 24 Pa. 232.

The proceeds of sale, $2,530, were all received in or prior to October, 1882; and the account, which was not filed until March, 1886, contains no debit of interest. It is now asked, although the claim was not made before the auditing judge, that the accountant be surcharged with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. Had the money been deposited during the period preceding the filing of the account, with the other funds of the estate, the mere omission to invest or make it productive might, perhaps, have been excused, or a lower rate than 6 per cent adopted; but as it was applied to the payment of a debt to himself, and the accountant has thus had the use of it ever since, it is clear that he is chargeable with interest at the legal rate. The adjudication will be amended by adding to the balance for distribution interest upon the above sum from October —, 1882; and with this modification the exceptions are dismissed.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in dismissing the exceptions to the adjudication, and in decreeing (in its opinion dismissing the exceptions) that interest should be added to the balance for distribution, such balance, under the opinion, including the entire proceeds of the pledged property.

Messrs. Joseph deF. Junkin and George Junkin, for appellant:

It is respectfully submitted that the lien in this present case was complete at the time of the death of the debtor, and that the essential and controlling distinction of fact and principle between the case of Kater v. Steinruck, 40 Pa. 501, and the present one, arises from the condition that in the former case default had not taken place, and the right of possession was not perfect; whereas, in the present one default was not necessary, the pledgee's title was perfect, and he had the absolute right of possession, the pledgeor having the custody of the property only as trustee for him, and not in any sense being in legal possession of the same.

See also Collins' App. 107 Pa. 590.

The disallowance of commissions to the accountant, and the surcharging him with interest upon the proceeds of the sale of the pledged property were by way of punishment.

Unless he has done something intentionally in fraud of the estate, or by which the estate was made to suffer, he certainly was entitled to his commissions, whether or not he received as pledgee the proceeds of the pledged property. It was not as if he had administered first and had then taken the proceeds of the pledged property and misappropriated them to his own use; but, on the contrary, after he had possession as pledgee, he voluntarily administers on the estate, and voluntarily brings before the court the entire proceeds of all of the property which was in the custody of the decedent at his death. An examination of the long account filed by him shows the greatest possible care taken by him to bring before the court, for a just and legal distribution, every penny that could possibly be charged against him, arising out of this transaction.

It seems to us that in place of this being bad faith and in disregard of duty, it was an instance of the exercise of the highest good faith, both to the court and to the creditors of the estate.

In like manner, the charging him with the full rate of interest upon proceeds of this property was very severe and not warranted by the facts of the case. If he is to be deprived of what he supposed to belong to him, and which he took in good faith, without any intention of defrauding this estate, his loss is severe enough; and having voluntarily brought the fund into court for disposition, it is respectfully submitted that a reasonable allowance on the interest should be made to him, if the decision of the court below is to be sustained.

Mr. Lewin W. Barringer, for appellees:

Where moneys have been used by the accountant, commissions will not be allowed, even if the employment may have inured to the benefit of the estate.

Wayland's Est. 17 W. N. C. 376; Seguin's App. 103 Pa. 143; Robinett's App. 36 Pa. 174; Norris' App. 71 Pa. 126.

He is chargeable with interest as compensation for such use.

Norris' App. 71 Pa. 123; Walthour v. Walthour, 2 Grant, 102; Copely's App. 82 Pa. 143.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The opinion of the learned judge of the orphans' court clearly shows that the property assigned to Heft, as security for a debt, remaining in possession of the assignor, upon his death passed into custody of the law for administration. For the reasons there given the decree, except as to commissions, must be affirmed.

Letters of administration were granted to the appellant in a week after the decedent's death. That he prudently disposed of the property is unquestioned. Nor is there anything to show that he did not believe he had a right, by virtue of the assignment, to appropriate the proceeds of the assigned property to payment of the debt which the parties to the instrument intended to secure. He was mistaken, and is liable for interest. The fund for distribution is as large as it would have been had he not claimed that the part derived from sale of the assigned property should apply on his debt. Creditors have lost nothing by his mistake.

Under the circumstances, we think he should be allowed the usual compensation for his services.

Decree affirmed, with modification that the appellant be allowed the commissions claimed in the account; costs of appeal to be paid by administrator out of money of estate.

v.
Morris BERGER.

1. In an action of trespass to recover for taking personal property, held, that whether or not the sale to the plaintiff was fraudulent and void as to the defendant as a creditor of the seller was a question for the jury to determine from all the facts in the case, and that the court rightly refused to take the question from the jury.
2. Held, further, that the plaintiff had the right to give in evidence all the facts regarding his alleged purchase, in order to show that it was bona fide and for full value, notwithstanding that question had once been determined in a prior suit to which the plaintiff was not a party.

(Argued Jan. 21, Decided March 21, 1887).

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 264, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Northampton County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action of trespass to recover the value of certain property and for damages for the detention of property. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear from the charge of the court to the jury, given below.

The case has been twice tried. A verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff in the first trial was reversed on appeal to this court and a new trial granted for error in the rulings of the court.

See 4 Cent. Rep. 764, in which the facts are fully stated.

On the second trial before SCHUYLER, P. J., the plaintiff, Berger, offered to prove by Edward Shafer the whole transaction between witness and himself in substance, the same as on the examination at the former trial. Objected to as incompetent. Objection overruled. Exception.

Plaintiff presented, inter alia, the following points:

2. A debtor may lawfully prefer one creditor to another, and if the jury believe that Mr. Shafer sold out his undertaking establishment to Berger for the purpose of preferring his wife and other creditors, even to the exclusion of Mr. Jacoby, the sale was not fraudulent for that reason.

Ans. This is true.

3. And even if Mr. Berger knew that the purpose of Shafer in selling out was to prefer some creditors to others, the sale is not void for that reason.

Ans. This is true.

4. If the jury believe that the proceeds of the sale from Shafer to Berger were paid to bona fide creditors of Shafer, then Jacoby was not defrauded; for one creditor cannot be defrauded by the payment of another, although all the property of the debtor is exhausted by such payment.

Ans. This is true, provided you find that the sale was made upon full and valid consideration.

5. If the jury believe that Shafer was honestly indebted to his wife, he had the right to direct her to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of his property in preference to Jacoby or any other creditor.

Ans. This is true.

6. If Berger purchased the property in dispute in good faith and for a full consideration from Mr. Shafer, it was the duty of Shafer to protect and defend Berger's title in the attachment suit before Justice Baum, and no fraud can be inferred from such defense.

Ans. This is true.

Defendants, inter alia, presented the following points:

3. In determining whether the evidence shows that Berger actively participated in the fraudulent purposes of Shafer, the jury should first consider whether the fraudulent purpose of Shafer was made known to Berger, at or before the alleged sale; and second, if they were so made known, whether he assisted Shafer in carrying them out. And if they can find that Berger took a transfer of all of Shafer's property, knowing that Jacoby had a claim against Shafer, which he was pressing for payment, and that Shafer left Jacoby out of the list of creditors which were to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, that Shafer intended to prevent Jacoby getting his claim paid by suit, and that Berger, through Cope, then paid and settled with all the creditors except Jacoby, they are justified in finding that the fraud was the joint work of Berger and Shafer, and their verdict should be in favor of the defendant.

Ans. I cannot affirm this point. Whether or not the sale was fraudulent is to be determined from all the facts and circumstances in the case.

6. Under the facts in this case there was not sufficient delivery of the property as against creditors; and the court should declare the sale void, and direct a verdict in favor of the defendants.

Ans. I cannot affirm this point.

The court is requested to declare the transaction a legal fraud, because the judgment note for $1,200, dated December 4, 1883, given by Berger to Shafer, payable in five years from date, assigned to Mrs. Shafer and not recorded, contains a clause, which enabled Shafer to prevent the payment of two thirds of the purchase money for the undertaking establishment, by going into the same business again, any time within five years, and to defeat the validity of the bill of sale, dated the same day, to the extent of two thirds thereof. This was, in effect, creating a secret trust in favor of Shafer, which stamps the transaction as a fraud in law, and vitiates the pretended sale, as against creditors.

Ans. I cannot affirm this point. The clause referred to is a circumstance to be taken into consideration with the other facts and circumstances in the cause as to whether the sale from Shafer to Berger was a bona fide sale, or otherwise.

The court charged the jury as follows:

This is an action of trespass brought by Morris Berger against Wilson D. Snyder and Cyrus Jacoby to recover damages for seizing and selling one horse, and for seizing and detaining another horse and truck wagon as the property of Edward Shafer, and which the plaintiff alleges belonged to him.

It appears that the said Edward Shafer was the owner of an undertaker's establishment which consisted of horses, wagons and undertaker's materials and the like, and that, being largely in debt, he sold the same to the plaintiff on December 4, 1883. The property in controversy was a part of this undertaking establishment.

The plaintiff alleges that this sale was a fair bona fide sale for the full value of the establishment, and that he had taken possession of, and had assumed control over the property sold, under and in pursuance of a contract before the seizure made by the defendants. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the sale was not bona fide, but was intended to defraud Cyrus Jacoby, one of the defendants, and a creditor of Edward Shafer; that, while the plaintiff was the ostensible owner, Edward Shafer continued to be the real owner of the establishment as much after the sale as before. You have heard the evidence on that subject, and all the testimony in the case, as well as the credibility of the witnesses, is submitted entirely to your determination to find the facts of the case.

The law applicable to the facts in this case is well settled. In order to pass title to personal property, when the rights of creditors are concerned, a sale must be bona fide and for a sufficient consideration accompanied and followed by open, notorious, visible and actual possession. The change of possession must accompany the transfer, or follow it as speedily as the nature of the case will admit.

If the sale by Shafer to the plaintiff was not bona fide, and for a sufficient consideration, the plaintiff cannot recover. If the purchase and sale were made for the purpose of putting the property out of the reach of Cyrus Jacoby, one of Edward Shafer's creditors, so as to prevent it from being seized and sold for Edward Shafer's debts the transaction was fraudulent, even though the plaintiff paid full value for the property; and he cannot recover. If, on the other hand, you find that the sale was bona fide and for a sufficient consideration, that the possession accompanied the sale, that the sale was not made for the purpose of hindering and delaying Cyrus Jacoby in the collection of his claim, the plaintiff may recover. If you find these facts in favor of the plaintiff, your next inquiry will be as to the amount of damages, which will be, so far as the horse sold by the defendants is concerned, the cash value of the horse at the time of the sale with interest, and, as to the horse and wagon returned by the defendants, their value to the plaintiff during the time they were detained by the defendants with interest.

If the defendants acted wantonly and maliciously in seizing the property, you will be justified in allowing, in addition to the value of the property, what are called exemplary damages.

If, however, you find that the sale from Shafer to Berger was not bona fide, or even if bona fide that there was no change of possession, you will have nothing to do with the question of damages, and your verdict will be for the defendants.

Verdict and judgment were for plaintiff.

The assignments of error specified:

1–5, the action of the court in affirming plaintiff's second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth points, thereby opening the judgment of the supreme court in the same case, in which it was held that Shafer disposed of his property with intent to defraud Jacoby, and that the finding thereof was final and conclusive.

6–8. The answers to defendants' third, sixth and last points.

9. The action of the court in overruling defendants' objection to plaintiff's offer of evidence, as above noted.

Mr. W. E. Doster, for plaintiffs in error:

Plaintiff's second point imputes to Shafer the innocent purpose of paying his wife. The third point imputes the same thing. The fourth point imputes to him the innocent purpose of paying bona fide creditors. The fifth imputes an honest indebtedness by Shafer to his wife, and preference to her. The sixth point imputes to Shafer the duty of defending Berger's title.

Certainly all these points might have been properly raised and answered, if Shafer's fraud on Jacoby had been in issue; but if that was res judicata, then the treatment of them by the court, as open, was a license to the jury to say that Jacoby was not cheated by him, that he was honestly paying his debts—in other words, giving them leave to reverse the finding of the justice as affirmed in Jacoby v. Shafer, 105 Pa. 610, and as pronounced finally and conclusively settled in Snyder v. Berger, 4 Cent. Rep. 764.

The action of the court in allowing Shafer to justify himself and contradict and impeach the judgment against him held to be final by Judge Sterrett, in 4 Cent. Rep. 764, was error.

Mr. Robt. L. Cope, for defendant in error:

Admitting that "the judgment of Jacoby v. Shafer, was conclusive, in this case, of the fraudulent purpose of Shafer, it is conceded that Berger may prove that he had no knowledge of Shafer's fraudulent intent. To do this it is certainly competent for him to show that all the acts and purposes of Shafer of which Berger might have had knowledge were not fraudulent in themselves. And if they were not fraudulent, the fact that Berger was cognizant of them could not impute fraud to him.

Walker v. Marine Nat. Bank of Erie, 98 Pa. 574; Covanhovan v. Hart, 21 Pa. 500; Uhler v. Maulfair, 23 Pa. 481; Gallagan's App. 5 Cent. Rep. 725; Wingerd v. Fallon, 95 Pa. 184.

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was here before [4 Cent. Rep. 764] we held that, as against Shafer, from whom plaintiff below purchased the property in controversy, it was definitively settled in Jacoby v. Shafer, 105 Pa. 610, that the latter, being indebted to the former, was about to assign and dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, and that the judgment, in the case referred to, was final and conclusive as to the fraudulent purpose of Shafer; but, inasmuch as Berger was not a party to that suit, he was not precluded from showing that in good faith and for a full consideration he purchased the property from Shafer and had exclusive possession of it before the attachment issued. Snyder v. Berger, 4 Cent. Rep. 764, 18 W. N. C. 490.

The only question, therefore, for determination on the second trial of this case was whether Berger was a party to the previously adjudicated fraud of Shafer.

The burden of plaintiffs in error's complaint now is that the question of Shafer's fraudulent purpose, as well as Berger's active participation therein, was retried and submitted to the jury.

The effort of plaintiff below, to accomplish that result and thus, unintentionally, insure a reversal of the judgment, can scarcely be doubted; and that he did not succeed was not the fault of the learned counsel by whom he was represented. The only question, in regard to which we have any doubt, is whether he was not so far successful, in that direction, as to secure the affirmance of points calculated to mystify the real issue and thereby mislead the jury.

We find, however, that in his general charge, and by unqualified affirmance of defendant's first and second points, the learned president of the common pleas so fully and clearly presented the only issue of fact in the case that it is scarcely possible the jury could have been misled. In affirming defendant's first point he distinctly stated the facts that have been settled in Jacoby v. Shafer, supra, and that, as to Shafer's fraudulent purpose, the judgment in that case was final and conclusive. By unqualified affirmance of defendant's second point, he instructed the jury that if they believed "Berger actively participated in the fraudulent purpose of Shafer (under whom Berger claims), Berger cannot recover and the verdict must be for defendant."

Thus the only issue of fact involved in the case was fairly presented and submitted to the jury in such a way that they could not fail to understand it. We are not prepared, therefore, to say that there is any error in either of the first five specifications.

There was no error in refusing to affirm defendant's third point; nor in saying to the jury that whether the sale was fraudulent as to Berger or not is to be determined from all the facts in the case.

Defendant's sixth and seventh points were rightly refused. The facts were not such as to warrant the court in saying that the alleged sale to Berger was fraudulent in law and therefore void.

The testimony of Shafer, referred to in the last specification, was properly received. It was of course the right of the plaintiff to show, if he could, that his alleged purchase was bona fide and for full value. That was the fact in issue; and the testimony complained of was relevant for that purpose. The sixth to ninth specifications inclusive are also insufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 276, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 4 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiffs in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

At the trial before Wilson, J., the following facts appeared:

Sarah McGoldrick died at Orange, N. J., about November 8, 1881, intestate, and leaving five or six collateral heirs. She had previously been making her home with a Mrs. Manning, in New York.

In November, 1881, Daniel McCafferty and Margaret Brady went to New York and called on Mrs. Manning. There Daniel McCafferty had delivered to him by Margaret Brady, or by Mrs. Manning for Margaret Brady, $500, which appears to have been given to Mrs. Manning by Sarah McGoldrick, deceased, and which she, Mrs. Manning, evidently understood was to be given to Margaret Brady.

Sarah McGoldrick did not make a will, but a writing was found unsigned by her, in which $500 was given to Margaret Brady. This $500 went into the hands of Daniel McCafferty, all evidently regarding it as the property of the defendant in error. He took the money home, put it in a bag, and put the bag in a drawer in his safe, where he kept his own money and other valuables. He did not attempt to exercise any control over it, and at one time told his wife to give it to Margaret Brady. At another time, he said he would not let her have it; that he would rather burn it, some bitterness of feeling having arisen between Daniel McCafferty and Margaret Brady.

No demand was made on him for this money until May, 1883. About four months before that time, his wife, who was the sister of Margaret Brady, had died. Upon receiving the note demanding the $500 in question, he went to his safe where he had placed the money, and found that it was gone. He swore that he believed his wife had given the money to Margaret Brady, as no other person had access to the safe. He declined to pay the $500 to Margaret Brady, unless she would take out letters of administration upon the estate of her aunt, Sarah McGoldrick, deceased; whereupon, Thomas Brady and the said Margaret, his wife, brought this suit to recover the $500.

The charge of the court was as follows:

The plaintiff asks a verdict in her favor for $500, which she says she placed in the hands of the defendant for safe keeping, under an express promise on his part to return it to her when requested.

The defendant does not deny that he received such a sum of money; but he does deny getting it in such a manner as makes it his duty to return it to the plaintiff.

It is conceded on all sides that the money to which the controversy relates was at one time in the hands of a Mrs. Manning, who was a friend of Sarah McGoldrick, a relative of the plaintiff as well as of the wife (now deceased) of the defendant. Sarah McGoldrick had died, and her effects appear to have been left in the hands of Mrs. Manning.

The plaintiff claims that the money had been given to her, and that she received it from Mrs. Manning for her own use and property.

It is not at all clear to my mind, on her testimony, that she acquired this money in such a way as made it her own, but she does say distinctly that she received it; and further, that she placed it in the custody of the defendant under an express agreement on his part to return it to her whenever she should ask for it. On the contrary, he asserts that the money was received by him from Mrs. Manning, and denies any such promise. He says that the money was put by him in a bag, and in a safe belonging to him, and that in some manner unknown to him it disappeared. He also said that he was in the habit of keeping his own money in the same place, but that none of that was lost.

On these facts, and the whole evidence in the case, I instruct you that if you believe from the evidence that the money in question belonged to the plaintiff, that she had acquired the ownership of it, and that the defendant received it from her for safe keeping, to be repaid when demanded, she is entitled to a verdict for the $500, unless you also believe from the evidence that he took such reasonable care of the money as a prudent man would have taken of his own money, and that it was lost or stolen, or in some way disappeared without his connivance.

I also give you the same instructions if you shall believe from the evidence that the only right which the plaintiff acquired in the property was to hold it until some legal representative of the estate of the deceased Sarah McGoldrick should be appointed, although she had received no letters of administration. If Mrs. Manning placed the money as the property of this dead woman in the hands of the plaintiff, who then put it in the care of the defendant, she has, in my judgment, as a sort of bailee, or trustee, the right to demand the return of the money to her by him, and to recover a verdict against him for the amount stated, unless, as I have before said, he is excused from the obligation of repayment by the loss of the money without his fault. Such loss would be a sufficient excuse if it is satisfactorily shown.

If you are with the plaintiff, however, in your judgment of the case upon the evidence, you will naturally scrutinize carefully the testimony in regard to this excuse, for the reason that it can so easily be made, and with such difficulty be directly refuted.

If, however, the money was placed in the hands of the defendant alone by Mrs. Manning, or in the hands of himself and the plaintiff jointly, as the property of the deceased, Sarah McGoldrick, then the verdict should be in his favor.

The defendant submitted, inter alia, the following point :

"1. If the jury believe that the money for which this suit has been brought was money belonging to the estate of Sarah McGoldrick, deceased, your verdict should be for the defendant, as no person is entitled to that money except the executor or administrator of the estate of Sarah McGoldrick."

Ans. "I decline to affirm this point. In my general charge I have sufficiently stated my views upon the question raised."

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff for $500.

The assignments of error specified the charge of the court and the answer to the point quoted.

Mr. Edward C. Quin, for plaintiff in error:

The testimony on the subject of the ownership of the money is clear, consistent and uncontradictory.

It established that the money in question belonged to Sarah McGoldrick at the time of her death, and that she died intestate. This being conceded, the money went to her administrators and not to Margaret Brady.

It was therefore the duty of the court to withdraw the case from the jury, and to say to them that the evidence was not sufficient to support the plaintiff's claim.

Weidler v. Farmers Bank, 11 Serg. & R. 184; Hyatt v. Johnston, 91 Pa. 196; Angier v. Eaton, Cole & Burnham Co. 11 W. N. C. 146.

Where the language of the charge as to the true character of the testimony tends to mislead the jury, it is error and a ground for reversal.

Fawcett v. Fawcett, 95 Pa. 376.

The plaintiff below by taking the assets of the dead woman and claiming them as her own, thereby became an executor de son tort; and by committing that wrong she could acquire no right.

Meigan v. M'Donough, 10 Watts, 287.

If one who is neither executor nor administrator interferes with the goods of the deceased or does any other act characteristic of the office of an executor, he thereby makes himself what is called in the law an executor of his own wrong, or more usually an executor de son tort.

1 Wms. Exrs. p. 296.

A very slight circumstance of intermeddling with the goods of the deceased will make a person executor de son tort; such as the milking of the cow by the widow, the taking of a dog, or the Bible or the bedstead.

1 Wms. Exrs. p. 297.

Thus, where a son died in California, and his money was sent to his father; without more than the bare receipt of it, the father was held to be an executor de son tort.

Emery v. Berry, 28 N. H. 478; 1 Wms. Exrs. p. 305, note.

An executor de son tort cannot settle the estate of the deceased, nor make any valid disposition of the goods and effects; so that no trust can arise by any acts or doings of his in this Commonwealth. The trust estate is not vested in him, nor does any trust devolve upon him in consequence of his unauthorized intermeddling.

Campbell v. Sheldon, 13 Pick. 8.

The law holds such an executor to many liabilities, but gives him no action.

Francis v. Welch, 11 Ired. Law, 215.

The court declined to affirm the defendant's first point, although it was considered and ruled the other way in Lee v. Wright, 1 Rawle, 149.

A recovery in this case cannot be pleaded against a rightful administrator; and so much of the effects as belong to the intestate may be recovered a second time from the defendant.

Viner. Abr. 222-225.

Even in equity no such action could be suffered.

Humphreys v. Humphreys, 3 P. Wms. 349.

The exigencies of the case do not require that there should be a positive demonstration of what were the views of the court on the point expressed in the general charge. It is enough if there be a doubt, for the dogma is: "To be in doubt is to be lost." An equivocal answer by the court to a pertinent point is ground for reversal.

Foster v. Collner, 107 Pa. 305.

When a point is put to the court it is the duty of the court to put the matter in its true point of view, and tell the jury what the law is in the case before them.

A party is entitled to a full, fair, and explicit answer to a prayer for instructions if pertinent.

Hays v. Paul, 51 Pa. 134; Noble v. M'Clintock, 6 Watts & S. 58.

It is error not to answer directly.

Where the point is based upon a hypothesis which is supported by actual testimony in the cause, the defendant has clear right to a definite instruction upon the effect of those facts.

Allegheny Valley R. R. Co. v. Steel, 11 W. N. C. 113.

The judgment in the present case cannot be set up as a defense in the suit by the administrator. It will therefore be seen that unless this judgment is reversed, the plaintiff in error must pay the money twice.

Messrs. J. Levering Jones, and A. A. Hirst, for defendants in error:

The whole of the evidence taken here establishes the fact that Margaret Brady received this money from Mrs. Manning, either as a trustee for the heirs of Sarah McGoldrick, or that she received it from her as a gift to her, from Sarah McGoldrick inter vivos—Mrs. Manning being the mere intermediary for the transfer of the gift.

It may be fairly inferred from the evidence and the circumstances surrounding the transfer of the money from Mrs. Manning to Margaret Brady, or her bailee, the plaintiff in error in this case, that the $500 was a gift to her, Margaret Brady, from Sarah McGoldrick.

The relationship of Margaret Brady to Sarah McGoldrick constituted a good consideration. This was a gift inter vivos. When the money was received by Mrs. Manning, the gift went into immediate effect. No actual delivery to the donee was necessary to vest the title; Crawford's App. 61 Pa. 52; and delivery may be to a third person as well as to the donee, and may be either symbolical or actual.

Davis v. Ney, 125 Mass. 590; Hill v. Stevenson, 63 Maine, 364; Meriwether v. Morrison, 78 Ky. 572.

Even if the $500 was not a gift by Sarah McGoldrick to Margaret Brady, the verdict should be sustained.

In the court below the two parties to this case gave their different versions of the events which took place at Mrs. Manning's house in New York. The jury—the only judges—decided that the story of Margaret Brady was the true statement of the facts, namely: Mrs. Manning gave her the money, and that subsequently she gave it to plaintiff in error. This makes him a bailee.

Bates v. Stanton, 1 Duer, 79.

A bailee cannot, in ordinary cases, dispute the title of his bailor, any more than a tenant that of his landlord.

Clark v. Gaylord, 24 Conn. 484; Story, Bailm. § 110.

A bailee cannot defend himself from an action to recover money deposited with him by showing that the bailment was fraudulent as against creditors of the bailor, and that the fraud was known to the plaintiff, without showing any attempt of such creditors to avail themselves of it.

Brown v. Thayer, 12 Gray, 1.

The depositary must return the thing deposited only to him who deposited it, or in whose name the deposit is made, or who is appointed to receive it. He cannot require him who made the deposit to prove that he is the owner of the thing.

Jenkinson v. Cope, 7 Martin, 284; Hendricks v. Mount, 2 South. 738.

The counsel for Daniel McCafferty argues with great vehemence that Margaret Brady was an executor de son tort, and hence cannot recover. No case is cited by him which sustains this doctrine; nor can such an inference be drawn from an examination of the reported cases in this State.

An executor de son tort, i e., a stranger who takes upon himself to act as executor without just authority (2 Bl. Com. 507), is only liable to account to the executor or administrator, and not to the next of kin.

2 Kent, Com. 11th ed. note, p. 415; Muir v. Trustees, 3 Barb. Ch. 477.

And so in Pennsylvania: An executor de son tort is liable to the action of the lawful executor or administrator, or to that of a creditor.

Stockton v. Wilson, 3 Penr. & W. 129, 130.

As Margaret Brady did not attempt to administer the estate, and as Daniel McCafferty is neither the lawful executor, administrator, nor a creditor, it is difficult to see the application of the plaintiff in error's argument on this point. He does not refuse because he asserts any right himself to the thing bailed, nor because he is either the lawful executor, administrator, or a creditor. He simply alleges a belief in the existence of a better title in some third person, and refuses to deliver to the defendant in error until she proves her title.

In Lee v. Gibbons, 14 Serg. & R. 104, and Lee v. Wright, 1 Rawle, 149, the facts were in no wise analogous to those in the case now before the court.

The evidence as to the question of negligence was fairly left to the jury, and there was sufficient evidence of negligence to justify the submission of that question to the jury.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff testified that she gave the money to the defendant for safe keeping, and that he was to return it to her whenever she asked for it. This money belonged to Sarah McGoldrick, at the time of her decease. Before bringing suit the plaintiff wrote to the defendant asking return of the money. He testified that when he received the note he had lost the money, and he did not deny that he had promised to return it to the plaintiff upon her request; but he says he received the money from the hand of Mrs. Manning.

The jury were warranted in finding that the owner or custodian of the money gave it to the defendant for safe keeping, by express agreement for its return on call. If they so found, they were instructed that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless the defendant had lost it without negligence or connivance on his part.

No excuse was shown by the defendant for violation of his promise. The trial was three years and six months after he received the special deposit, and it did not appear that an administrator claimed the money, or that he was willing to surrender it on any terms or conditions. His actual defense was that he had lost the money without fault, but the jury did not so find. Merely showing that the legal title was in the estate of a deceased person was not enough to relieve him from the obligation to return the money according to his agreement.

Judgment affirmed.

William HELLERMAN'S APPEAL.

Held, that by the words "subject to the payment of the sum of $125 unto my widow, for and during all the term of her natural life," following a devise of land, taken in connection with the rest of the will, testator intended that the land should be charged with the annual and not merely a single payment of said sum during the life of the widow, and that the words "per annum" were omitted by mistake.

(Argued Jan. 4, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 175, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia County, confirming the report of a master ordering the payment of arrearages of a charge on land. Affirmed.

This was a petition filed by J. Evan Zorns, as executor of the will of Catharine Hellerman, deceased, to compel the payment of arrearages on an alleged annual charge on lands under the will of John Hellerman, deceased. The case was referred to a master, before whom the following facts appeared:

John Hellerman, by his will, among other things, devised to his son William, the appellant, a certain farm or tract of land, situate partly in the twenty-third ward of the City of Philadelphia, and partly in the Township of Cheltenham, Montgomery County: "To have and to hold the same unto him, the said William Hellerman, his heirs and assigns, forever; under and subject to the payment of the sum of $125, unto my widow, Catharine, for and during all the term of her natural life."

In the same will there are two other devises of land to daughters of testator, in which the charge is made in precisely the same words, except that the words "per annum" are inserted immediately after the "$125."

William Hellerman, the devisee, went into possession, and for five consecutive years after testator's death in 1867 paid to the widow $125 a year; but since that time he has not paid and refuses to pay said sum of $125 per annum; whereupon this suit was brought by the executor of the widow to recover alleged arrearages of annuity due at the time of her death.

The master reported that the words "per annum" in the charge upon the land in the devise to William Hellerman were omitted by mistake and should be supplied, and reported a decree in favor of the executor, for arrearages of such yearly charge or annuity. The court confirmed the master's report and entered a decree accordingly; whereupon, William Hellerman took this appeal, assigning such action of the court as error.

Mr. William Hopple, Jr., for appellant.

Messrs. Henry Trumbore and A. S. Letchworth, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The language of the will must be interpreted according to its proper acceptation, or with as near an approach to that acceptation as the context and state of the circumstances existing at the time of its execution will admit. A mistake in the will cannot be corrected, unless it clearly appears by fair inference from the whole. In this court the appellant has not contended that parol evidence is admissible of the actual intention of the testator for the purpose of controlling or influencing the construction of his will.

This will contains seven "items," and only the fifth contains no bequest to the testator's wife. He first bequeaths to her all his personal estate, except a specified portion. The second and fourth items contain devises of real estate, each "subject to the payment of the sum of $125 per annum unto my widow, Catharine, for and during the term of her natural life." In the third item real estate is devised to William Hellerman, "subject to the payment of the sum of $125 unto my widow, Catharine, for and during all the term of her natural life." In the sixth item the testator provides that in case his daughter Caroline should die before his widow, his widow shall have the rents and profits of certain land "during the term of her natural life." And in the seventh item the testator devises his homestead farm, subject to the right of his widow, Catharine, to reside on the same "during the term of her natural life," and to receive one third of the rents and profits "during her life."

After having made five annual payments of $125 to the widow, the appellant discovered that the words "per annum" had been omitted in the clause creating the charge on the land devised to him. Being interested, he naturally inferred that the words in said clause, "during all the term of her natural life," were meaningless, although so often used in their proper sense in other parts of the will where money and rents are directed to be paid to her during said period. That he did not sooner discover the omission is not surprising. It seems plain that he took the land subject to an annual payment during the life of the widow.

The testator used apt words to express his intention, and the several devises, subject to annual payments to the widow, are in similar phrase as respects the duration of the charge. Had the testator intended to charge one devise with a single small payment he would have simply directed its payment to his widow, and not have repeated that phrase, omitting a word, thereby rendering the phrase senseless. It is a fair inference from the whole will that the words "per annum" were omitted from said clause by mistake.

It is unnecessary to repeat the reference to the authorities, made by the master and court below, which establish the principle that a word may be supplied where it is a clear inference from the whole will that it was omitted by mistake.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at costs of the appellant.

Error to the Common Pleas of Centre County, to review a judgment on a verdict directed for plaintiffs in an action of ejectment. Reversed.

This action was brought by John McCloskey and Matthias W. McCloskey, against D. B. Kunes and Joseph B. Poorman, to recover possession of 392 acres and 80 perches of land in Curtin Township. The contention in this case is for the alleged interference between two surveys on the warranty names of "Joseph Taylor" and "Robert Irwin," respectively, the title to which interference is based upon treasurer's sales for taxes assessed in the name of each survey, for the years 1872 and 1873.

At the trial before Simonton, P. J., the following facts appeared:

The Joseph Taylor tract of 413 acres was sold at the regular biennial sale, June 8, 1874, to the commissioners. The Robert Irwin tract, of 392 acres and 80 perches, was sold to the same commissioners at an adjourned sale, August 3, 1874.

February 12, 1884, the commissioners sold the Joseph Taylor tract to D. B. Kunes, and the Robert Irwin tract to John McCloskey. There was no positive and conclusive evidence as to which of the tracts was sold first on that day; but it appeared that McCloskey's deed was dated and delivered to him on that day. On the same day Kunes went to the commissioners, tendered the purchase money for the Joseph Taylor tract, and demanded a deed. The commissioners, being busy with other sales, stated that it would be impossible for them to make out all the deeds for tracts sold that day, and requested him to wait until he should again come to town. Kunes made another demand later in the same day, but was met with the same reply. February 23, being the next time

Kunes was in town, he went to the commissioner's office, paid the purchase money and received his deed, dated that day.

At the trial evidence was given that it was impossible for the commissioners to have made out and executed, on the day of the sale, deeds of conveyance for all the unseated lands sold on that day.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"If the taxes were paid on neither tract, and the commissioners did purchase both, they, therefore, owned the interference; they owned what was included in either of the surveys or included in both. When they sold them and made the first deed, they conveyed all that was within the interference, because they owned it at that time; when they came to make the second deed to the defendant afterwards, they had nothing to convey except what was outside of the interference. The plaintiff then, in this case, became the owner of whatever was within the interference; and, therefore, on the first point we instruct you that he got the better title from the commissioners."

"We instruct you that the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict for the lands described in the writ."

Verdict and judgment were for plaintiffs, and defendant took this, writ, assigning, inter alia, as error the portions of the charge given above.

Messrs. William H. Blair, D. H. Hastings and Wilbur F. Reeder, for plaintiffs in error:

County commissioners can only convey by deed what they have previously sold by public sale. This has often been decided. Their powers being derived from the statute, all acts beyond the authority conferred are ultra vires, and therefore void.

Hunter v. Albright, 5 Watts & S. 423, 425; Fritz v. Brandon, 78 Pa. 342; Brandon v. Fritz, 94 Pa. 88.

Messrs. Orvis, Bower & Orvis, for defendants in error:

When the commissioners made their deed to Kunes on February 23, 1884, they had no title to the interference, as they had already conveyed that to the plaintiffs below on February 12, 1884. After receiving the money of the plaintiffs and delivering to them the deed February 12, nothing which the county commissioners could do would impair or affect the title they had conveyed.

Brown v. McCormick, 6 Watts, 60; Banks v. Ammon, 27 Pa. 172; Washabaugh v. Entriken, 34 Pa. 74; Miller's App. 84 Pa. 391.

When the money is paid and the deeds delivered at different times, he who has the oldest conveyance from the common grantor has the better title.

Fritz v. Brandon, 78 Pa. 357; Hunter v. Albright, 5 Watts & S. 423; Diamond Coal Co. v. Fisher, 19 Pa. 267.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

The first assignment of error raises the only question of importance in this case. In that portion of the charge embraced in said assignment the learned judge below instructed the jury in substance that, inasmuch as the county owned both the Joseph Taylor and the Robert Irwin tracts, it therefore was the owner of what was included in either of the surveys or included in both; that when the commissioners sold them and made the first deed, they conveyed all that was within the interference, because they owned it at that time; that when they came to make the second deed to the defendant afterwards, they had nothing to convey except what was outside the interference. The learned judge thereupon instructed the jury that upon this branch of the case, the plaintiff got the better title from the commissioners.

Each of these tracts had been sold for taxes by the county treasurer. The Joseph Taylor, containing 415 acres, was sold by the treasurer of Centre County to the commissioners at the regular biennial sale June 8, 1874, for $89.12. The Robert Irwin, containing 392 acres and 80 perches, was sold by the same treasurer to the same commissioners, at an adjourned sale on the third of August of the same year for $45.22.

On the 12th of February, 1884, the commissioners sold both of these tracts. They sold the Robert Irwin to John McCloskey, plaintiff below, for $26, and delivered him their deeds therefor, dated the same day. They sold the Joseph Taylor to D. B. Kunes, defendant below, for $84, for which they delivered him their deed on the 25th of the same month.

The court below ruled, as has been stated, that the deed to the plaintiff, being prior in point of time, conveyed the title to the interference.

This might be so, if in point of fact there was any priority of the one deed over the other, and such deed by its terms and the understanding of the parties, conveyed such interference. The difficulty in the way of this view of the case is that both tracts were sold upon the same day; and there is no evidence in the case that points with any degree of certainty as to which tract was first sold. At most there was but a scintilla, by far too little to base thereon an adjudication as to the rights of property.

It may be that in the case of a sale by the commissioners of two tracts upon the same day, the law might regard fractions of a day in order to ascertain the relative rights of the parties. No such attempt was made in the present instance, and in its absence we must regard the accidental priority in the delivery of the respective deeds as unimportant. The rights of the parties were fixed by the sale, and the subsequent payment of the purchase money and delivery of the deed relate back to that event. The purchaser has an inchoate title the moment the property is knocked down to him, which becomes perfect with the payment of the purchase money. The deed from the commissioners was not the title itself; it was merely the evidence of the title. It is a mode of assuring and preserving such evidence which experience has shown to be the most convenient method.

If we concede, however, that the plaintiff's deed has priority as a conveyance, it by no means follows that it operates as a conveyance of the interference. That it was not intended by the parties so to operate seems clear, from the fact that so far as this evidence shows none of them knew of the interference at the time of the commissioner's sale. It was not known to either of the parties or the commissioners.

What then did the latter sell, at the sale referred to? They sold precisely what was conveyed to them by the treasurer's deed.

It was urged, however, that Fritz v. Brandon, 78 Pa. 342, is in conflict with this view of the case. It is true Chief Justice Agnew, after commenting upon the cases of Hunter v. Albright, 5 Watts & S. 423, and Diamond Coal Co. v. Fisher, 19 Pa. 237, said: "And irrespective of the doctrine of these cases, if the tax sale in either name be sufficient to convey the title to the actual locus in quo, the title of Roseberry would prevail for he was first to pay the purchase money to the commissioners and obtain his deed. Prior in tempore potior est in jure. But it is sufficient that the title under the Gray surveys being good, the tax sales of Troxel and Immel were good."

The language quoted indicates, what an examination of the case clearly shows, that the case referred to had already been decided upon other grounds. And when we examine the facts of which it was predicated, we find that although the two tracts had been sold by the commissioners upon the same day, to two different purchasers, one of said purchasers refused to pay the purchase money for several years, and only settled therefor after the matter had been placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, while the other purchaser paid the money and took his deed promptly. The difference between that case and the one in hand in this respect is too apparent to need comment. Here there was no delay on the part of the defendant. The evidence shows that he offered the purchase money on the day of sale and was clamorous for his deed.

This brings us to the question: What title did the commissioners sell? It is doubtless true that the title was absolute in the county, if the county chose to enforce such right. The time allowed by law for redemption had passed. It is equally clear, however, under the authority of Jenks v. Wright, 61 Pa. 410, and Steiner v. Cox, 4 Pa. 13, that the owner may redeem after the expiration of the five years, with the consent of the commissioners.

It was held in the latter case that a private sale to the owner, although the consideration was less than the amount in arrears, was valid in the absence of collusion, and that nothing but a corrupt agreement to defraud the revenue would avoid such conveyance. Such purchase was held to be a redemption; upon no other ground could such a transaction be maintained, as the commissioners have no power to make a private sale to a stranger for any price, whether more or less than the taxes in arrears.

In Jenks v. Wright the power of the commissioners to permit redemption after the term has gone by was said by Thompson, C. J., to be beyond dispute and to have been exercised in hundreds of cases, while in Steiner v. Cox it is treated as a custom, proper to be proved as a matter of evidence. Not as a custom to override the statute, but to aid in its construction.

The Acts authorizing sales of land by the commissioners or treasurer, are laws for the collection of taxes, and not for the confiscation of the property of the citizen, who from any reason may be unable to pay them, when due. It would be beneath the dignity of a great Commonwealth to seek to make gain out of the misfortunes of her citizens; hence, we have provisions for redemption in case of both the treasurer and commissioner's sale. During the period allowed for redemption, the equitable title is in the owner; the legal title is in the treasurer or commissioners, as the case may be, as security for the unpaid taxes and costs.

After the five years have elapsed, and in cases of sales by the commissioners, the owner loses his legal right to redeem. This is not because his equity entirely ceases, but because there must be a time certain when the commissioners may proceed, with or without the consent of the owner, to collect the taxes due. But an equity, not enforceable it is true, remains in the owner, sufficient to warrant the commissioners in permitting redemption at any time before a public sale to other parties, as directed by Act of Assembly.

The commissioners sold these tracts precisely as they bought them at the treasurer's sale, and by the same description. The commissioners' deeds respectively describe them only by their warranted names; no courses and distances or other boundaries or marks are given. They sold what they bought from the treasurer, and nothing else, and they sold them precisely as they had bought them.

The Joseph Taylor was sold by the treasurer to the commissioners on June 8, 1874; the Robert Irwin was sold by the same treasurer to the same commissioners on August 3, 1874. Both treasurer's deeds appear to have been dated in the same day, but as before observed, it was the sale that fixed the rights of the parties, and not a scramble for the first deed. The commissioners therefore acquired title to the Joseph Taylor before they acquired title to the Robert Irwin. The Taylor was the older survey and paramount title; hence, when they subsequently bought the Robert Irwin, they bought what was left outside of the Joseph Taylor, conceding there to be an interference as claimed.

Holding the two titles, therefore, in the manner above stated, it is conceded that the commissioners might, had they so willed, have sold this interference by metes and bounds. But they did not do so nor attempt it. They sold both tracts as they received them without any regard to location. The purchaser of the Joseph Taylor took by his deed just what the commissioners took by the treasurer's deed; so of the Robert Irwin. Suppose, instead of making this sale of the two tracts, the commissioners had sold them to the owners at private sale. This, under the authorities cited, would have been a redemption, although after the five years. Surely no intention of passing the interference would be presumed in such case.

The county commissioners can only convey by deed what they have previously sold by public sale, excepting perhaps the single instance of a conveyance to the owner by way of redemption. The deed from the commissioners to the plaintiffs below limits their conveyance to the premises conveyed to their predecessors by the treasurer's sale of August 3, 1874. The recital is as follows:

"It being the same tract of land which J. B. Mitchell, treasurer of said county * * * sold, granted and conveyed by deed poll, dated the 20th day of November, 1874, to the commissioners of Centre County and to their successors in office," etc.

In like manner, the commissioners' deed to the defendants below refers to the sale of June 8, 1874. The sale of the Joseph Taylor having been prior to the sale of the Robert Irwin, it is difficult to see how the treasurer's deed conveyed to the county more than the residue of the Robert Irwin, that is to say what remained outside of it after the sale of the Joseph Taylor in June preceding.

Under such circumstances I see no reason why the rule laid down by Justice Kennedy in Hunter v. Albright, 5 Watts & S. 423, should not apply.

"But when the land embraced by the junior title is only in part included under the older warrant and survey, as in this instance, and the land embraced by each warrant and survey is assessed as two distinct tracts for the same years as unseated and sold at the same time to two different purchasers, it will scarcely be pretended that the purchaser of the tract assessed in the name of the person to whom the older warrant was granted, or the person claiming the land under it, will not be entitled to the land embraced within the interference of the two surveys, in preference to the purchaser of the land assessed under the junior warrant. The seniority of title must of necessity, be looked to in each case, and be made the test of right between the two purchasers."

The first and third assignments of error are sustained. The remaining assignments do not require discussion.

A judgment in an attachment suit against a nonresident of the State in which defendant's goods were attached but he was not personally served, is good as a personal judgment against him, where the record shows a general appearance by attorneys for him in the suit without any restriction or limitation and that, by consent of counsel on both sides, a jury of inquest was awarded to assess the damages; and such judgment is sufficient upon which to enter judgment against a garnishee.

(Argued March 7, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1886, Nos. 104, 107, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Carbon County, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an attachment proceeding. Affirmed.

January 11, 1876, Michael Hanley and William F. Welch, partners, doing business as Hanley & Welch, commenced an action, in the Common Pleas of Washington County, against John Donoghue and Charles Donoghue, partners, trading as John Donoghue & Bro., to recover damages for the breach of a covenant under seal.

John Donoghue, being a nonresident, a writ of summons in covenant was issued against Charles and a writ of foreign attachment against John, "a nonresident of this State." The sheriff in whose hands the writs were placed, returned the one against Charles as personally served; and as to the one against John, the sheriff returned that he had attached the goods and chattels of John in the hands of certain officers of the Waynesburg & Washington Railroad Company, whom he summoned as garnishees, and as to John Donoghue nihil habet.

January 22, 1876, the narr. was filed, in which plaintiffs stated their damages at the sum of $2,000.

The record shows a general appearance by Messrs. Hart & Brady, as attorneys for the defendants, without any restriction or limitation. The appearance docket, also, shows the following:

"August 25, 1876, on motion judgment, in open court, against the deft. (in covenant) for want of an affidavit of defense, and sum due liquidated at $———.

J. P. Miller, Prothonotary.

Sci. fa. v. Garnishees, to No. 198, March Term, 1877."

The writ of inquiry of damages recites that the defendants were summoned to answer the plaintiffs "of a plea in an action of covenant," and that it was "in such manner proceeded in said court that the plaintiffs their damages, by occasion of the premises, ought to recover," etc.

The sheriff made return to this writ May 18, 1877, and then follows these entries: "June 4, judgment entered against the defendants for amount found to be due by jury in proceedings upon writ of inquiry of damages, to wit: $2,000."

"And March 20, 1877, on motion of plaintiffs' counsel, judgment, in open court on the foreign attachment, against John Donoghue, the nonresident defendant, and a jury of inquest awarded to assess the damages,—by consent of counsel on both sides. Order of court filed. Writ of inquiry issued, returnable to May Term, 1877."

The officers of the Waynesburg & Washington Railroad Company, who were summoned as garnishees, answered denying that they had under their control or that the company had under its control, at the time of the service of the writ, any goods, moneys, etc., of the defendants' in the action.

*For report of case brought in Maryland to enforce the judgment referred to herein, reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States on error, see Hanley v. Donoghue, 116 U. S. 1 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 535).

A transcript of the record of the judgment from the Common Pleas of Washington County was December 20, 1883, filed in Carbon County; and December 26, thereafter, an attachment in execution was issued against the Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. as garnishee and was duly served on the officers of said company.

January 14, 1884, John Donoghue presented a petition to dissolve the attachment, setting forth the proceedings in the Common Pleas of Washington County and alleging that said summons in covenant was served on Charles Donoghue alone and that the petitioner never authorized nor employed an attorney to appear for him in said proceedings; that the moneys in the hands of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., garnishee, is due for labor performed in the construction of a tunnel on such railroad and that Charles Donoghue is not and never has been a partner in such construction and has no interest therein.

A rule to show cause was granted and, after hearing, the court, February 23, 1884, filed an opinion in which it held that the judgment against John Donoghue, taken August 25, 1876, was irregular and erroneous, but it never having been reversed by a superior court or set aside by the Court of Common Pleas of Washington County in which it was entered, this Court of Common Pleas of Carbon County would not interfere, and continued the rule to show cause, to afford the defendant an opportunity to make application to the court in Washington County; whereupon, John Donoghue filed a petition in the Court of Common Pleas of Washington County to strike off the judgments of August 25, 1876, March 20, 1877 and June 4, 1877.

March 24, 1884, the Court of Common Pleas of Washington County granted a rule to show cause, which (after hearing, on answer and demurrer) was discharged by the court, STOWE, P. J., specially presiding, in the following order:

"I have no doubt that the judgment entered against Charles and John Donoghue, August 25, 1876, for want of an affidavit of defense, was absolutely void as to John. But this does not in any wise affect or invalidate the judgment against the latter, March 20, 1877, entered (as we understand the record to say or mean) "by consent of his counsel." If I am right in interpreting the record, and I have no doubt I am, the judgment is perfectly regular and cannot be set aside.

"The rule to set aside this judgment is therefore discharged."

John Donoghue then filed a petition in the Common Pleas of Washington County for a rule to show cause why the judgment of August 25, 1876, which was held absolutely void as to John Donoghue, by STOWE, P. J., should not be stricken from the record. The court after hearing, filed the following opinion:

"While I am still of the opinion that the judgment entered against petitioner, August 25, 1876, was absolutely void, I can see no necessity for ordering it to be stricken off. If the view I take of this case is correct, the judgment is a nullity, and ordering it to be stricken from the record will not in the least benefit the petitioner; for the supreme court would consider that as done which should have been done. But if, on the other hand, the judgment should by any possibility have any vitality which might benefit the plaintiff, I do not see why he should be deprived of it. There is nothing in the case to evoke the equitable interference of the court, and plaintiffs should have every possible legal advantage the record may give them. Petition refused."

Interrogatories were filed by plaintiffs' attorneys and January 17, 1885, the court granted a rule on the garnishee to answer the same. It appeared from the answers of the garnishee that there was a balance due the defendant, John Donoghue, of $4,335.37. By a supplemental answer, alleging an error in the accounting by the garnishee, there appeared to be a balance due defendant of $3,600.73. The garnishee, further answering, amended the answer stating the amount due defendant, so that it should read as follows:

"The above balance of $3,600.73 is now due absolutely as between defendant and garnishee, not being subject to any contingency as to satisfactory completion of work; but garnishee has received notice from defendants' counsel of possible outstanding assignments made prior to service of attachment, and desires to be further informed on this subject before answering fully."

After hearing, on rule on the defendants and the garnishee to show cause why judgment should not be entered against the garnishee upon the answers filed to the interrogatories, the court, DREHER, P. J., filed the following opinion:

"The judgment in this court was entered on a transcript of a judgment in the Court of Common Pleas of Washington County. The defendants interpose objections to the present rule for judgment against the garnishee that the judgment against John Donoghue (the only party to whom the garnishee is indebted) is void.

"In an opinion, heretofore given, we fully considered the question raised now, and held that while we considered the judgment irregular and erroneous, we had no power over it, and that the defendant must make his application to set aside, or open the judgment, to the Court of Common Pleas of Washington County. That court, on application of John Donoghue, refused to open the judgment, and that, notwithstanding His Honor, Judge Stowe, considered the judgment void.

"I am still of opinion that the judgment is not void, but only erroneous; and as the court of Washington County has refused to disturb it, it must stand as a good judgment until reversed by the supreme court.

"While Judge Stowe held the judgment taken for want of an affidavit of defense void, he held the judgment which we treated as a judgment in rem to be in personam.

"Let judgment be entered against the garnishee on its answers to the plaintiffs' interrogatories for the amount of the plaintiffs' judgment, debt, interest and costs, in the usual form."

October 20, 1885, judgment was accordingly entered against the garnishee for the amount of plaintiffs' judgment and interest from May, 1877, to which judgment John Donoghue excepted.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court: 1, in entering judgment on the exemplified record from the Common Pleas of Washington County, so far as John Donoghue is concerned; 2, in not dissolving the attachment, as prayed for in the petition of John Donoghue; and 3, in entering judgment against the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, on the answers filed.

Messrs. Edward Harvey, Henry S. Drinker, Frederick Bertolette, Edward M. Mulhearn and Craig & Loose, for plaintiffs in error:

The Act of April 16, 1840, P. L. 410, provides for the transfer of judgments from one court and county to another, by filing of record in said other court a certified copy of the whole record in the case. The record must contain all the essentials of a perfect transcript.

Bell v. Murphy, 6 Watts & S. 50.

And the transcript must show that it is a final judgment. If it be of a case developed to verdict, but not yet in judgment, no transfer can be made.

Bailey v. Eder, 90 Pa. 446.

Nor can an award of arbitrators be transferred before the time for an appeal has passed.

Hallman's App. 18 Pa. 310.

Such transfer does not make it a judgment of the court to which the transfer is made.

Mellon v. Guthrie, 51 Pa. 116.

It is only a quasi judgment for limited purposes.

Brandt's App. 16 Pa. 346.

The court where the exemplified record is filed has exclusive control of all execution process thereon.

Baker v. King, 2 Grant. Cas. 254; King v. Nimick, 34 Pa. 297.

If, however, the original judgment is stricken off, the transferred judgment falls with it.

Banning v. Taylor, 24 Pa. 297; Knauss' App. 49 Pa. 421; Brandt's App. 16 Pa. 346.

The court will examine the exemplification to see if a valid judgment was originally obtained. We do not mean to say that its regularity will be inquired into; that can only be done in the court where it was originally entered, or in some superior court whose jurisdiction requires them to examine the record on appeal, certiorari, or writ of error.

McDonald v. Simcox, 98 Pa. 619; Tarbox v. Hays, 6 Watts, 398.

Courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction cannot modify or set aside the judgments of each other.

Doyle v. Commonwealth, 107 Pa. 20.

If the judgment is void, then the exemplified record filed in another court is equally void.

Edward's App. 66 Pa. 90; Quinn's App. 86 Pa. 447.

In Williamson's Case, 26 Pa. 9, it was held that the court will only look at the record to see whether a judgment exists, and has no power to say whether it is right or wrong. It is conclusively pronounced to be right until it is regularly brought up for revision. But the record must show a judgment, and it must appear that the court rendering it had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter. A judgment entered in an action where there was no service on the parties, or on property, would be a nullity everywhere. The same would follow if it is entered in a controversy not within the jurisdiction of the court. It is essential that the subject be within the jurisdiction, to be definitive and binding.

Billings v. Russell, 23 Pa. 192.

"The defect," says Sergeant, J., "which the Act of June 13, 1836, § 70, P. L. 585, seems to have intended to remedy was, that in a suit against two joint debtors, of whom one was absent, if a summons or capias were served on the other, and judgment rendered against him, the separate property of the debtor not served, could not, by our ordinary mode of proceeding, be levied by execution; nor could it originally have been levied on by attachment, because, one defendant being resident, attachment would not lie in the joint suit."

White & Schnebly's Case, 10 Watts, 221.

The effect of the service of the summons on Charles was to bring him into court, where, if a recovery was had, a general judgment could be obtained against him; as to him the action proceeded as an ordinary action of covenant. The effect of the attachment against John was to bring his individual property attached within the bailiwick within the grasp of the law to answer any judgment that might be recovered against him and his codefendant in the action; as to him the action proceeded as a pure proceeding in rem.

It is clear that the entry of "Judgment against deft. (in covenant) for want of an affidavit of defense," was to be made against Charles, for he was the only defendant served, and for the additional reason that no judgment can be taken in foreign attachment for want of an affidavit of defense, even where an appearance has been entered.

Grant v. Hickox, 64 Pa. 334.

The judgment of March 20, 1877, is either absolutely void as to John or is only a judgment in rem. In either aspect of the case, the attachment in execution is void and should have been dissolved, and the judgment should have been stricken from the record. If the judgment was void, or is only a judgment in rem, that matter is inquirable in the courts of Carbon County, as it would have been in the County of Washington; for if it is void in the court where it was entered, it is void everywhere. And if it was a judgment in rem, its only force and effect is upon the property attached and upon which it is a lien. Beyond that it has no grasp. It remains, therefore, to consider this record under the proposed analysis.

The precipe and writ was in foreign attachment; there was no personal service; the writ was returned nihil habet; and the record shows that the judgment was taken in open court against John in the foreign attachment at the third term after the issuing of the writ. Section 53 of the Act of June 13, 1836, P.L. 584, provides:

"It shall be lawful for the plaintiff, at the third term of the court after the execution of the writ aforesaid, if he shall have filed his declaration, to take judgment thereon against the defendant, for default of appearance, unless the attachment before that time be dissolved."

The judgment against John, taken March 20, 1877, was interlocutory. As there was no affidavit of claim and the damages demanded were not liquidated, a jury of inquiry was necessary. Accordingly a writ of inquiry was directed to the sheriff as required by the rules of practice.

Thornton v. Bonham, 2 Pa. 102; O'Neal v. O'Neal, 4 Watts & S. 130.

And in the case just cited above, this court says that in default of assessment of damages the writ abates. The assessment may also be made by the prothonotary under section 1 of the Act of April 9, 1870, P. L. 60. We have here all the essentials of a proceeding in foreign attachment. The maxim Omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta is certainly applicable to this record.

"The rule may be stated to be, that, where it appears upon the face of the proceedings that the inferior court has jurisdiction, it will be intended that the proceedings are regular; but that, unless it so appears—that is, if it appear affirmatively that the inferior court has no jurisdiction, or if it be left in doubt whether it has jurisdiction or not—no such intendment will be made.

Broom, Legal Maxims, *915.

The presumption is that everything that was done was done rightly and according to law.

Brown v. Ridgway, 10 Pa. 42; Gidding's App. 82 Pa. 72.

In Fox v. Commonwealth, 82 Pa. 516, it appeared of record that the recognizance was forfeited. This was considered as proof that all the steps necessary to complete the forfeiture had been taken upon the principle of rite esse acta.

If the opinion of the court below is examined it will appear that the learned judge regarded the judgment of March 20, 1877, as a judgment in rem. He uses this language: "It is not stated on what ground the judgment was taken. The only judgment, where there is no appearance in foreign attachment provided for by the statute, is for default of appearance. The judgment was entered on motion of plaintiffs' counsel, as is the usual practice where there is no appearance for defendants. * * * The plaintiffs, however, on their motion, took judgment against him in the foreign attachment, thus seeming to ignore the general appearance of Hart & Brady."

It is contended, however, that because the names of Hart & Brady appear as attorneys on the margin of the record opposite the names of the defendants, the judgment became a general one. The suit was against John and Charles Donoghue as partners, trading as John Donoghue & Bro. The writ was in covenant against one, and in foreign attachment against the other. One was served and the other was not. Charles was liable to a personal judgment, but John was not. All that was bound by the writ against him was his individual property actually attached; that is, his separate property, not firm property.

White & Schnebly's Case, 10 Watts, 217.

The appearance of the attorneys was for Charles.

He was the party named, and it is to be presumed that he was only represented by counsel.

Brown v. Kelso, 2 Penr. & W. 427; Barlow v. Beall, 26 Pa. 180.

From the record it is evident that this appearance was intended for the defendant served, and this is also clear from the fact that it was so regarded by all parties in the court below and by the court itself. No judgment could have been taken in the foreign attachment, but by default of an appearance. The judgment entered March 20, 1876, was obviously taken for default of an appearance. And it would be preposterous to say that the court entered judgment because there was no appearance, and when that judgment is attacked to say that it must be sustained because there was an appearance.

It was also contended that the judgment of March 20, 1877, was by consent. If it is meant that it was by confession the judgment fails to show it. The word consent is used in the record entry; but it is evidently used in connection with the awarding of an inquest. The judgment was taken by default of an appearance, and the inquest was awarded by consent of counsel on both sides—that is, by consent of the counsel for the plaintiffs and Charles Donoghue. Why do we say for Charles? Because the jury awarded damages against both and no formal judgment was entered against Charles until the award of the inquest was filed. The use of the word "consent" is of no significance. A somewhat similar entry was made by the clerk in Hall v. Williams, 6 Pick. 232, viz.: "W. & F. came by their said attorney." As F. was a nonresident and no process had been served on him it was held that the entry made by the clerk could not be taken to be an assertion of record that F. appeared to the action.

It may also be remarked that nothing on the record shows when the appearance was entered. Presumably it was not there when judgment was taken by default against John, for if it had been no such judgment would have been entered.

The judgment of May 25, 1876, is void and of no effect as to John. It does not pretend to be a judgment against him; it is not docketed as a judgment against him. It is expressly limited and confined to the action in covenant. Then again the record shows that he was a nonresident and was not served with process. He was regarded as not served and a nonresident down to the entry of final judgment after the third term, to wit: March 20, 1877. There was no jurisdiction over the person of John in August, 1876. The court could not enter a judgment against him. Such a judgment would be void; "If it act without authority, its judgments and actions are regarded as nullities. They are not voidable, but simply void."

Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Pet. 340 (26 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 170); Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 565).

We refer to the record as made up in Washington County, to show that this judgment was treated as void, so far as John is concerned. And we refer to the case of Hanley v. Donoghue, in the Supreme Court of the United States, error to the Supreme Court of Maryland, 116 U. S. 1 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 535), where the plaintiffs declare on this very judgment as good as to Charles and void as to John.

Under the rule as laid down in Donnelly v. Graham, 77 Pa. 274, the whole judgment is void.

Lastly, we call attention to the answers of the garnishee. Upon the supplemental answer no judgment could have been entered. There is a reservation in the answer "to be further informed." Before the answer could be regarded as final and conclusive a rule should have been taken for a more specific answer. The case was not ripe for judgment, and the court erred in entering it.

Messrs. R. E. Wright's Sons, for defendants in error:

This court cannot interfere with the judgment in Washington County on the ground of irregularity or error.

King v. Nimick, 34 Pa. 298; Wilkinson v. Conrad, 10 W. N. C. 23; McDonald v. Simcox, 98 Pa. 623.

The judgment of August 26, 1876, is not void; at most it is but erroneous and irregular and cannot be attacked collaterally but only on appeal to a higher court, or by the court that entered it.

Hauer's App. 5 Watts & S. 473; Wall v. Fife, 37 Pa. 398; Tarbox v. Hays, 6 Watts, 398; Drexel's App. 6 Pa. 272; Lewis v. Smith, 2 Serg. & R. 142; Stewart v. Stocker, 1 Watts, 139; S. C. 13 Serg. & R. 199; Lowber's App. 8 Watts & S. 390; Ulrich v. Voneida, 1 Penr. & W. 251; Share v. Becker, 8 Serg. & R. 241; McDonald v. Simcox, 98 Pa. 623; Boyd v. Miller, 52 Pa. 431; Miltimore v. Miltimore, 40 Pa. 151-155; Purd. Dig. p. 721, pl. 28; Hatch v. Stitt, 66 Pa. 264; Reber v. Wright, 68 Pa. 471.

The judgment of March 20, 1877, was not a judgment in rem, but a general judgment by consent.

The record reads as follows: "And now March 20, 1877, on motion of plaintiffs' counsel judgment in open court on the foreign attachment against John Donoghue (the nonresident defendant) and a jury of inquest awarded to assess the damages—by consent of counsel on both sides."

It will be noticed that as to Charles a valid judgment had already been entered for want of an affidavit of defense, but the amount of damages had not been ascertained.

The judgment heretofore standing against John Donoghue may have been erroneous under the doctrine of Grant v. Hickox, 64 Pa. 334.

Although the suit as against John was still a proceeding by attachment, and had some of the incidents of an attachment (to wit: a lien on property attached), yet the defendant having appeared by counsel, the effect of the judgment was different. There could no longer be a judgment in rem merely; but it became a general judgment—entered by confession after appearance.

The judgment thus entered was a general judgment.

See Blyler v. Kline, 64 Pa. 130; Hatch v. Stitt, 66 Pa. 264.

There is nothing in the supplemental answer of the garnishee to prevent judgment. It is based upon a letter or notice that has no reference to this attachment, but solely to one issued long subsequent thereto by another party.

Per Curiam:

These three cases were argued together. The facts are somewhat blended. We discover no error in the judgment of the court in any of the cases. The effect of the general appearance in the original judgment, and the subsequent proceedings in liquidating the amount gave to it the effect of a personal judgment. Such being the case there is on error in the action of the court in the County of Carbon, and the judgment against the garnishee is correct.

Judgment in each case affirmed.

v.
COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania.

1. It is never irrelevant to give in evidence any circumstance which tends to make the proposition at issue more or less probable. Nor is it necessary to offer at once all the circumstances necessary to prove such proposition. The party seeking to prove or disprove it may proceed step by step, offering link by link. Whatever is a condition, either of the existence or nonexistence of a relevant hypothesis, may be thus shown.

2. In the trial of an indictment for murder where the identity of the prisoner and the person who committed the crime is in question, no matter how slight may be the inference of identity to be drawn from any single fact, it is admissible as a fragment of the material from which the induction is to be made.

3. Where it is in evidence that the man who committed the crime wore a long, dark, frock coat, evidence is admissible to prove that such a coat was given to the prisoner before the crime and was afterwards found in a house which he robbed, taking instead a coat belonging to the owner of the house.

4. The right of the supreme court to review proceedings of the court below upon writ of error on an indictment for murder, is limited to such rulings on points of law or evidence as are excepted to at the time, and made matter of record.

5. Where, therefore, the prisoner is told by the district attorney to stand up and open his mouth and repeat the sentences used by the one who committed the murder, and he does so without objection on his part or by his counsel, the purpose being to afford a witness then on the stand an opportunity of seeing the prisoner and hearing the sound of his voice so as to testify more intelligently whether he was or was not the man who used those words at the time of the murder, this court has no power to review the action of the court below.

6. Not decided but doubted whether if objection had been made and exception taken it would be held that such a proceeding was a violation of the constitutional provision that the accused can not be compelled to give evidence against himself.

9. A mistake of the clerk, in consequence of which the record does not show that the prisoner was present when the jury was sworn or the verdict was entered, may be corrected by an amendment of the record by direction of the court, during the term at which the motion for a new trial is overruled.

(Argued Feb. 7, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 165, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to Oyer and Terminer of Delaware County, to review a judgment on a verdict convicting the defendant of murder in the first degree. Affirmed.

The facts, as they appeared at the trial before Clayton, P. J., are stated in his charge to the jury and in the opinion of the supreme court.

The charge was as follows:

As the learned district attorney has well said, we are engaged in the performance of a very disagreeable duty. Unpleasant as it is, however, we must perform it conscientiously and to the best of our ability. Let me warn you against permitting yourselves to be influenced, while in the consideration of this case, by any supposed outside clamor; you have nothing to do with public opinion. You should not even harbor the thought of rendering a verdict that will be pleasant and acceptable to the people. You are to decide this case according to the evidence before you, under the rules of law; and you are to say, on your oaths and affirmations, whether Samuel Johnson is guilty or not guilty of the crime for which he is indicted and for which he is now on trial. He is charged in this bill of indictment with having willfully and maliciously killed and murdered a very reputable citizen of this county, John Sharpless. The question for you to decide is whether he is guilty or not guilty of that crime. To satisfactorily solve this question, it is necessary that you shall know what the ingredients of murder are.

Murder, as defined at common law, is the willful killing of any reasonable creature in being and in the peace of the Commonwealth, with malice aforethought, either expressed or implied. Our law has wisely modified the common-law definition of murder, by dividing it into two degrees, and leaving with the jury who try the defendant the power to determine, when they find him guilty, whether the murder was in the first or in the second degree. Murder in the first degree is any willful and deliberate killing of another, or any killing of another, by poisoning or lying in wait, or while perpetrating, or attempting to perpetrate, any robbery, arson, burglary or rape. All such killing is declared to be murder in the first degree, the punishment of which is death. All other murder is declared to be murder in the second degree.

If, therefore, you come to the conclusion that the defendant is the murderer of John Sharpless, and that he killed him while attempting to commit the crime of robbery, then, when he struck the fatal blow, whether he intended to kill him or not, the offense is murder in the first degree. If you find, however, that the killing was for some other purpose than that of the perpetration of the crime of robbery, and that there was, at the time, no intent to kill, but only to do great bodily harm, then the offense is murder in the second degree. This distinction is very important to keep in your minds.

Let me repeat: if you find first, that the defendant is the murderer, and that John Sharpless came to his death from a blow inflicted at the hands of this man; if, at that time, he was actually attempting to commit robbery, not merely intending, but attempting to rob, then, whether he actually intended to kill him when he struck the blow or not, the offense is murder in the first degree; but if you find that he had any other object than that of robbery, or arson, or burglary, or rape in view when he struck the fatal blow, and that he only intended to do the man great bodily harm, but that the blow resulted in death, then the offense is murder in the second degree.

All homicide that is not justifiable or excusable is either murder in the first or in the second degree or manslaughter. Manslaughter is the unwillful killing of another without malice. Under the evidence in this case, I suppose it is hardly necessary to consider the question of manslaughter; it seems to me the defendant is either entitled to an acquittal or to conviction of murder in the first or second degree; and let me say to you that the question of degree is always for the jury. There is no case where the court is authorized to take from the jury the power of saying what the degree is. You have the absolute power to say, under all the evidence, first, whether the defendant is guilty of murder, and then to determine whether it is murder in the first or second degree; and sometimes where the jury are in doubt as to the intent at the time the fatal blow was inflicted, it is proper that they should convict of murder in the second degree. That is, when they are in doubt as to whether the man, when he struck the fatal blow, intended to kill or only to do great bodily harm.

Now, in considering the evidence, there are three questions to which you must direct your attention and around which all the testimony centers: first, Was there an actual killing? If there was, then was the defendant the slayer? If you find that he was, then what was his intent? All these questions are to be settled by the evidence, not by the testimony of any one witness, but by a general and intelligent and comprehensive view of all the evidence in the cause.

To make out the crime of murder, three things are necessary: first, malicious killing, or, in other words, willful or felonious killing; second, malice at the time the crime is committed; and third, premeditation; but the law presumes, wherever there is a homicide and the evidence shows that the accused is the slayer, that the killing was willful, and that it was felonious. That presumption of law does not rise, however, higher than murder in the second degree. Malice, in law, has not the meaning generally given to that word in common parlance. Malice, in law, simply means an intention to do a wrong; it does not mean spite, previous ill will, or malevolence; it simply means an intention at the time the injury is inflicted to commit the injury. The premeditation necessary to support an indictment for murder need not necessarily have occupied the mind of the slayer any particular length of time. It is only necessary that at the time the fatal blow is struck the intention is in the mind of the man who strikes the blow to kill, or to do great bodily harm, which would probably result in death.

Men, as a rule, are to be judged as intending to do what their acts would probably result in. For instance, to strike a babe with the fist of a strong man. The fist is not a deadly weapon; but to strike a babe in the head with the fist would be evidence that the man doing it intended to kill the babe.

Where a deadly weapon is used, the law presumes that the man using the weapon intended to inflict the injury which the weapon was made to inflict. Sometimes, where a weapon is not in itself deadly, the manner of its use raises the presumption that the man intended death,—as to strike one upon a vital part of the body with a bludgeon, club, or a dangerous tool. If the blow is sufficient, and directed to such vital part of the body as to probably cause death, the law presumes that that is what he intended when he struck the blow.

If, therefore, you find that Samuel Johnson is the man who killed John Sharpless, you will then inquire whether he intended at the time to kill him, or only to do him great bodily harm; and this intent will be found, of course, from all the surrounding circumstances; then you may find him guilty of murder either in the first or second degree, according as you shall look upon the crime being committed and the intention in the mind of the man who committed it. If you find that he intended at the time to kill him, then it is murder in the first degree; and if you find he did not intend to kill him, but only to do him great bodily harm, it is murder in the second degree. Now it appears to me that you are sufficiently informed as to what is necessary to sustain an indictment for murder in the first or second degree.

Let me say to you that you have nothing to do with the punishment; remember, it is not the jury that hangs the man, if you find him guilty of murder in the first degree; nor is it the jury that imprisons him, if you find him guilty of murder in the second degree; and it was not your fault if the evidence produced is not sufficient to warrant you in convicting at all. You are to deal simply with the question of fact; it is the duty of the court to instruct you in the law; but after the court has so instructed you, you are the sole judges of the law, as well as the fact, and there is no power in the Commonwealth that can control that judgment. It is for you. You ought, however, to decide a fact, and leave the consequences where they belong. If you find from the evidence that the definition I have given you of murder in the first degree has been sustained, it is your duty to say that this man is guilty of murder in the first degree, and leave to the law all that follows; you have no concern with the consequences except as a general part of the community in which you live, which community has made the law and fixed the penalty. So, if you are satisfied that the offense was only murder in the second degree, you have nothing to do with the consequences. Just find the fact; and if, after all your best efforts to arrive at some satisfactory conclusion, you are still in doubt, then it is my duty to say to you that the prisoner is entitled to that doubt, and you should acquit him.

It is proper, however, that I should give you some instructions as to the kind of doubt which inures to the benefit of one accused of crime. It is not a mere speculative doubt; you are not permitted to seek for doubt; you are neither allowed to nourish a doubt for the mere purpose of acquittal, nor to find something to hang a doubt on. It is your duty to make an earnest effort to come to a satisfactory conclusion. The law does not require that you should find a fact to be absolutely certain; reasonable certainty is all that the law requires. There are no subjects worthy of investigation that are not surrounded with some doubt. Very many questions are more or less doubtful; but it is the reasonable, the fair, the honest doubt that inures to the benefit of the defendant. That is to say, if, after you have heard and carefully considered all the evidence with all your best efforts to overcome the difficulties that arise in your minds, you still find yourselves unable to do it, honestly unable to do it, then the prisoner is entitled to the benefit of such doubt as that, and he goes free.

The jury ought not to expect the Commonwealth to prove impossibilities, as on of the jurors, when called to take the place that one of you now occupies, said that he would require to see the murder committed, or to hear the testimony of one that he could trust that did see it, before he would be satisfied. The law does not permit such a man to sit upon a jury, for the law does not require that kind of evidence. You must not therefore say: "I doubt because I did not see the crime committed," or because the Commonwealth has not produced somebody who saw the blow struck; that is not the point. You must take all the evidence; and if it points with unerring certainty to the defendant, then you may come to the conclusion that it was he that struck the fatal blow, without having positive and unqualified and absolute proof upon that subject.

In considering the evidence you ought, as far as you can, to endeavor to harmonize it; you should start out with the fair determination to carefully consider all that has been said upon each side, and attribute to the witnesses the credence they are entitled to receive. Of course you will judge of the manner of the witness; you will judge of the motive of the witness, and you will consider whether there are any conflicts between the witnesses; and if you find there are no real conflicts in their testimony, then they are entitled to credence. When you find a conflict in the testimony, one witness testifying one way and another witness testifying another way, then it is for you to say which witness you will believe, finding it impossible to harmonize them. You must not, because one witness swears to one state of facts and another witness when called up testifies to another, and because there is a seeming conflict, say there is a doubt. The law does not permit you to say that; the law requires you to say which witness is entitled to credence, which had the better opportunity to know the facts of which he testifies, which testifies with the most candor; and if you then come to a conclusion that one witness is entitled to more credence than another, you ought to adopt the testimony of that witness and not come to the conclusion, simply because there is an apparent conflict, that the case is too doubtful for you to decide. The law does not permit you to escape the responsibilities of settling disputed facts that way.

It is your duty to arrive at a just conclusion with reasonable certainty from all the evidence. The jury, therefore, should take up the testimony and consider it in an orderly, calm, systematic manner. A little system is necessary in all cases where an important matter is to be performed. You should therefore first direct your attention to the primary question in the case, Was John Sharpless murdered? or was his death the result of accident? That is the first question. I will advise you when you go out to take up that question first. It seems to me that you may find, without doing violence to your conscience, that John Sharpless was murdered.

Now, while speaking upon the subject of doubts, there is a possibility, perhaps, that he was not murdered. There is a possibility that he may have fallen in a fit, that he may have struck his head, and that the horse may have trodden upon him, or kicked him, while down; but you see it will not do for the jury to indulge in these speculative doubts; the law does not recognize them; you are to decide according to the weight of the evidence. It seems to me, therefore, that you may find that John Sharpless was murdered. You will remember, while considering this question, that he was inveigled from his house; that he was taken from his fireside at night for some purpose, and that he was never seen alive afterward by any of the members of his family; that he was, when last seen, in the company of a person, the one who induced him to leave his house, and that he was found in his stable, where he started to go to get a rope, dead, with two wounds on his head, one of which had fractured the skull; that he was found lying upon his back, not with his head from the horses, where it would probably have been if he had been kicked, but with his head toward the horses, his feet the other way and his hands lying at rest upon his body, with one leg a little raised. The evidence, therefore, it seems to me—but the evidence is for you—is sufficient for you to settle the first question, that John Sharpless was murdered.

Then comes the second question, By whom was he murdered? Here is where, perhaps, you will have your greatest difficulty. The Commonwealth says: "By the prisoner." The defendant denies it. That is the great issue for the jury. If you find on the first question that he was murdered, you have gotten over one difficulty; but the great one will be, By whom was the deed committed?

[You have heard the evidence of the Commonwealth, and it seems to point to this defendant as the man who committed the crime; but it will be for you to say whether the index is sufficiently certain to warrant you in a conviction. I say, the evidence seems to point to this defendant as the murderer; it undoubtedly does.] Fifth assignment of error.

Whether the evidence is sufficient to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt that he is the guilty man is a question entirely for the jury. I do not intend, if I can avoid it, to give you the slightest intimation of my own judgment, after hearing the testimony, as to what your verdict should be; and if I did, you would not be bound by it. If I were to tell you that I believed the man innocent, you would have no right to take that as having any weight upon you whatever; and if I were to say to you that he was guilty, it ought not to have any effect upon your minds. You are the ones to take the responsibility of settling that question. I have not been sworn to decide that; you have.

In considering, therefore, the evidence adduced by the Commonwealth, and the answering of that evidence by the defendant, if you shall come to the conclusion that this man is the murderer, then your next great question will be, What is the degree? Is the man guilty of murder in the first or in the second degree? And as I said to you a moment ago, if you find that the killing was committed, not in an attempt to perpetrate a robbery, and that when the blow was struck only great bodily harm or some other ulterior object was in view, then it is murder in the second degree; but if the blow was struck in an attempt to rob, then, whether the intention was to absolutely kill the man or only to do him great bodily harm, the offense is murder in the first degree.

Now, was the man killed in an attempt to rob? Here is one of the weak points in the Commonwealth's case; there is no evidence of any robbery; there is no evidence that the dead man's clothing was interfered with; there is no evidence that any money was in his pockets or that any money was taken from him. I confess I was somewhat surprised at this lack of testimony. No one has been called to state whether John Sharpless had any money with him when he left the house or that any money was found upon his person after he was murdered. This fact will have an important bearing upon the question of the degree of the murder, and it is proper you should understand it; for I say to you, you have the power either to find this man guilty of murder in the first or in the second degree; but of course you ought not to exercise this power of finding him guilty in the second degree unless his offense does not rise higher than murder in the second degree. If you find that when that blow was struck he was making an attempt to rob, it does not matter what his intentions were when he went there. He may have intended to rob; but at the time that the blow was struck, was it struck for the purpose of robbing the man? Robbery in law is a personal attack upon a man to deprive him of property then upon his person, by actual violence or putting him in fear. That is robbery in law. I think I have said enough upon this subject for the jury to understand it, therefore we will go on to the next question.

If you find, as I stated before, that the man was killed and that the defendant killed him, and that he killed him while attempting to rob him, then he is guilty of murder in the first degree. If you find that the man was killed, and that the defendant killed him for any other purpose than that of robbing him, and that at the time the blow was struck it was struck without any intention to kill, but only to do him great personal harm, then the offense would be murder in the second degree, and, as I before stated, the question of degree is for the jury. Therefore, I say to you that under all the evidence you may either convict this man of murder in the first degree or in the second degree, or you may find him not guilty.

Now, to assist you in grappling with the important facts in this case, but without making a close analysis of the testimony, I will call your attention briefly to the testimony of the several witnesses who have been called and examined before you. I will give you a mere synopsis of their testimony. I do this more for the purpose of assisting your memories than for any other object. You are required by law to find the facts from the testimony, and you are not permitted to have the notes of the court or of the phonographer before you; and it is therefore proper that your memories should be assisted as far as possible by the court, as to what the witnesses said when examined.

Courts are in the habit of grappling with difficulties, and we get into a natural habit of associating ideas to assist memory; not from any innate power, but from the habit of constantly dealing with these questions, we can remember important points better than jurors, and to a certain extent this is the result as before mentioned of an association of ideas. If you see the man before and after he has testified, you naturally remember what was said; but if you can't remember the witness' name or appearance, you will probably not remember anything the witness has said. Therefore, I shall merely give you a list of the witnesses and a brief review of what they said:

No doubt you remember the first witness who was called, Mr. Hall; now merely naming the witness will probably be enough to recall to you what he testified to; he was called simply to prove the map and the plan. That plan you may take out.

The next witness called was the warden or keeper of the jail, Mr. Baker; he testified that the defendant's personal appearance now is not what it was when he first came to jail; he says that his beard was more stubby; he also testified that prisoners have the opportunity once a week to shave; at a subsequent stage of the proceedings he was called again, and testified as to the mumbling manner in which the defendant spoke, and said it was no uncommon thing for the defendant to show his teeth while speaking, and that they had the appearance of being somewhat prominent; that is the substance of Mr. Baker's testimony.

The next witness called was Joseph E. Mickle; no doubt you remember him; he was the neighbor who was sent for by Jane Pratt; he tells you what took place when he arrived and what he found; he is corroborated by the fourth witness, his brother, William Mickle.

The principal witness in the case, and one perhaps without whose testimony this defendant could not be convicted, was Alexander Pritchett, and to his testimony your closest attention ought to be directed. You should examine it well, because, if you believe Alexander Pritchett, then the defendant may be found guilty of the crime of murder; it would not be a conviction upon circumstantial evidence at all; it would be positive, upon the confession of the defendant. You will remember what the testimony of this man Pritchett was; he says he was a fellow prisoner in Moyamensing with the defendant; that he was at that time in jail for assault and battery; that he was constantly in contact during the day with the prisoner; that they were both runners; that they became rather familiar and talked about what they intended to do when they got out; that the prisoner said he wanted to have a good time after he got out of jail, and Pritchett says he told him that New York was the place to have a good time, but that it cost a good deal of money to have it there; he says the defendant told him he knew where he could get a stake of $200 or $300, and said that as soon as he got out he was going to get it, and that they would go to New York and have a good time together. Pritchett tells you he was discharged on the 22d of October, and that the prisoner at the bar was not discharged until the 20th of the following November; he tells you that shortly after his discharge—I think it was on the same day, that will be for you—he met him upon Lombard Street; he tells you how he was dressed, and that he then told him he could get that stake down near Chester and that he was going after it; he says he saw him the next day, Saturday, which would be the 21st of November, in the evening about 6 o'clock, at Seventh and Lombard, and that the next Thursday he saw him again. Upon the next Thursday he says the defendant told him that he did not succeed in getting the stake, and he told him that he had to knock an old fellow in the head about two miles from Chester. Pritchett says he said to him "Did you?" He says that he answered "Yes," but that he only got $6. Pritchett then said: "Are you the man that went to ask for the rope?" and he said "Yes." "You were the man with the white handkerchief around your neck?" and he said "Yes. Did you read that in the papers?" and he said he did. Afterward, when asked about it, he said he heard it from those that had read it. Pritchett then said, "Do you know you killed that man?" and the prisoner replied, "Yes, but don't say anything about it." He said, "Then don't say anything more to me about it." Pritchett said the prisoner told him he only got $6, and then had $2 in his pocket. The third Saturday after this he says he met him again and asked the name of the man that he knocked in the head, and he told him it was Sharpless; that on the 28th of November, Pritchett says he informed the police.

Now that is the substance of Pritchett's testimony.

Of course I have not given all the details, but that is the substance of it. Now, you saw the witness, you heard the cross examination, and you have heard the other corroborating testimony, and it will be for you to say whether you believe him. If it is true, then the evidence is sufficient to convict this man; but if you do not believe it, you may acquit him. No witness has been called who has said upon his oath that Pritchett is a man unworthy of belief. In law every man who testifies under the sanction of an oath is prima facie entitled to credence. There are several ways, permitted by the law, to discredit a witness. The most familiar way is to call those acquainted with him, and let them say whether they know the man, and whether they know others who know him, and what his reputation is for truth and veracity. The mere fact that he has been convicted of assault and battery is not sufficient to throw discredit upon him as a witness. If a witness is convicted of a felony, it sometimes is sufficient; but the mere fact that he is now under arrest for robbery is not in itself sufficient to discredit him; for the law presumes him to be innocent until he is proven guilty. You may, however, consider all the facts—the fact that he was in jail, the fact that he is now under arrest—as that may influence you with the other testimony in the case in rejecting his story. So you may believe or disbelieve him; but as a rule a witness is entitled to belief unless some good reason be given for discrediting him.

Now, of course, you will give the defendant credit for his inability to procure witnesses; you will remember that he has been in jail, and that he is poor and friendless, to a certain extent, and that while no witness has been called to discredit the credibility of Pritchett, it may be that if the prisoner had the means, he could, perhaps, have procured some witnesses upon that subject. I only call your attention to the fact that it has not been done; and at the same time that the defendant was in actual custody, and, of course, could not procure witnesses with the same ease that the Commonwealth could.

If you believe the testimony of Pritchett, it would seem that the defendant is guilty of the murder of John Sharpless. If you do not believe the testimony of Pritchett, then there is sufficient, it seems to me, to warrant you in saying he is not. And you will, of course, endeavor to ascertain whether Pritchett has been corroborated; whether he has been contradicted in any material misstatement, whether he has prevaricated. You will call to your mind his manner of testifying, and upon this most vital testimony you ought to carefully deliberate. He certainly has been corroborated as to all that he has testified to as having taken place while they were both in Moyamensing, except as to the conversations. He was what he testified to, a runner, and the defendant was a runner; they were frequently together; they occupied the same cell during their leisure hours; that has been proved by Mr. — (Mr. Baker: "Mr. Livingstone,") Mr. Livingstone. To a certain extent he is corroborated as to what took place after he got out of prison also. He tells you where he went and where the defendant went; that they visited the girls and went to different places together; and this does not seem to be contradicted by the defendant's witnesses and is to a certain extent corroborated.

The next witness called was George Yorke; he tells you that the defendant came to his place on Friday evening at 7 o'clock (and he describes his dress) and that the defendant told him he was going into the country to hunt work; and that he slept upon his floor that night and left next morning at 8 o'clock; that was Saturday morning; he says he saw him the next Wednesday, and that he said he had been husking corn, and said that he had heard a touch of the murder, and that people were mean enough now to do anything. That is the substance of Yorke's testimony.

[The defendant has been able to account satisfactorily for where he was from the time he got out of jail up to 10 o'clock on Saturday morning—(Mr. Baker: "Sunday morning"). And up to 2 o'clock the next morning. Between those two periods there is a bad break, and it was between these two periods of time that John Sharpless was killed. He has not been able to tell us where he was that night. That is the unfortunate part of his case.] Sixth assignment of error.

The next witness is Annie Yorke. She was the wife of George Yorke and simply corroborated him as far as she could. The Commonwealth then called the reputed wife of the defendant, and the judge felt it to be his duty, under the law and under the evidence, to exclude that witness. Now I want to warn you against giving any weight to any intimations made as to what that witness would have testified to. You must banish it from your minds. She was the wife of the defendant, and she could not testify against him; the law prohibits it; and you must not allow your minds to be in the slightest degree affected by the reference which has been made to the affidavit by Mr. Norris; he tells you that he procured the affidavit, read it to the defendant and asked him to explain it. You must not allow yourselves to give any weight whatever to what the woman swore to in her affidavit, or what she would have testified to. Nor are you to supply in your minds what you suppose the woman would have sworn to; her testimony is ruled out, and it is to have no weight whatever in settling this issue.

[The next witness called was Charles Stephens. His testimony was important. You will remember the witness. He tells you that between 1 and 2 o'clock on Monday morning, the murder having been committed between 9 and 10 o'clock on Sunday night, some five or six hours after the commission of this terrible crime, that this defendant came to his house, cold, shivering and muddy, and desired shelter.] Seventh assignment of error.

He says he let him in and gave him a quilt, and that he set him in a chair by the fire. He says that the man shivered and shook and groaned all night. He also says that the defendant told his wife in his hearing that he had been sleeping in barns and outbuildings, and that he had caught a terrible cold, and that he had seen Sharpless' barn burned. He called it Sharpless' barn; he said that it lighted up the whole country round. Now that is very important testimony, and when compared with Pritchett's, it has an undoubted bearing upon the case. If it is true, it would indicate that this defendant was in the vicinity of this murdered man's house at that time, for, at a quarter to 11, Mr. Lindsay tells you he was awakened because of his burning barn; and if the witness, Stephens, tells the truth, the defendant saw the light of the flames of that burning barn. Now, remember, I do not pretend to give every word these witnesses say. I am only recalling to your minds the important parts of their testimony; and if I leave anything unsaid, and you remember anything that the witnesses have said having a bearing upon the case, give it due weight.

The next witness called was Daniel Livingstone, the keeper of the jail, who tells you that Pritchett and the prisoner were friends, that they were in the same cell together in the daytime; and he tells you the kind of clothes the prisoner had on when he left the jail on Friday, and that is about all he knows of the case; he tells you that he was dressed in a dark suit, frock coat, and he recognized the coat so far as to say that it looks like the coat he gave him.

The next most important witness in the case, important for the defendant, as well as for the plaintiff, is Susan Sharpless, the widow of the murdered man; and to my mind her testimony is inclined to cast more doubt upon the Commonwealth's case than that of any other witness. She was present when the alleged murderer entered the house; she was in a state of excitement and fear, lest something had happened to her husband; and one would think that she would never forget the face of the man she supposed was his murderer, as she saw it that night. She tells you she was near enough to put her hands on him. After closely examining this man she is in doubt. She says she cannot say that this is the man that was in her house that night. She tells you that his voice is similar, but that he has not got the nose and teeth. The nose she says is something like his, but the teeth she says are not the same as she saw them that night, and she says she will never forget those teeth. You will take her testimony with the other testimony in the case, and if its effect is to cause you to fairly doubt whether this is the man who murdered John Sharpless, he is entitled to the benefit of it. She gives you a description of the knock at her husband's door at half past 8 in the evening; she tells you how the man stood with his arms close to his side, of his stealthy entrance, of his mumbling voice, and, what she particularly noticed, his teeth. The district attorney alleges that this man has prominent teeth; but it seems to me that the evidence upon that subject does not comport with Mrs. Sharpless' description of the appearance of the man. Unless, therefore, there was some attempt to disguise, her testimony, as I before stated, is the most important, to my mind, for the defendant.

Jane Pratt was called next. She said that John Sharpless told her that the man who called him out was a white man; but she says when she went out to talk to the man she found he was a black man. You will remember that the man was not in the full rays of the light from the house; as I understand it he was on the porch, or the vestibule, and when she spoke to him she had the impression that he was a white man from what John Sharpless had told her, but his appearance was sufficient to overcome that impression, and she found he was a black man; and her testimony as to his color has great weight, especially when Mrs. Sharpless tells you that the man who entered the house was a black man, and she says he was about the color of this man. Now you will give to that expression of John Sharpless whatever weight it is entitled to. He said, undoubtedly, that the man who called him out was a white man, and you have the evidence of his wife and that of Jane Pratt that he was a black man. Mrs. Sharpless also fixes the time when Jane Pratt left the house to hunt for her husband; it was 9.04. It appears that one of the windows was open, and Jane tells you that after she had been down to the road, which took her perhaps four or five minutes, she looked in at the window and saw Mrs. Sharpless walking around the table; so you may find that that was the time that the man was confronting Mrs. Sharpless, about 9.04; that was about the time the man left the house. The theory of the district attorney is that when the murderer came from the barn he looked in at the window and saw that one of the women was missing; he supposes that the defendant also looked in at the window before, and that he had taken Jane Pratt to be a girl; she was small and had something of the appearance of a girl; and when he came into the house and found that the one he had previously seen through the window was not there, he thought she had gone to give the alarm, and that is the reason he asked: "Where is the girl?" That is the theory of the district attorney, that when the man demanded, "Where is the girl?" he meant Jane Pratt; and when he found she was not there, he supposed she had left for the purpose of giving the alarm, and that that is the reason that no further felony was perpetrated. Take that for what it is worth. But it is somewhat singular that a man should be murdered, and his person not robbed and no attempt made to rob the house, if that was the intention of the murderer. Now give this theory of the district attorney whatever weight it is entitled to, as applied to the evidence. If it is reasonably consistent with the evidence, adopt it; if not, reject it.

Lydia Reynolds says that her eyesight is not good; her testimony corroborates Jane Pratt and Mrs. Sharpless. She says she thinks there is a similarity between the voice of the defendant and the voice of the man as she heard it that night.

John Lindsay's testimony is important. It is important for the defendant as well as for the Commonwealth. He tells you that his barn was burned that night; that he went to bed at 10 o'clock, and that at a quarter of 11 he was awakened by his barn burning, and that he supposes the barn had been burning for some time. He also tells you that he knew the defendant, and that he believes that John Sharpless knew him, as he had sent this defendant over there upon errands. Now you can take that testimony, and if it has caused you to doubt whether this man was the man that murdered John Sharpless, he is entitled to the benefit of it. Unless he disguised himself, the presumption is that John Sharpless would know him. This may have been his reason for calling the man out, so that he might rob him there, out in the dark, and enter the house afterward. But the presumption is that he would not go to the house of a man that he knew without being disguised; and there is no evidence that he was disguised. The fact that he had a white handkerchief around his neck is not evidence that he was disguised. Neither Susan Sharpless nor Jane Pratt says that he was disguised. If he knew John Sharpless, and Mr. Lindsay says that he thinks that he did, you should give that due weight in considering the case.

Walter Lindsay's testimony merely corroborates his father.

[Then comes the testimony of another very important witness—to my mind one of the most important witnesses in the case—Mr. Lewis Morris Lewis. He lives in Upper Darby. One week after this murder, his house was entered by somebody, and among other things taken he missed a coat, and found a coat which was left there. The coat he missed was found in the apartment of the defendant, and the coat he found is identified as looking like the coat that Mr. Livingstone gave to the defendant when discharged from jail a week or so before; and it is also identified as looking like the coat that Mrs. Sharpless says the man had upon his back the night of the murder. I look upon this testimony of Lewis M. Lewis as very important. Undoubtedly, if the coat that is produced is the coat that was worn by the man who stood in the presence of Mrs. Sharpless, then that coat would seem to be sufficiently traced to the defendant The defendant, when asked to explain this difficulty, said that he had bought the coat that had been taken from Mr. Lewis from a tramp; and when he was asked how he came to be possessed of the spirit level, he said he had found it upon the street. He was not asked how he came to be possessed of the other articles, but that excuse is too flimsy to be believed; it is not sufficient, to my mind, to raise a reasonable doubt. It seems to me there is evidence from which you may find that this defendant left the coat which is produced here, and identified by Mr. Livingstone and by Mrs. Sharpless, at Mr. Lewis', and took Mr. Lewis' coat with him, and at the same time took the other articles found in his room]. Ninth assignment of error.

I say to you, that in my opinion Mr. Lewis' testimony has a bearing upon the general question as well as upon this particular part. It is very important, and it ought to be given due weight.

The next witness was Dr. Frank Rowland. He made the post mortem examination, and has described to you the character of the wounds upon the murdered man. He tells you that either might have produced death, but that the one upon the side of the head was the immediate cause of the death of John Sharpless, and was produced by some heavy, blunt instrument, like a hatchet. In his judgment, the one upon the top of the head, on the occipital bone, was made by a sharp instrument, looking as if the one was made by the sharp part of the hatchet, and the second by the poll; but no hatchet has been found, and there is no positive evidence how or with what instrument the blow was inflicted; it might have been done with the heel of a boot.

[Next comes the testimony of William Hahn. If the jury believe this witness, and I can see no reason why they should not, they will come to the conclusion that the negro man who called at his stand early on Monday morning, before it was known in Philadelphia that this murder had been committed, because the details were not telegraphed to Philadelphia until 10.30, was the murderer of John Sharpless; for at 8 or 8.30 in the morning, two hours before the associated press received the news from Chester, a colored man came to his stand and asked for a paper giving an account of the murder near Chester. I say to you that the jury may come to the conclusion, without much hesitation, that the man who asked for that paper, whoever he was, was the murderer of John Sharpless]. Eighth assignment of error.

He was, in all probability, the man who committed the deed. That would seem to indicate that it was a colored man and not a white man. As to the identity of this man, it is not by any means satisfactory. He says that in general appearance the prisoner looks like him; he tells you how he was dressed; but he says he thinks the man had broader shoulders; he says he was the same color. He looked at the coat and said it was similar. You can take the testimony of that witness and fit it with the other testimony, and then form your conclusions from the whole.

The next witness called tells you that he is the agent for the associated press in Chester. By this association all the newspapers, he says, have an arrangement among themselves by which any item of news is distributed among all the papers belonging to the association, and most of the papers belong to it. He says that he is the agent in Chester and that it was 10.30 Monday morning when he sent the dispatch.

Morris Landauer, a reporter, says it did not appear in the Philadelphia morning papers, and that it was not known to the press.

Chief of Police Williamson, however, says that he telegraphed to Philadelphia at 2.13 in the morning that a murder had been committed, but it appears that it did not get into the papers.

Then comes Thomas Alexander. His testimony is only important as bearing upon the manner in which the man was dressed. He corroborates the other witnesses as to his dress and the finding of the spirit level, and as to what was said by the defendant about the coat. It is very important as bearing upon that point.

Chief Williamson's testimony was directed to the time he sent the despatch. My recollection is that it was 2.20 in the morning.

The testimony of James McKniff is not important.

The testimony of Carrie Lane has a considerable bearing upon the case. She tells you that she has rooms to let, and that the wife, or the alleged wife, of the defendant, secured a room there for herself and her husband, and that the coat found there and the other articles were the property of the defendant, and in that respect her testimony is important.

Then comes the testimony of John Norris, one of the editors of The Philadelphia Record, who is evidently a gentleman of more than ordinary intelligence and of apparent candor. He seems to have exercised more than ordinary energy in endeavoring to ferret out this murder. He is to be commended for that, not condemned. He tells you that the press gave, after the details of the murder had been worked up as far as they could, $125 to Detective Alexander to defray the actual expenses incurred. There was nothing wrong in that. That money was paid; it was not demanded. It was given to cover incidental expenses incurred in working up the case. He also tells you that he had several conversations with this defendant, which he recounted here yesterday. He tells you that some of the efforts of the defendant to explain away inconsistencies were failures. He tells you that after a long conversation, calling the defendant's attention to inaccuracies and inconsistencies, the defendant finally said when his attention was called to what his wife had said (to this you will, of course, pay no attention except so far as the answers are concerned), he said it was only a pack of lies, and that he supposed he would be tried and reckoned he would be hung for it. That is what he said. You can say what bearing that might have upon the case. Witness also states that he walked over the ground from the place where the defendant arrived at Stephens' house to the Sharpless barn, and he says he walked it in three hours and forty minutes. In this he is corroborated by Lieutenant Roche and Mr. Curley, and this is all the testimony of the Commonwealth.

I have called your attention to the witnesses now, and given you a synopsis of their testimony. If I have left untouched any material point, the jury can remember it, and, of course, supply it. My object in calling your attention to these witnesses is to strengthen your memory, because upon the testimony you are to decide the case. I have no doubt you will now remember sufficiently all the important points in the case.

Now as to the defense. The defendant alleges that there is a mistaken identity here, and that the witnesses that have been produced against him, Pritchett and Stephens, are actuated by a malicious desire to get him out of the way. He says that Pritchett is anxious to get him out of the way in order to get the reward, and that is the object he has. He says his wife is anxious to get rid of him that she may live with another man, and that she may not be liable for prosecution for adultery while she is with him; and that Stephens wishes it so that he may live with his wife. That is the defense. He also relies upon the failure of Mrs. Sharpless to identify him, and lays great stress upon the fact that John Sharpless said that it was a white man, and it is apparent that the defendant is not a white man. The testimony of Elijah Yorke, Mrs. Simmons, Lydia Fitzgerald, and Benjamin White are not important, except to corroborate some of his statements, and to explain some inconsistencies in what he had said to Mr. Norris. But upon the whole, their testimony corroborates one side about as much as the other.

I have no doubt the girls all tell the truth. There is nothing inconsistent with their testimony and that of the Commonwealth. You can easily harmonize all the testimony produced upon the part of the defendant with that on the part of the Commonwealth, without perjury in any witness.

We have also John C. Lindsay; as I before stated, he informed you that in his judgment John Sharpless knew this man; and that is an important part of the case. Now I am about to leave the case with you, and I have no doubt that after you have carefully considered all the evidence, you will be able to come to a satisfactory conclusion. As I before stated, you must not try to please the people; you must not find the defendant guilty because you think it will be acceptable and agreeable to a great majority of the people of Delaware County to see some victim suffer for this crime. If the defendant is found guilty, it must be because from all the evidence you consider him guilty; and it seems to me under all the evidence that you may find him guilty or you may find him not guilty; you may find him guilty of murder in the first degree, or you may find him guilty of murder in the second degree. With these remarks I leave the case with you entirely. We have done our part and you must now do yours. Do it conscientiously, and the court will be satisfied with your verdict.

The jury found the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendant was sentenced to be hanged.

Messrs. John B. Robinson and James S. Cummins, for plaintiff in error:

It was error to admit testimony that a spirit level and a coat were taken from Mr. Lewis' house, and another coat left there, by the person who took the coat, because it was not shown by any witness that the coat found there belonged to Samuel Johnson; nor was it proven that it was the same coat that the man had on that was at John Sharpless' on the night of the murder.

To make one criminal act evidence of another, a connection between them must have existed in the mind of the actor, linking them together for some purpose he intended to accomplish; or it must be necessary to identify the person of the actor, by a connection which shows that he who committed the one must have done the other.

Shaffner v. Commonwealth, 72 Pa. 60; Goersen v. Commonwealth, 99 Pa. 398.

This evidence should not have been admitted until it was first shown that the coat was the one the man had on who stood in the presence of Mrs. Sharpless on the night of this murder.

Zell v. Commonwealth, 94 Pa. 258.

The district attorney ordered the prisoner to stand up. "Johnson, stand up." "The prisoner is asked to open his mouth," "to repeat certain words and sentences."

No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.

Sec. 9, Declaration of Rights, Constitution of Pennsylvania.

The identification of the prisoner did not follow, but the evidence had that trend, and was prejudicial and unlawful.

The constitutional guarantee "closes the mouth" of a prisoner in a criminal case, unless when under the sanctions of the Act of 1885, P. L. 23, he chooses to open it; and it is error, we respectfully contend, even in the absence of objection by counsel. This point is one never reviewed before, we believe, in the supreme court of this State, but is covered in the following authorities:

State v. Jacobs, 5 Jones, Law (N. C.) 259; Day v. State, 63 Ga. 669; People v. Mead, 50 Mich. 228; 6 Am. Crim. Law Mag. 810.

A defendant in a criminal charge cannot be compelled to produce a private paper which would be evidence against him on his trial.

There is no difference in the principle between this protection and the shield of the Constitution, which protects his person from being indecorously inspected.

People v. McCoy, 45 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 216.

The true intent of the constitutional guarantee, which we invoke, is that the accused in a criminal trial should not only have the right to close his mouth, but he could fold his arms and refuse to be a witness against himself in any sense, or to any extent, by furnishing or giving evidence against himself, whether by testimony under oath or affirmation, or confessions or admissions without either, or by proof of a physical nature.

No consent of the prisoner in the extremity of his need ought to bind him.

Prine v. Commonwealth, 18 Pa. 103; Peiffer v. Commonwealth, 15 Pa. 470; Rex v. Woolf, 1 Chitty, Rep. 401.

In Stokes v. State, 30 Am. Rep. 72, the court held that an accused person, in the presence of the jury, should not be asked to make evidence against himself. This is a case where a criminal defendant was called on to make tracks in court in a pan of soft mud brought in for the purpose and in the presence of the jury.

The prohibition of the Act of 1885 does not apply merely to the address made in summing up. The law strictly enjoins against any comment or reference during the trial. There would be no force or benefit in the very stringent prohibitory words used, if it only applied to the summing up by counsel.

Commonwealth v. Brown, 16 W. N. C. 557.

When the court said, "I say the evidence seems to point to this defendant as the murderer; it undoubtedly does," the court went a step farther than is warranted by any decision that we have been able to find. If this were a civil case, this language would come almost up to the point of a binding instruction, and is, in fact, deciding on the weight of the evidence, which the court must not do.

Elkins v. McKean, 79 Pa. 493.

The court erred in charging the jury: "The defendant has been able to account satisfactorily for where he was from the time he got out of jail up to 10 o'clock Saturday morning (Mr. Baker: "Sunday morning") and up to 2 o'clock the next morning. Between those two periods there is a bad break, and it is between those two periods of time that John Sharpless was killed. He has not been able to tell us where he was that night; that is the unfortunate part of his case." The expression of the opinion of the learned court to the jury, that there is a bad break in the prisoner's case, when the burden was upon the Commonwealth to show where he was, deprived the defendant of his only defense. The burden of proof never shifts, but rests upon the prosecution throughout.

Turner v. Commonwealth, 86 Pa. 54.

As to the effect of unfriendly comment destroying defendant's defense, see:

Pannell v. Commonwealth, 86 Pa. 266; Commonwealth v. Brown, 16 W. N. C. 557; State v. O'Connor, 27 Am. Rep. 291.

A misstatement by the judge in his charge, of any of the evidence, is error.

Goersen v. Commonwealth, 99 Pa. 388.

Where the language of the charge as to the true character of testimony tends to mislead the jury, it is error.

Fawcett v. Fawcett, 95 Pa. 376; Elkins v. McKean, 29 Pa. 493.

In Velott v. Lewis, 102 Pa. 334, Mr. Justice Gordon says, in commenting upon irrelevant testimony: "The case ought not to have been incumbered by evidence of this kind. But its very admission by the court gave it an appearance of importance to the jury."

In capital felonies it must appear by the record that the prisoner was present at the trial, verdict, and passing of sentence; his presence cannot be presumed.

Dougherty v. Commonwealth, 69 Pa. 286; Hamilton v. Commonwealth, 16 Pa. 129; Prine v. Commonwealth, 18 Pa. 104.

The Act of 1718 is the groundwork of our criminal law, and is still in force.

Dunn v. Commonwealth, 6 Pa. 384.

Mr. Jesse M. Baker, Dist. Atty., for the Commonwealth, defendant in error:

Evidence, however slight, which tends to corroborate the testimony as to the res gestæ will not be considered incompetent.

Moyer v. Commonwealth, 39 Legal Int. 160; McConkey v. Commonwealth, 40 Legal Int. 102.

This court must look at the real competency of the evidence and not at the order of its reception. When it is found that the evidence is all finally competent, it will not reverse because of the time or order of its introduction.

Curley v. Commonwealth, 84 Pa. 152.

The permission of the court to call on the prisoner to stand up, etc., was not error. The prisoner voluntarily exhibited himself to the witness for identification. After carefully examining him, the witness failed to identify him. His counsel then considered it a strong point in his favor. The jury were so instructed by the court. As he did not see proper to object then it is too late to object now.

Fife v. Commonwealth, 29 Pa. 429; People v. Thompson, 41 N.Y. 6; People v. Casey, 72 N.Y. 399; Connors v. People, 50 N.Y. 240; Brotherton v. People, 75 N. Y. 159; People v. Guidice, (N.Y.) 1 Cent. Rep. 721.

It is enough if the court respond to all objections to testimony taken by either party and give the proper instructions to the jury. A verdict will not be set aside because improper evidence was admitted, if no objection to its admission was made at the trial.

1 Whart. C. L. Motions for New Trial; Wait v. Maxwell, 5 Pick. 217; Den v. Geiger, 4

Halst. Law, 225; Worford v. Isbel, 1 Bibb, 247; Cannon v. Alsbury, 1 A. K. Marsh. 76; Rice v. Bancroft, 11 Pick. 469.

The naked question is now presented whether the defendant can waive an objection, take the chances of a favorable result, and in the event of an adverse verdict secure a new trial.

An error not apparent on the face of the recorded proceedings, however gross and improper it may have been, is not a subject of review here; and the prisoner has no right to expect relief on account of such irregularities.

Jewel v. Commonwealth, 22 Pa. 99; Cathcart v. Commonwealth, 37 Pa. 110.

The right of review is limited by law to points of evidence or law excepted to by the defendants and noted and filed of record by the court.

Fife v. Commonwealth, 29 Pa. 429; Hopkins v. Commonwealth, 50 Pa. 9.

After the admission of evidence without objection, there can be no bill of exceptions to its admission nunc pro tunc.

Robinson v. Snyder, 25 Pa. 207.

Whether the evidence received on part of the plaintiff be legal or not, it was heard without objection, and the court was not asked to say anything about it in the charge.

Robinson v. Snyder, 25 Pa. 207.

The defendant permitted the case to close, and argued upon the effect of what the witness had stated both to the court and to the jury. Having used it for his own purpose, and having taken the chance of influencing the jury by it favorably to himself, he thereby waived his objection and passed his time.

Rees v. Livingston, 41 Pa. 119; McInroy v. Dyer, 47 Pa. 120.

The defendant cannot permit answers which he may now choose to call irregular to go to the jury without objection, and to suit his own purpose at the time of trial, and then claim a new trial upon the ground of its admission.

Commonwealth v. Sullivan, 13 Phila. 418.

A judge may rightfully express his opinion respecting the evidence, and it may sometimes be his duty to do it, yet not so as to withdraw it from the consideration and decision of the jury.

Johnston v. Commonwealth, 85 Pa. 65; Kilpatrick v. Commonwealth, 31 Pa. 216.

If the case were in the least doubtful upon this part of the evidence, or if there had been anything for the jury to hesitate about, there might have been more force in this assignment of error. As it stands, the defendant could not have been injured by that portion of the charge complained of. The charge of the court must be considered as a whole.

Kilpatrick v. Commonwealth, 31 Pa. 216.

The burden was on the prisoner to explain his absence.

In a similar case to this, Commonwealth v. Sheidler, 12 Phila. 590, Judge Ludlow said: "When it is remembered that where an explanation is clearly demanded by the Commonwealth's case, and is not furnished by the defendant, the law raises a presumption against him, how can it be contended that the Act of Assembly destroys the right to refer to this condition of the cause even in figurative language?"

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

In view of the evidence before the jury, it may be safely assumed they had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the killing of John Sharpless was a willful, deliberate and premeditated murder, and also that the perpetrator of the crime was the person who enticed him from the house and shortly afterwards returned thither and demanded money from Mrs. Sharpless.

All the facts and circumstances testified to by those who were present at the time, together with those disclosed by the post mortem examination, point with reasonable certainty to these conclusions. The verdict, based upon such evidence, may therefore be regarded as conclusively establishing the corpus delicti. But, of course, it was incumbent on the Commonwealth to go farther and prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the prisoner was the guilty man. Testimony was accordingly introduced for the purpose of identifying the prisoner, locating him near the scene of the murder about the time it was committed, and proving his own admissions of guilt.

On the subject of identity, the testimony tended to prove that, in general appearance, prominence of front teeth, tone of voice, character of dress, etc., the prisoner resembled the assassin as seen by members of deceased's family on the night of the murder. They represent him as being clad in dark clothing, soft felt hat, long frock coat, white handkerchief around his neck, no overcoat, etc. The hat and coat, as described by them, correspond with those that the keeper of Moyamensing Prison says he gave Johnson upon his discharge therefrom on the preceding Friday morning, and those worn by him during the two next succeeding days.

According to the testimony of Charles Stephens, the prisoner came to his house between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning, three or four hours after the murder—clad in a dark suit of clothes, slouch hat, long coat, and handkerchief around his neck. After remaining a few hours, and warming himself, he left before daylight the same morning; but before leaving he said to Stephens that he had been husking corn down the country and had stopped at places "where he generally lodged and could not get in, and had been recommended to come over to my (his) house to warm himself;" also said "he had seen Sharpless' barn on fire and it lighted up all the woods around; * * * had seen it burning that night when he came past it to come up here." Speaking of the prisoner's condition at that time, the witness says "he was foot sore and sick, and it appeared to me the man had chills; he was shivering and groaning as a sick man would."

The evidence of self criminating admissions is found in the testimony of Alexander Pritchett, who says in substance that he and Johnson, as fellow prisoners in Moyamensing, talked familiarly about what they would do when their respective terms of imprisonment expired. A trip to New York and the expense attending same being suggested, Johnson said he knew where he could get $200 or $300, and when they both got out he would "go down and get that stake, and then" they would go over to New York.

Pritchett was discharged from Moyamensing in October, 1885, and Johnson on Friday, November 20, following. They met that morning, and in course of conversation Johnson said: "I think I can get $200 or $300, about two miles from Chester. * * * I am going down to get it." After remaining together about two hours at that time they separated and met again next evening. Johnson then said "I am going down to get that stake, * * * I don't want to go down before Sunday night and I am going to walk."

Pritchett also testified that at their next interview on following Thursday, Johnson said, "I didn't get what I went for, and I had to knock an old fellow in the head down here about two miles from Chester, * * * and I got only $6." At a subsequent interview, three weeks afterwards, Johnson said the name of the man he had knocked in the head was Sharpless.

All the evidence, direct and circumstantial, bearing on the subjects thus briefly adverted to, was competent and proper for the consideration of the jury. It was fairly submitted to them in a clear and comprehensive charge, of which the prisoner has no reason to complain. The credibility of the witnesses was solely for the jury. If they believed that Pritchett testified truthfully as to the prisoner's self criminating admissions, and that those admissions were not a tissue of willful falsehoods uttered by the latter, they were warranted, especially in view of other corroborating evidence, in rendering the verdict they did.

The case of the Commonwealth did not rest upon the testimony of Pritchett alone. The evidence as to the prisoner's identity, his whereabouts at the time of the murder, etc., tended in no small degree to corroborate the truth of the admissions testified to by Pritchett. One of the most damaging circumstances in the case was the fact referred to by the learned judge in his charge, viz.: that while the prisoner's whereabouts was satisfactorily accounted for from the time he left Moyamensing on Friday morning until about 10 o'clock Sunday morning, and then from between 1 and 2 o'clock that night until he was arrested, the gap between Sunday forenoon and midnight was not accounted for, except by his own admission to Stephens, and that tended to locate him at or near the scene of the murder about the time it was committed. One of his own witnesses, Benjamin White, testified he saw him at 10 o'clock Sunday morning, and that night shortly after midnight, he went to Stephens' house for shelter and told the story of his having been down the country husking corn and having seen the burning barn on his way up.

The theory of the Commonwealth was that the prisoner set out on a mission of robbery Sunday forenoon, went to the house of Mr. Sharpless that night, enticed him therefrom and murdered him, and went thence to the house of Charles Stephens where he arrived between 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning. The evidence in support of this theory was both direct and circumstantial. If the jury believed, as they doubtless did, that all the facts and circumstances, as they found them, pointed clearly and satisfactorily to that conclusion, and were at the same time irreconcilable with any other reasonable hypothesis, arising out of the evidence, they could not consistently do otherwise than find him guilty; and their verdict should not be disturbed, unless the learned judge erred in one or more of the particulars specified in the assignments of error.

The first and fourth specifications, relating to the testimony of Lewis Morris Lewis, may be considered together. The evidence therein complained of was not introduced for the purpose of showing that the prisoner was guilty of a distinct and independent crime, but as a link in the chain of evidence tending to prove his identity. It is never irrelevant to give in evidence any circumstance which tends to make the proposition at issue more or less probable; nor is it necessary to offer at once all the circumstances necessary to prove such proposition. The party seeking to prove or disprove it may proceed step by step, offering link by link. Whatever is a condition, either of the existence or nonexistence of a relevant hypothesis, may be thus shown. No matter how slight may be the inference of identity to be drawn from any single fact, it is admissible as a fragment of the material from which the induction is to be made. Whart. Ev. §§ 21, 24, and authorities there cited.

Mrs. Sharpless had testified, inter alia, that the man she confronted, on the night of the murder, wore a dark frock coat, "of pretty good length," etc., corresponding to the one exhibited in court. The testimony of the keeper of Moyamensing Prison was that when Johnson was discharged on November 20, he gave him "a pair of black pants, a long dark coat," similar to the coat shown him in court and referred to by Mrs. Sharpless. It was important, therefore, for the Commonwealth to show where the coat thus exhibited to these witnesses came from, and if possible connect the prisoner with its possession. For that purpose the testimony of Lewis, in connection with that of officer Anderson was relevant. The latter testified that in the house where prisoner lived when arrested he found two coats, claimed by him, one of which he said he had bought from a tramp in West Philadelphia; also a spirit level which he said he had found on the street. The coat, which he alleged he had bought from the tramp, spirit level, and other articles, found in his possession, were identified by Lewis as his property, taken by some one from his house shortly after the murder. He also identified the coat—exhibited in court and referred to by Mrs. Sharpless and Livingstone, the keeper of Moyamensing—as the coat left at his house at the time his own coat, spirit level, and other articles, were taken.

The tendency of this evidence was to trace into the prisoner's possession the coat thus identified by Lewis. In the absence of satisfactory explanation as to how he acquired Lewis' property, the fact that these articles were found in his possession, and were claimed by him, warranted the inference that he probably took them away, and at the same time left the long frock coat in question. The evidence, it is true, was purely circumstantial, and in itself perhaps not very strong; but it was nevertheless relevant and proper for the consideration of the jury in connection with other facts and circumstances tending to prove the identity of the prisoner, and connect him with the commission of the felony charged in the indictment.

The second and third specifications, relating to the action of the district attorney in calling upon the prisoner to stand up and repeat certain words, etc., in the presence of Mrs. Sharpless, may be dismissed with the remark that no objection was made or exception taken thereto in the court below. So far as the record shows, the request was promptly acceded to without any objection either by the prisoner himself or his counsel. Having thus waived the right of objection and taken the chances of a favorable result, it would be contrary to every rule of practice to permit him to take advantage of what was done, even if it was erroneous.

Our right to review proceedings of the court below, in cases like this, is limited to such rulings on points of law or evidence, as are excepted to at the time, and made matter of record. Fife v. Commonwealth, 29 Pa. 429; Hopkins v. Commonwealth, 50 Pa. 9.

It does not appear that the silence of the record, as to any objection or exception to the action complained of, is the result of accident or mere oversight. If such had been the case, the court on application would have so corrected the record as to show what actually occurred on the trial. But, assuming for the sake of argument that timely objection was made and exception taken, we are not prepared to say it would be of any avail to the prisoner. He was not asked, much less compelled, "to give evidence against himself." The sole object of the request was to afford the witness, Mrs. Sharpless, then on the stand, an opportunity of seeing the prisoner and hearing the sound of his voice, so that she might the more intelligently testify whether he was or was not the man by whom she was confronted on the night in question. To hold that this was a violation of the clause in section 9 of the Declaration of Rights, which declares that the accused "cannot be compelled to give evidence against himself," would in my judgment be a strained construction of that instrument. If it should be sanctioned, what would prevent a person accused of having stolen property in his possession from successfully interposing a like plea of constitutional immunity, and thus thwarting any attempt to search for and recover the property? While the constitutional rights of those accused should never be violated, care must be taken not to deprive the Commonwealth of any legitimate means of detecting and punishing crime. It is not our purpose, however, to pass upon the question, intended to be raised by these specifications, until it is properly presented. If it should ever arise and be deemed worthy of serious consideration, it will then be definitively settled.

The subject of complaint in the fifth specification is that part of the charge wherein the learned judge says: "You have heard the evidence of the Commonwealth, and it seems to point to this defendant as the man who committed the crime; but it will be for you to say whether the index is sufficiently certain to warrant you in a conviction. I say the evidence seems to point to this defendant as the murderer; it undoubtedly does."

This is merely an expression of opinion that was manifestly warranted by the evidence. In immediate connection therewith, as well as in other portions of the charge, the jury was distinctly instructed that the question of the prisoner's guilt was one of fact, exclusively for their consideration and determination. In the very next sentence the learned judge proceeds to say:

"Whether the evidence is sufficient to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt that he is the guilty man is a question entirely for the jury. I do not intend, if I can avoid it, to give you the slightest intimation of my own judgment, after hearing the testimony, as to what your verdict should be; and if I did, you would not be bound by it."

Indeed, throughout the entire charge, which contains a full, clear and accurate exposition of the law applicable to the case, he appears to have been especially careful to impress upon the minds of the jury the fact that the burden of establishing the prisoner's guilt, beyond a reasonable doubt, was on the Commonwealth, and that the question at issue was exclusively for their determination, under all the evidence before them.

There is nothing erroneous or improper in those portions of the charge recited in the sixth and seventh specifications respectively. In a certain sense the former may have been "prejudicial" to the prisoner; but that was not the fault of the court. It was the logical sequence of evidence which, if believed by the jury, had a criminating tendency, especially when considered in connection with other evidence in the case. We have already adverted briefly to that part of the charge referred to in both of these specifications. The whereabouts of the prisoner, from Friday morning until Sunday forenoon, and then again from 1 or 2 o'clock the same night and afterwards, was satisfactorily accounted for by the testimony of the Commonwealth; but, as to where he was from Sunday forenoon until after midnight, the only evidence we have is contained in the testimony of Stephens, to which the learned judge refers; and that tends to locate him in the vicinity of the murder at the time it was committed, without furnishing any plausible reason for his being there. It was for the jury to say, from all the evidence before them, whether he was there or not, and if there, whether the reason he gave for being in the neighborhood at the time was true or false. In view of the evidence as to his whereabouts from the time he was discharged from Moyamensing until the following Monday morning, the story of his having being down the country husking corn would appear to be wholly improbable. All that was said by the court on the subject complained of was fully warranted by the testimony of Stephens and other witnesses.

There is no error in portions of the charge quoted in the eighth and ninth specifications. What is there said by the court relative to the testimony of William Hahn and Lewis Morris Lewis, is neither improper nor unwarranted. At most the former is nothing more than a mere expression of opinion; and the latter is an explanation of Lewis' testimony, calculated to assist the jury in understanding its proper application and bearing.

The subject of complaint in the remaining three specifications is the alleged defect of the record in not showing the presence of the prisoner in court, either "when the jury was sworn," or "when the verdict was rendered," or "during the time of trial." By mere mistake of the clerk these essential facts were omitted from the record, as at first made up, but attention having been called to the omission, the court, during the same term at which the motion for new trial was overruled and sentence pronounced, ordered the necessary correction to be made, so that the record would conform to the facts as they actually occurred; and this was accordingly done. If the correction had not been made, the defect would have been fatal.

The presumption of regularity, etc., which prevails in other cases, does not apply to records of conviction in capital felonies. During the term at which the trial was concluded and while the record is presumed to be in the breast of the court, the power to supply clerical omissions, and so correct the record that it will conform to the facts, cannot be doubted.

The trial throughout appears to have been conducted with due regard to the rights of the prisoner; and we find nothing in the record that would justify a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed; and it is ordered that the record be remitted for the purpose of carrying the sentence into execution.

(Argued Feb. 18, Decided March 14, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 185, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Centre County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiffs in an action of ejectment. Modified.

This was an action of ejectment in the nature of an appeal from the decision of the board of property under the provisions of the Act of April 3, 1792, § 11, brought by John B. Mattern and George Mattern, against Moses Thompson and John I. Thompson.

At the trial before SIMONTON, P. J., the following facts appeared:

On September 24, 1792, the Commonwealth granted to Josiah Lambourn a warrant for a tract of 400 acres of land in Franklin Township, Huntingdon County, which was subsequently surveyed, and a patent granted. October 27, 1835, the title to this land became vested in Roland Curtin. Some time prior to 1820, Robert Shaw made an improvement on land adjoining this Lambourn survey, and after Shaw's death, his executor, September 19, 1831, sold and conveyed this improvement, containing 226 acres and 77 perches and allowance, to Roland Curtin.

About the year 1820, Andrew Hunter also made an improvement and acquired title to another tract of about 127 acres, adjoining the Lambourn survey and the Shaw improvement, which was likewise purchased by Roland Curtin, by articles of agreement dated September, 27, 1831. On March 17, 1854, Curtin's sons, in whom his title vested, by articles of agreement, sold to Moses Thompson, Jno. I. Thompson, James M. Thompson certain property which included the three tracts. No deed was made by the Curtins in pursuance of this agreement until May 15, 1865, the Thompsons and one Irvin, composing the firm of Irvin & Thompson, holding the property in the meantime under the agreement.

On December 17, 1856, an article of agreement was entered into by the firm of Irvin & Thompson to sell and convey to John Mattern, John B. Mattern, and George Mattern a portion of the above described tracts, supposed to contain about 300 acres, at $25 per acre, amounting to about $7,500, and in this agreement it was expressly stipulated "Irvin & Thompson to make the same title to Mattern that the Messrs. Curtins make them, but reserve to themselves, their heirs and assigns, the privilege to enter upon the land for the purpose of making search for iron ore, with the privilege to take the same away, and ground sufficient for roads and screening floors and all other uses about the banks, but agree to fill up all the shafts they sink where no ore is got, and to pay at the rate of 12½ cents per ton of 2,240 lbs. of good clean ore as a compensation for any damage that may be done the land * * * And it is further understood that said Irvin & Thompson reserve to themselves, their heirs and assigns, the entire ore right on ten acres of land lying between the Desert Houses and Richards and Chambers, with the privilege to enter upon the same to make search for iron ore and ground sufficient for roads and screening floors and all other uses about the banks, and not to pay anything for that privilege."

Under this agreement the Matterns became entitled to a deed on April 3, 1857, before Irvin & Thompson had received their deed from the Curtins. On the 22d of August, 1857, a deed was executed by Irvin and the Thompsons to the Matterns, in pursuance of the agreement, for a consideration of $7,862.75, on which was indorsed a release by the Curtins, for a consideration of $1, of "all their interest in the land mentioned and described in the within deed." By this deed Irvin and the Thompsons convey to the Matterns by metes and bounds a tract "containing 314 acres and 82 perches net measure, being originally part of the Andrew Hunter, R. Shaw and Josiah Lambourn's surveys which became vested in Roland Curtin, and sold by Austin, James, Roland, John, Andrew, and Constans Curtin to the parties of the first part, as their release to the same, executed on this deed, fully shows. The said parties of the first part make the following reservations, to wit: the right to mine and take away ore from ten acres of land contained in" certain fixed boundaries. "Also, all the ore on the remaining part of the tract, by paying said parties of the second part at the rate of 12½ cents per ton of 2,240 lbs. for every ton mined and taken away by them off the said tract, excepting on the ten acres, which said parties are to have without charge; they also reserve the entire privilege of all ore on said premises. To have permission to enter upon said premises to mine, clean and take away the same without let or hindrance from the said parties of the second part, their heirs or assigns. It is understood that the above reservation is to the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns. It is understood that the parties of the first part bind themselves to fill up any holes made on the premises in searching for ore where ore is not found. The clear understanding as regards the above named reservation is to extend to the parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns, and to give full privilege to enter upon the ground with teams, wagons, etc., to haul said ore away, with privilege of ground for roads, etc., and to embrace the exclusive right to all the ore on both the ten acres and the balance of tract."

Under the title so acquired by the agreement and deed from Irvin and the Thompsons, the Matterns entered into possession of the land conveyed, erected buildings, improved the property, and have continued in undisturbed possession ever since. For over twenty-one years they remained in undisputed possession of the property without any misgivings on their own part as to their title, or molestation from others, and without doubt as to the rights of the grantors under the reservation contained in their deed. During all this time both the Thompsons and Matterns took it for granted that the entire tract was surveyed and patented. Their first information to the contrary was when a certain James Cross, in June, 1878, filed an application for sixty acres of land, evidently located on part of the Shaw improvement; and as soon as Moses Thompson, after investigation, could find no evidence that the Shaw tract had ever been surveyed or patented, he also filed an application for a tract of 280 acres to cover the Shaw tract, and at the same time entered a caveat against the Cross application. Cross likewise caveated against Thompson's application. Both parties entered citations, and depositions were taken; but on the 17th of May, 1879, the dispute between Thompson and Cross was finally settled by the latter assigning his rights under his application to Moses Thompson and John I. Thompson. On the day this settlement was made some of the Matterns were present and notified the Thompsons that they would now expect them to take the necessary steps to have the lands included in the deed from the Thompsons to the Matterns patented. In the proceedings on the Cross application it was also discovered that the Andrew Hunter tract had never been patented.

After consultation among the parties and their attorneys it was then decided to withdraw both the Cross and the Moses Thompson applications and to substitute a new one, in the names of Moses and John I. Thompson, for 400 acres that would cover both the Shaw and Hunter tracts, setting forth in the application that it was made "for the use, benefit and protection of applicants and of those claiming under them, according to their respective interests and titles, and not otherwise."

Until this time the Matterns and Thompsons acted in harmony, both desirous of securing a patent such as would protect their respective interests in the property. This application was not filed immediately. It was, however, filed between August 15 and 20, 1880, accompanied with the following affidavits:

"Centre County, ss.:

"Before me, the subscriber, a justice of the peace in and for the Township of Half Moon and county aforesaid, personally came William Reed, a disinterested witness, who, being sworn according to law, did depose and say that to his certain knowledge the land above described has been improved, and that it was first permanently improved about the year 1857, and not before; that the improvements thereon in the main consist of three farms, or parts thereof, opened and improved by Mattern Bros. and Wm. H. Blair, with farm buildings erected thereon, and that David Mattern, George Mattern and Jeremiah Ewing are the parties now settled and residing on said land.

his
Wm. X Reed."

"Centre County, ss.

"Before me, the subscriber, a justice of the peace in and for the Township of Half Moon and county aforesaid, personally came Moses Thompson and John I. Thompson, the above named applicants, who, being duly sworn according to law, did depose and say that they verily believe that no warrant or other office right has been issued for the land above described, either in their own names or in the name or names of any other person or persons under whom they claim the same, and that they have an equitable right in themselves and those claiming under them, to wit: the parties named as settled on said land, to the said land and the improvements thereon in manner following, to wit: As far back as can be traced this land was known as two tracts, respectively as the Robert Shaw and the Andrew Hunter, and until recently it was supposed that warrants had been regularly issued in these names, but quite lately the contrary has been ascertained.

Slight improvements seem at one time to have been made thereon by these men, the evidence of which appears in finding the tracts on the seated list at an early day, but said improvements, if such they could be called, were abandoned over thirty years ago. In 1854 your applicants purchased both tracts, with others, from Curtin's heirs, in whom they had become vested, the Robert Shaw by deed from J. B. Shugert, executor of Robert Shaw, deceased, to Roland Curtin, Sr., bearing date January 2, '33, and the Andrew Hunter through divers conveyances; and on May 15, 1865, the deed of Curtin's to your petitioners or applicants was delivered. Meantime your applicants had sold parts of said lands to settlers hereinbefore named and those under whom they claim, and they had entered upon and improved the land as before stated.

"This application is made for the use, benefit and protection of your applicants and those claiming under them according to their respective interests and titles, and not otherwise.

Moses Thompson,
John I. Thompson."

These affidavits were duly sworn to and subscribed by a justice of the peace.

On September 25, 1880, William Blair, in right of William Cross, entered a caveat against this application. Nearly a year afterwards the Matterns also entered a caveat to the Thompson application, and on August 23, 1882, applied for 200 acres in their own name, covering the ground conveyed to them in the Thompson deed,—actuated, as defendants allege, by the belief that if they procured the patents in their own names they would devest Thompson's ore right, which had become quite valuable. William Blair, who also had acquired from the Thompsons a part of the Shaw improvement, entered a similar application for the portion held by him.

From this time the contest before the board of property became animated; the parties and their attorneys appeared frequently, until finally, at the hearing on March 24, 1882, at the suggestion of the board, it was agreed to postpone a further contest until the granting of the patent, with the understanding that the board would protect the rights of all parties when the patent should be issued. On that day the attorneys of both parties entered into a formal agreement "that the party obtaining the warrant in the above case shall give the other party thirty days' notice before applying for a patent." On April 13, 1882, the board then granted a warrant to the Matterns, and on April 19, 1882, the survey was returned. On August 16, 1882, an application for a patent was filed by the Matterns, to which John I. Thompson entered a caveat on August 23, 1882, praying the patent to be "issued to himself and Moses Thompson, for themselves and in trust for those claiming under them, according to their respective interests, or, if granted to applicants, that the rights of said Moses Thompson and the caveator may be preserved;" and on September 21, 1882, the said John I. Thompson filed an additional caveat for the reason that the survey, as returned, "covers at its northwestern end about seventy-three acres of a tract already warranted and patented in the name of Josiah Lambourn, in which your caveator still owns the iron ore."

On this same day, September 21, 1882, the board of property made the following order: "After hearing depositions and arguments of counsel, the board sustained the caveat and directed patent to issue to Moses Thompson and John I. Thompson." The defendants in error thereupon brought this ejectment on October 2, 1882, in the nature of an appeal from the decision of the board.

At the trial defendants offered the application of Josiah Lambourn, dated the 25th of August, 1792, for 400 acres of land adjoining the Petit and Lewis claim in the southeast side of Franklin Township, Huntingdon County, Pa., while on the same paper there is an application for another survey.

Mr. Beaver: We propose to follow this with the warrant, survey, and patent of the Josiah Lambourn tract to show that a portion of the land covered by the Mattern survey has already been surveyed and patented by the Commonwealth; and they having granted a patent, the Commonwealth has no right to grant a patent for this land the second time; and, after that, the fact that this was known to the plaintiffs at the time their application was made.

Plaintiffs' counsel object:

1. Because the defendants, having joined with the plaintiffs in the application for a patent upon this survey, or rather have made an independent application for a patent upon this survey, are concluded by that application, and cannot impeach the validity or regularity of a survey upon which they have asked a patent, and which patent the board of property has awarded to them; that, in asking for a patent, they have asked the Commonwealth to ratify that survey, and they have ratified it themselves by receiving from the board of property the patent, who awarded to them an allocatur upon this survey; 2, that it is irrelevant and immaterial, because the parties have made up this issue of the board of property under the eleventh section of the Act of the 3d of April, 1792.

By the Court: The objection is sustained and the evidence is excluded; we don't understand that the Lambourn title enters into this case at all. The issuing of this patent cannot affect the rights previously granted by the Commonwealth, and those rights are not in question in this case; therefore we think the evidence is irrelevant.

Defendants except.

Defendants offered next the warrant of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to William B. Henderson, dated March 12, 1841. Surveyed August 2, 1841. Purchase money paid. Sold by William B. Henderson to Roland Curtin; that conveyance, however, is not found. It is hardly proper to offer that alone, but we offer in connection with that the patent of the Commonwealth for the William B. Henderson tract of land to John I. Thompson, made on the 22d of November, 1883.

Plaintiffs objected because it was made since the institution of the suit.

By the Court: Objection sustained, exception noted.

Defendants offered to prove, by the witness, James Caldwell and other witnesses, that the survey in the name of Josiah Lambourn, and the survey in the name of William B. Henderson cover portions of the land included in the survey in the name of John B. and George Mattern, the patent to which is in controversy in this case, for the purpose of showing that the Commonwealth cannot grant, and ought not to grant, to the plaintiffs a patent for any greater amount than what is included within the Mattern survey, outside of the lines of the Lambourn and Henderson surveys.

Plaintiffs objected that the offer is immaterial, incompetent and irrelevant, and not responsive to the issue.

By the Court: We think that this evidence is immaterial and irrelevant. The whole case shows that the plaintiffs have a legal title, with the exception of whatever rights the defendants have under the reservation in the deed to the land which the defendants claim is covered by the prior two surveys and patents; therefore the fact that the plaintiffs acquired a second title to that which they already have a title, cannot injure the defendants; this is said without expressing any judgment as to the rights of the defendants under their reservation; to which defendants except.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"The plaintiffs came then with their action of ejectment in the nature of an appeal from the board of property, and claim in this action that they ought to have the patent, and that your verdict ought to be for them, for the land in controversy. The defendants say that ought not to be the case, and one reason they give is that the plaintiffs, by their action, while the proceedings were pending in the office of the secretary of internal affairs with reference to this warrant, survey, and patent, estopped themselves from now claiming to have the right to an absolute patent for this land.

"The question of estoppel is one for the court. The evidence upon which the estoppel is claimed to be founded has been taken and is on record; and, without further commenting upon it, for the purpose of this case, we instruct you that it does not establish an estoppel. The plaintiffs are not estopped by what was done, as shown by the evidence, from claiming this patent."

"Another ground upon which the defendants claim that an absolute patent should not be issued to the plaintiffs is because of this reservation of the ore right, set forth in their deed to the plaintiffs. For the purposes of this case, we instruct you that this reservation is an incorporeal hereditament. That it is not a reservation of the land, but simply a right or privilege to go upon the land if they choose, and to take out the iron ore, with an obligation to pay the price agreed upon for so much as they take out; that it is not such a substantial thing as may be made the subject of an action of ejectment; therefore, its existence cannot be set up as a defense in an action of ejectment. Therefore, we think the reservation does not stand in the way of a recovery in this case."

"The defendants also offered to introduce evidence to show that part of the land in controversy here was previously patented to other parties, under the warrant of Josiah Lambourn, and we excluded that evidence. We say to you now, to put it on the record so that defendants may have the benefit of an exception; whether the land was previously patented or not, does not enter into the case. The evidence was excluded on an objection by the plaintiffs; they asked us to exclude that question from your consideration. It was done at their request, and we make it a part of the record. We do not think that is one of the questions arising in this case. The question whether there was a prior patent for a part of this land does not enter into the case, for, if there were, the rights under that patent cannot be affected by the result of this trial. If the Commonwealth had granted this land at a prior time to another person who was entitled to receive it, the rights of that person or those who claim under him cannot be taken away in this proceeding."

"We also instruct you that the question of the rights which the defendants claim, under this reservation, have not been raised or passed upon in this case. We simply decide and instruct you that this ore right is an incorporeal hereditament, and that, therefore, in the very nature of things, the right to it cannot be passed upon in an action of ejectment. When the parties come in conflict with respect to that right, whatever it may be, under that reservation, it will then be a question to be decided between them."

"But it does not enter into this case, and we instruct you, as matter of law, that the plaintiffs under their warrant, survey and return of survey, have the legal title from the Commonwealth to the land in controversy here, as against the defendants, and that, therefore, your verdict must be for the plaintiffs."

Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs.

The assignment of error specified the rejection of the evidence as above noted and the portions of the charge quoted.

Messrs. Beaver & Gephart, for plaintiffs in error:

I. The court erred in its construction of the rights of defendants in an ejectment under the Act of April 3, 1792, § 11, and excluded evidence offered which should have been admitted, and which if admitted, and believed by the jury, would have compelled them to render a verdict for the defendants below.

It was the proper province and duty of the board of property to inquire whether any survey, patent, improvement or other inceptive right had been acquired by anyone else before the survey was made on the Mattern warrant; and if they so found, then it was within their discretion and their duty to refuse a patent to the Matterns.

Act April 3, 1792, Purd. Dig. p. 1026, pl. 9; White v. Kyle, 6 Serg. & R. 112; Galbraith v. Elder, 8 Watts, 93; Chew v. Morton, 10 Watts, 323; Foster v. Shaw, 7 Serg. & R. 161.

The effect of the decision of the board, unappealed from, was to vest in the successful party any and all rights of every description which the losing party ever had in the land.

Shoenburger v. Becht, 5 Watts, 194; French v. Seely, 6 Watts, 292; Ege v. Sidle, 3 Pa. 115.

It was the duty of the court upon appeal from the decision of the board of property to hear the same evidence which had been offered before the board and decide whether or not the latter's decision was unwarranted. The plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title; and the issue in this case was whether he was entitled to the patent in any event.

Galbraith v. Elder, 8 Watts, 93; Schoenberger v. Baker, 22 Pa. 400; King v. Baker, 29 Pa. 200.

II. The court erred in instructing the jury that the plaintiffs below, under their relations to the defendants and by their agreements, deeds and declarations, were not estopped from denying the right of the defendants below to the patent. The plaintiffs below went into possession of the land under an agreement with the defendants, afterwards followed by a deed which expressly reserved certain rights and interests in the property. They were estopped from acquiring a title adverse to their grantors without first making a bona fide surrender of the possession under the agreement.

Caufman v. Presb. Cong. of Cedar Springs, 6 Binn. 59; Naglee v. Ingersoll, 7 Pa. 185; 2 Smith, L. Cas. 456, 470; Cleavinger v. Reimer, 3 Watts & S. 486; Greeno v. Munson, 31 Am. Dec. 605; Tutile v. Reynolds, 1 Vt. 80; Bowker v. Walker, 1 Vt. 19; 18 Am. Dec. 670; Blight v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 535 (20 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 516); Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. 43 (28 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 526).

III. The court erred in its construction of the reservation contained in the deed from Irvin and the Thompsons to the Matterns and the rights of defendants thereunder. Such reservation was not an incorporeal hereditament.

Shoenberger v. Lyon, 7 Watts & S. 192; Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. 478.

The cases of Johnstown Iron Co. v. Cambria Iron Co. 32 Pa. 245; Clement v. Youngman, 40 Pa. 345; Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 242; Gloninger v. Franklin Coal Co. 55 Pa. 9; Neumoyer v. Andreas, 57 Pa. 450; Carnahan v. Brown, 60 Pa. 23; Union Petroleum Co. v. Bliven Petroleum Co. 72 Pa. 173; Grubb v. Grubb, 74 Pa. 33, were all grants out of and not reservations retained in the land; and in none of them was the grant in terms as strong, comprehensive and exclusive as is the reservation in this case. Nor would this question ever have been raised, or the grantees have interfered with the grantors procuring the patent, had it not been for their desire to devest this exclusive right reserved.

Another distinction made by the courts in these cases last mentioned is that no consideration was paid for an entire interest in or part of the land, only a royalty to be paid as the right was exercised. But in our case, and in every reservation like this, the full price for the right is paid in advance by the grantor accepting so much less for the consideration money. The 12½ cents royalty to be paid in this reservation, outside of the ten acres, is fully explained by the article of agreement preceding this deed "as a compensation for any damage that may be done the land."

Messrs. W. H. Blair and John G. Love, for defendants in error:

One very important link in plaintiffs' claim of title is omitted, viz.: the conveyance of these "Curtin heirs" of all their interest in the land described in the writ, directly to John Mattern, John Mattern, Jr., and George Mattern, the last two being the plaintiffs below. As this conveyance contains all the requisites of a good and sufficient deed of bargain and sale, and was executed nearly eight years prior to 1865, and confessedly at their instance and by their authority, it manifestly devested them of any previously acquired estate legal or equitable in this Curtin title.

Barber v. Sayers, 107 Pa. 246.

The Thompson caveat was a virtual attempt to appeal from the former decision of the same board, instead of the Common Pleas of Centre County. This cannot be done.

Shoenberger v. Baker, 22 Pa. 398; French v. Seely, 6 Watts, 292.

If we rightly apprehend the learned counsel of plaintiffs in error, they ground the authority of the board to subrogate the caveators to the rights of the warrantees, upon the doctrine of equitable estoppel. "But," as was said by Justice Field, when delivering the opinion in Brant v. Virginia Coal etc. Co. 93 U. S. 326 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 927), "it is essential to the application of the principal of equitable estoppel to the title to real property that the party claiming to have been influenced by the conduct or declarations of another to his injury was himself not only destitute of knowledge of the true state of the titles but also of any convenient means of acquiring such knowledge. Where the condition of the title is known to both parties, or both have the same means of ascertaining the truth, there can be no estoppel;" citing Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts, 240, and Knouff v. Thompson, 16 Pa. 361, as Pennsylvania cases sustaining the text.

Dungan v. Am. Life Ins. Co. 52 Pa. 255, illustrates the folly of an attempt to base an equitable estoppel upon an erroneous opinion upon a legal question of the opposing counsel, by acting upon which, the party setting up the estoppel was injured. "The law," says the court, "was equally open to both parties."

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

We are entirely satisfied with the rulings of the learned judge of the court below, on the main points involved in this case. That the board of property made a mistake in awarding the patent to the defendants we have no doubt, for the fee to the body of the land in controversy was clearly in the plaintiffs. Nevertheless, we think there was an error in directing a general verdict for the plaintiffs without a reservation of the defendants' ore right. That right is found in the deed of Irvin and the Thompsons to the Matterns, dated August 22, 1857.

The language of the reservation is, inter alia, as follows: "They also reserve the entire privilege of all ore on said premises. To have permission to enter upon said premises to mine, clean and take away the same without let or hindrance from the said parties of the second part, their heirs or assigns."

The learned president of the common pleas held that the reservation left in the vendors an incorporeal hereditament only, and that the verdict, although general, would have no effect upon it. But, without passing positively upon this question, we very much doubt the incorporeal character of the reservation.

In the case of Whitaker v. Brown, 46 Pa. 197, where a reservation very nearly like the one before us was considered, it was held that it must be construed as an exception, and that, as a consequence, the fee in the reserved mineral remained in the vendor.

Moreover, according to the case of French v. Seely, 6 Watts, 292, the issuing of the patent, the necessary result of the present verdict and judgment, will cut off all rights which the defendants heretofore may have had in the land, one of which undoubtedly is the right of entry for the purpose of removing the ore. We are of opinion, therefore, that the defendants' right should have been reserved by the verdict, for thus only can it be recognized in the patent. As this court, as well as the common pleas, has the power to amend verdicts in ejectments, especially those of an equitable kind, such as the one before us, and as it would be to no purpose to send the case back for retrial, we direct an amendment of the verdict as follows:

After the words, "they find for the plaintiffs the land described in the writ," add: "Reserving to the defendants their rights to the ore that may be in and upon said land, together with the right of entry as described and limited in the deed of James Irvin, Moses Thompson and Mary his wife, and John I. Thompson and Mary, his wife, to John Mattern, John Mattern, Jr., and George Mattern, dated 23d of August, 1857."

With this amendment the judgment is affirmed.

1. The sum insured by a policy of insurance on the life of a debtor must not be disproportionate to the interest the holder of the policy has in the life insured. No more definite rule on the subject has yet been laid down by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

2. Per Paxson, J.: A policy taken out by a creditor on the life of his debtor ought to be limited to the amount of the debt, with interest, and the amount of the premiums with interest thereon during the expectancy of life as shown by the Carlisle Tables.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 97, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Berks County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of assumpsit to recover the amount of a policy of life insurance. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial are stated in the opinion.

Defendant proposed to ask a witness whether as an officer and agent of the U. B. Mutual Aid Insurance Company a policy of insurance was taken out by Bertolette Grant and transferred to Jacob Kline as his creditor, whereon divers sums of money as premiums were paid by Jacob Kline for a number of years; also a like policy taken out by the said Bertolette Grant and transferred to Jacob Kline as his creditor in the Prudential Mutual Aid Society of America, the premiums upon which insurance were likewise paid by the defendant; that subsequently both of these policies were abandoned and the policy in suit was taken out in their place. This for the purpose of showing the expenditure of large sums of money by the defendant, in order to secure the payment of his indebtedness, and for the further purpose of showing that he had an insurable interest; and this to be followed by receipts showing such payments of premiums.

Plaintiffs object: 1, because payments made by the defendant upon any other policies of insurance at any other time, in which he was the beneficiary, and which were therefore made for his benefit, would not be allowed as credits upon the policy for the proceeds of which this suit was brought; 2, that any such payments made by the defendant were voluntary payments, and did not constitute an indebtedness of Bertolette Grant to the defendant, and are no evidence of indebtedness; and 3, that it is inadmissible, immaterial and irrelevant.

Evidence admitted. Exception. Seventh assignment of error.

The plaintiffs asked the court to charge, inter alia:

"6. John Zerbe, the witness called by the defendant, to prove the declarations of Grant, October 7, 1882, having testified that Grant said he owed money to Kline and gave Kline a policy of life insurance: 'I gave Kline a policy of life insurance on my life, and after my death, why of course he can realize what I got from him;' and this evidence, being uncontradicted, establishes the fact that the understanding was that Kline should have his debt, and the balance to the estate of Grant."

Ans. If the jury from the evidence find that there was an agreement between Grant and Kline at the time the policy of insurance was effected, that Kline was only to receive the amount of his debt at Grant's death, this point is affirmed. Now the evidence upon that point is found in the testimony of Zerbe:

"Q. Come right down to what he said about money."

A. He said that he (meaning Kline) never refused any favor whatever: that he gave him considerable money: but he says, "I gave Kline a policy of insurance" on his life, "and after my death, why of course he can realize what I got from him."

Now this is the only evidence that there is upon that point. It is not necessary for the court to say anything further to you about it. The evidence discloses the fact that Kline was a brother-in-law of Grant, and that Grant recognized Kline as one of the best friends he had; and if the jury find in regard to these various sums to which I have referred, that they were paid by Mr. Kline at that time prior to the taking out of this policy on the 22d of March, 1882, then Kline had an insurable interest in the life of Bertolette Grant, and the money realized on that policy belonged to Mr. Kline, and your verdict will be for the defendant. On the other hand, if you find that those payments were not made by Kline, and there was no such indebtedness, then your verdict would be in favor of the plaintiffs, deducting the premiums which had been paid, amounting to $293.40, and for the balance they will be entitled to a verdict, after deducting from the amount of the policy received by Kline, the premiums which he paid. Sixth assignment of error.

Verdict and judgment were for the defendant.

Messrs. Adam H. Schmehl and Richmond L. Jones, for plaintiffs in error:

The disproportion between the real interest of the creditor and the amount to be received by him, deprives it of all pretense to be a bona fide effort to secure the debt.

Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 643 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 244).

It would be an affront to the court to pretend that Kline had a reasonable ground to expect any benefit or advantage from the continuance of the life of Grant. The contract is a mere wager, by which the party taking the policy is directly interested in the early death of the insured.

Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 924).

The indebtedness was about 10 per cent of the amount of the policy, and it is simply absurd to contend that this was a bona fide effort to secure that debt. The reasoning and conclusions in both Warnock v. Davis, and Cammack v. Lewis, were adopted by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Gilbert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74, and the uniform line of cases following.

In Scott v. Dickson, 16 W. N. C. 181, the premiums were paid by Dickson, who took out the policy on his own life and made Scott the beneficiary without his knowledge, thus exonerating him from any possible suspicion of any purpose of speculation and taking the case out of this class. It was under the facts of that case, tantamount to a testamentary disposition by Dickson of the proceeds of his own policy.

In Corson's Appeal, 4 Cent. Rep. 307, the facts and circumstances clearly rebutted any presumption of speculation. There was a legitimate business undertaking, contemplating present and future advances, with uncertainty as to what might be their extent, "with reasonable ground to expect benefit and advantage from the continuance of the life" of the aunt, which was indeed realized by the successful results of the business in reimbursing Corson for all the advances made. The court held, under the facts of that case, that it was not a speculative policy, and therefore did not belong to this class, but by no means receded from the advanced position taken in the other cases, nor decided that once a creditor always a creditor and always entitled to the benefits of a policy, without regard to the disproportion of the debt to the insurance. The court clearly did not intend to overrule Cammack v. Lewis.

Messrs. H. P. Keiser, J. H. Jacobs and Henry C. G. Reber, for defendant in error:

Justice Allen, in passing upon a similar point in Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Allen, 138 Mass. 30, says: "The other objection urged is that such transactions may lead to gaming contracts. * * * Most contracts have an element of gambling in them; there is uncertainty in the value of any contract to deliver property at a future day, and great uncertainty in the present value of an annuity for a particular life, or of a sum payable in the event of a particular death." Again; p. 36, "The value and permanency of the interest is material only as being on the question whether the policy is taken out in good faith and not as a gambling transaction."

Mr. Justice Clark says, in Corson's Appeal, 4 Cent. Rep. 307, 113 Pa. 438, citing Dalby v. India etc. Life Ins. Co. 15 C. B. 365: "The law seems to be well settled that it is wholly unnecessary to prove an insurable interest in the life of the assured, at the maturity of the policy, if it was valid at its inception; and in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, the sum expressed on the face of the policy is the measure of recovery."

Mr. Justice Paxson, in Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, a case in many respects analogous to ours said: "Policies of this nature are in no sense wagering. It would be denying a man's right to do what he will with his own, to say that he could not in any form insure his life for the benefit of an indigent relative, or a friend to whom he felt under obligations."

The facts in the case cited for the plaintiffs in error are not the same as those in ours.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

The second assignment presents the controlling point in this case. It alleges that the court below erred in not affirming the plaintiffs' first point. The point was as follows: the disproportion of the debts of $214 alleged to have been owing by Grant to Kline at the time of the insurance, and the amount of the insurance, viz.: $3,000, is so great as to make it merely a wagering policy; and such policy being void in law, the defendant is not entitled to hold the proceeds of the policy, and the verdict must be for the plaintiffs for the amount received by the defendant, less the assessments paid and the debt proved.

This point assumes the amount of the debts due Kline from Grant; but as the plaintiffs' fourth point, which is free from this objection and was also declined, raises the same question, we will consider it as if no such defect existed.

It is very clear, if the testimony in the case is to be believed, that the policy in question was taken out by Mr. Grant, and assigned to Kline in entire good faith. There is nothing to cast suspicion upon the integrity of the transaction. I will refer to the disproportion of the debt to the amount insured hereafter. I am now alluding to the good faith of the parties as distinguished from the gambling policies in Gil- bert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74, and that line of cases.

Kline and Grant were brothers-in-law and it appears that Kline had befriended Grant in various ways, and had from time to time loaned him money. The latter said when he applied for the policy that "he was greatly indebted to Mr. Kline; that he had favored him considerably;" also that Grant said that Jacob Kline was a brother-in-law of his, and he owed him a debt, a considerable amount of a debt; and he said he wanted to pay him, and this was the only way, the only remedy which he had, otherwise he could never pay him. For this reason he took out the policy in favor of Mr. Kline to pay his debt. See testimony of Joseph Deysher.

Another witness, John Zerbe, also states that Grant told him that Kline was the best friend he ever had; had never refused him any favors whatever; had given him considerable money; that he (Grant) had given Kline a policy of insurance on his life, etc.

After the death of Mr. Grant, the company paid over the money to Mr. Kline, and this suit was brought by the administrators of Grant to recover it back, less the amount of the actual debt, and the premiums paid on this policy by Kline. There was no evidence to submit to the jury that the policy was given as collateral security; the premiums were all paid by Kline; hence, if the plaintiff can recover at all, it can only be because the policy in question is a gambling or wagering policy.

It was not disputed at the trial below that there was a bona fide indebtedness of Grant to Kline at the time the policy was taken out of something over $300. It was also in evidence that one or more policies had been taken out on Grant's life for Kline's benefit, prior to the policy in question. These policies had been abandoned because of the insolvency of the companies, or for other sufficient reason. Kline had paid in premiums thereon several hundred dollars.

While the money thus fruitlessly paid in premiums may not have amounted to an insurable interest in the life of Grant, for the reason that such payments did not make him a creditor for their amount, we think they show good faith in the transaction. This case is to be determined upon the facts as they existed at the time the last policy was taken out, and if both Grant and Kline saw proper to treat the premiums paid as an insurable interest, Grant's administrators have no standing to say they were not. The company could have defended upon this ground, but it did not. It paid the money over to Kline without question.

This brings us to the main question: Was the amount of insurance so disproportioned to Kline's interest in the life of Grant as to make this a wagering policy? We approach this question with caution, the more so that this court has not yet laid down a rule upon this subject. That we shall be compelled some day to do so is possible.

We have said that the sum insured must not be disproportioned to the interest the holder of the policy has in the life insured. To take out a policy of $5,000 to secure a debt of $5 would be such a palpable wager that no court would hesitate to declare it so as a matter of law. Care must be taken, also, that a debt shall not be collusively contracted for the mere purpose of creating an insurable interest. Mr. Dickens in his inimitable "Pickwick Papers" has shown how a debt may be created for the purpose of lodging the debtor in prison by collusion with the creditor. Speaking for myself, it may be that a policy taken out by a creditor on the life of his debtor ought to be limited to the amount of the debt with interest, and the amount of premiums with interest thereon during the expectancy of life as shown by the Carlisle tables. This view, however, has never yet been adopted by this court in any adjudicated case, nor do we feel compelled to define the disproportion now, in view of the particular facts of the case in hand. We do not regard it as either immoral or wagering for Kline to attempt to secure the sums he had already fruitlessly paid in premiums on Grant's life; and if Grant had no objection thereto, and assisted him therein, I do not see that anyone could object to this but the company.

Again, we have the declarations of Grant that he owed Kline a considerable sum of money, the precise amount not stated; that Kline had aided him in various ways; had never refused him a favor, etc. In view of their connection by marriage and of their admitted relations, it is at least probable that Kline had aided him at many times, and in various ways, pecuniarily, that are not represented by any evidences of debt. And if the sum insured was regarded by Grant as a reasonable amount to indemnify Kline, with what grace can Grant's administrators come in and allege that it was not? They have no possible equity; Grant never paid $1 of the premiums; and if they are allowed now to recover, it is not by virtue of any equity, but by force of an inexorable rule of public policy which treats it as a wagering policy and declares the policy holder a trustee for the person insured as to the entire proceeds save only the money actually loaned, with the premiums paid.

Assuming, then, that Kline might with Grant's consent and as against his administrators, lawfully seek to indemnify himself for the premiums paid and lost, we have the sum of $743.56 as the amount which Kline was out of pocket. We do not know what Grant's expectation of life was when the policy was taken out, and there is nothing before us upon which we could base any reliable opinion. But it appears he was sixty-five years of age, and was an unusually good risk. While we do not know what the amount of the annual premium was, we do know that it must have been a considerable sum on $3,000 for a man of sixty-five years, and with the annual interest would roll up rapidly. That Grant died within a year is not to the purpose; he might have lived long enough for the debt and premiums at compound interest to have exceeded the amount of the policy. Surely, in such case we cannot say as a matter of law that the disproportion was so great as to make it a wagering policy.

We see no error in refusing to affirm the point referred to in the sixth assignment. We do not think the declarations of Grant embodied in the point are conclusive that the policy was intended as collateral security merely, and that the amount of the policy, less debt and premiums, was to be paid over to Grant. On the contrary, they would not have justified such finding by the jury. Everything in this case indicated that this was intended as a creditor's policy in which Grant had no interest. As before observed, the latter paid no premiums.

The evidence referred to in the seventh assignment was properly admitted, if for no other reason, to show good faith. But, as has been already said, it was competent to show these payments of premiums, for other purposes.

Judgment affirmed.

(Argued Feb. 15, Decided March 28, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 157, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lycoming County, to review a judgment on a verdict for defendant in a scire facias to revive a judgment. Reversed.

The facts are stated by the charge of the court to the jury, by Cummin, P. J., as follows:

[I think there is no fact to go to the jury.] The issue which you have been sworn to try arises in an action of scire facias brought to revive a judgment. There was a judgment entered in this court in favor of Knapp & Thompson against E. D. Trump. Afterwards Knapp & Thompson failed and made an assignment to John A. Otto & John R. Hazelet, and they are now the plaintiffs seeking to revive this judgment. That original judgment was entered June 7, 1876, in favor of Knapp & Thompson and against E. D. Trump, for $8,523.44. This scire facias is brought to revive that judgment. When the plaintiff had shown this record—that there was such a judgment he had a right to revive—if there had been nothing else your verdict would have been for the plaintiff.

The defendant, Trump, sets up as a defense that this judgment ought not to be revived against him, and by the witnesses and papers produced makes out this state of facts as a defense: Knapp & Thompson were dry goods merchants in 1876 in this city, and Nichols & Co. were founders and machinists; and there were transactions between them whereby there occurred an indebtedness of Nichols & Co. to Knapp & Thompson of this sum. This firm of Nichols & Co. was composed of Frank Trump and A. T. Nichols. When they went to settle this account they gave two notes—both were made by Frank Trump, one of the firm, to the order of Nichols & Co., indorsed by them and then by E. D. Trump. One of these notes was for $8,000 and the other for $500. It was upon these notes that this suit was brought, upon which Knapp & Thompson obtained the original judgment.

[The defendants claim that afterwards Knapp & Thompson proceeded against A. T. Nichols, who had removed to Norfolk, Virginia. They proceeded against him on this same claim. He, you will remember, was one of the firm of Nichols & Co., and they were the first indorsers. They proceeded against A. T. Nichols in the courts of that State, and before this litigation was assigned the assignees of Knapp & Thompson came into this court and obtained permission, with the consent of creditors, to settle and compromise that claim. Leave was granted by the court to make that settlement, and the assignees of Knapp & Thompson then transferred by an assignment all their claim against A. T. Nichols to Robert M. Foresman, and he afterwards settled with Nichols. So the claim of Knapp & Thompson against Nichols was thereby wiped out. Now E. D. Trump sets this up as a defense, because, you see, he is the second indorser, and where the second indorser pays he has a right to go back along the line. He has a right to sue everybody above him on the paper. If Knapp & Thompson have settled with Nichols so it will prevent Trump from having any claim against him, then they have deprived him of his remedy. By satisfying the claim against A. T. Nichols they have settled the claim against everybody below him. The action of Knapp & Thompson's assignees and themselves prevents E. D. Trump from the remedy he was entitled to and passes the right to sue E. D. Trump and to subrogation to the person to whom they assigned. For that reason this defense seems to be a good one. Therefore, let your verdict be for the defendant] and counsel for the plaintiff may file a motion for a new trial; and if there is any error it can be remedied.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in receiving in evidence, as set forth in the opinion of the supreme court: 1, the records of the Common Pleas of Lycoming County; 2, the copy of the assignment; and 3, the parol evidence; also the portions of the charge inclosed in brackets.

Messrs. H. T. Ames and J. C. Hill, for plaintiffs in error:

The only defense in the trial of scire facias on a judgment is a denial of the existence of the judgment or proof of a subsequent satisfaction or discharge therefor. For none of these purposes was this petition evidence.

An assignment by the plaintiff of a suit in equity against A. T. Nichols individually did not operate as a discharge of the defendant as indorser of the firm of A. T. Nichols & Co. The primary fund for the payment of the debts of a co-partnership is the firm property, and it must be first exhausted.

But this case pending in Virginia, which was assigned, was only a suit. No lien had been secured, which the assignment and subsequent settlement released.

The mere dismissal by the creditor of a suit, which he has commenced against the principal and by which, if prosecuted, the money could have been collected, will not discharge the surety. In such cases no lien is lost, and the transaction amounts to simple forbearance without consideration.

All that the defendant could ask was that the plaintiffs should give him credit for the amount realized by the compromise of the claim against Nichols. In equity he was entitled to that and nothing more. The discharge does not extend to the whole claim, if the means of payment was only of part.

The settlement of the claim with A. T. Nichols, one of the principals, by Mr. Foresman, would discharge Mr. Trump as surety, because it destroyed the right of Mr. Trump to be subrogated to the rights of Knapp & Thompson as against A. T. Nichols or A. T. Nichols & Co.

(The counsel for defendant in error, on the question of the effect of the Act of Congress for the authentication of record, cited the cases collected in the opinion of the supreme court.)

Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded that E. D. Trump was an accommodation indorser of the note on which the original judgment against him was obtained in favor of Knapp & Thompson; he therefore occupied the relation of surety, and in the event of his being obliged to pay the debt, was entitled to subrogation to the rights of Knapp & Thompson, as against A. T. Nichols & Company, the principal debtors.

His defense upon the scire facias was that the plaintiffs had compromised their claim against A. T. Nichols & Company; that they had with the leave of and under the authority of the Court of Common Pleas of Lycoming County, which had jurisdiction of their accounts, assigned their claims against A. T. Nichols & Company, to one Robert M. Foresman, with whom A. T. Nichols & Company had subsequently effected a settlement and compromise, and that the debt, for which the defendant was simply a surety, was thereby extinguished. The defendant, therefore, maintained that as by the compromise the original and principal debtors were discharged, he was in like manner discharged; for, in the event of his being compelled in this action to pay the balance of the debt, he has by the act of plaintiffs been deprived of his equitable right and remedy of subrogation.

To maintain the issue on his part, the defendant first offered the record of the proceedings of the Common Pleas of Lycoming County, in which authority was given to the assignees to effect a compromise. The petition set forth, in substance, that a suit in equity was pending in the Hustings Court in the City of Portsmouth, Va., brought by Knapp & Thompson, against A. T. Nichols, to set aside a conveyance made by A. T. Nichols to Eliza Nichols, his sister, in fraud of creditors, which suit was still pending in the court of appeals, etc.; that the assignees had received an offer of $1,500 in cash, for a compromise of the "Knapp claim," as set forth in a telegram annexed thereto, and praying the court to authorize them to accept the terms of compromise offered.

Upon due consideration, on January 22, 1881, a rule to show cause was granted, which rule was afterwards made absolute.

The relevancy of this offer did not perhaps fully appear at the time it was made, but it could not be said to be wholly irrelevant; the subject matter of the proceeding was a claim of Knapp & Thompson against Nichols; whether it was the same claim for which Thompson was surety did not certainly appear, but the defendant was not bound to exhibit his whole case in a single offer; the identity of the debt was the subject of further proof, and the order of the evidence is a matter largely in the discretion of the court. The subsequent proofs, however, fully justified the admission of the offer.

The defendant's next offer was a copy of an assignment, dated November 25, 1881, made by Otto and Hazelet, the assignees, and Knapp & Thompson to Robert M. Foresman, of a certain case entitled "Daniel B. Knapp and William F. Thompson against Albert T. Nichols" transferring all their right, title and interest "in and to the claim of plaintiff in the above entitled case, debt, interest and costs, with full power to prosecute, settle or discontinue the said suit now pending in the court of appeals in the State of Virginia, as to the said Foresman may seem proper."

To this it was objected, first, that copy was not receivable in evidence, excepting upon proof of the loss or destruction of the original; and second, that if admissible at all, it could only be by an exemplification of the record under the Act of Congress of 1790.

It was conceded that the original was on file and constituted part of the record in the Court of Appeals of Virginia; it was, therefore, out of the power of the defendant to produce it; and secondary evidence in some form was necessarily resorted to, to establish its existence, execution and contents. Secondary evidence is admissible to establish the execution of a paper where the subscribing witness is out of the jurisdiction of the court, as if he were dead. Truby v. Byers, 6 Pa. 347.

The original entries of a tradesman or merchant may be given in evidence, when the clerk who made them is out of the State, on proof of his handwriting. Crouse v. Miller, 10 Serg. & R. 155.

His absence from the State has the same effect as his death. Alter v. Berghaus, 8 Watts, 77.

Upon the same general principle in Ralph v. Brown, 3 Watts & S. 399, where the question was upon the admissibility of a copy of a release, it was said that as the original paper was in the hands of a person who could not be reached by the process of the court, it was as much beyond the defendant's power to compel the production of it as if it had been destroyed, and it was therefore held that the contents might be established by parol.

So, in Rhodes v. Seibert, 2 Pa. 18, it was distinctly decided that where the production of papers cannot be compelled, because beyond the jurisdiction of the court, secondary evidence may be given. The first ground of objection cannot, therefore, be maintained.

The second ground is, we think, equally untenable. It was shown that after the original had been executed and delivered to Foresman he left it in custody of Seth T. McCormick, who, prior to sending it to Virginia, prepared a copy: and he states that the copy of the assignment in evidence is an accurate, exact and examined copy of the original. It is doubtless true that the record of the proceedings in the courts of Virginia might have been certified under the Act of Congress, and if so it would have been receivable in evidence in any proceeding in Pennsylvania where it was relevant to the issue, to show what was involved in and what was determined by the suit which was certified; but we greatly doubt whether the copy of the assignment, as such, embraced therein would be proper evidence in a suit between other parties, at least until the execution of the original was established by common-law proofs.

But let this be as it may, the Act of Congress of 1790 only prescribes a general mode of authentication of records; it does not exclude any other evidence which the courts of a particular State may deem expedient. Ohio v. Hinchman, 27 Pa. 485.

Other evidence, good according to established principles, independently of the Act of Congress, may be admitted. Kean v. Rice, 12 Serg. & R. 208.

As the Act of Congress has no negative words, even the records of a sister State may be established by any competent proof known to the common law. Baker v. Field, 2 Yeates, 532. See also Snyder v. Wise, 10 Pa. 157.

Where proof is by a copy, an examined copy duly made and sworn to by a competent witness is always admissible. Am. Life Ins. etc. Co. v. Rosenagle, 77 Pa. 515; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 485.

The copy was not offered as a detached portion of the record; it was, strictly speaking, perhaps, not a part of the record; it was filed with the record for the benefit of all parties in interest, for safe keeping, and for the convenience and information of those who for any purpose might have occasion to refer to the record. The offer was of the assignment, as such, by a copy thereof, duly examined and proved independently of the record. It was the assignment in terms of the Knapp & Johnson claim against Nichols, "debt, interest and costs."

But it was not competent, we think, by the introduction of parol evidence, to show what the subject of the assignment was, when it plainly appeared that it was the assignment of a suit at law, the debt, interest and costs of a claim designated only as a claim in suit in a certain court; a copy of the record, properly certified or examined, was undoubtedly the best evidence of what was involved in that suit. The parol evidence of Trump and of Nichols, in merely negative form, that they knew of no other indebtedness of A. T. Nichols, or of A. T. Nichols & Company, which could properly be embraced in the suit, was, we think, incompetent, when the record would have shown affirmatively and exactly what the claim was which was assigned.

Moreover, the effect of the parol proof, even if it had been admissible for the purpose, was for the jury, not for the court; for although the testimony on the question of identification was wholly one sided, and to the same effect, the veracity of the witnesses and the truth or accuracy of their testimony was certainly for the jury.

The judgment is reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

JULY Term, 1886, No. 192, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Certiorari to the Quarter Sessions of Northampton County, to review proceedings laying out a public road. Affirmed.

The record discloses the following proceedings:

On petition, presented September 22, 1884, by divers inhabitants of the Township of Bethlehem, for the laying out of a public road from Easton to Freemansburg (through lands of one George H. Schweitzer) the court, October 3, 1884, appointed viewers. October 17, 1884, the report of these viewers was presented, filed and confirmed nisi and an opening order was granted. November 3, 1884, a petition for review was presented and on November 17, 1884, an order to review was issued. Reviewers were appointed whose report was presented and filed December 11, 1884, and confirmed nisi.

January 5, 1885, a petition for re-review was presented, and January 9, 1885, an order was issued, and re-reviewers were appointed, whose report, February 9, 1885, was filed and confirmed nisi.

The report, inter alia, set out: "And after locating said road we were unable to procure releases from the persons over whose premises the proposed road is to pass; we therefore proceeded to and do now assess the damages occasioned by the locating and laying out of said road as follows, viz.: The damages to George H. Schweitzer we assess at" etc.

February 11, 1885, the appellant, George H. Schweitzer, filed exceptions to the latter report, alleging that certain of said re-reviewers were related to one Abram D. Stauffer, the most active of the petitioners for re-reviewers, and that the justice of the peace who swore in the jury and accompanied them during the whole of the view was one of the petitioners for the jury of re-reviewers; that the jury were entertained on the day of the view at the house of said Stauffer and were by him supplied with intoxicating liquor and unduly influenced before they signed the report in favor of the road; that the report contains no draft as required by the order of the court, and no endeavor was made by said viewers to procure from exceptant a release for damages from the opening of the road as required by the order of the court.

Depositions were taken by the parties and, after hearing, the court, June 3, 1885, dismissed the exceptions and referred the report back to the re-reviewers, with directions for them to annex a plot or draft of the proposed road and to return their report so amended.

The opinion of the court was filed June 7, 1886. On June 14, thereafter, "report of re-reviewers to order of court to annex draft, filed and on motion of P. M. Gernet, Esq., confirmed, nisi." On the same day was filed a decree of the court opening said road.

June 16 the appellant, Schweitzer, filed the following exception to the order of the court opening the road:

"Said order was prematurely granted, the report of re-reviewers annexing draft filed, having been same day filed and confirmed nisi, but not confirmed absolutely, as appears on record."

June 20, 1886, this exception was dismissed by the court and exceptant took this writ of certiorari, assigning as error the action of the court in confirming the report of re-reviewers and dismissing appellant's exceptions thereto, and in directing the road to be opened at the same time when the draft was filed, instead of waiting until the next term for the confirmation of the amended report containing the draft, and in overruling and dismissing Schweitzer's exception thereto.

Mr. W. E. Dorster, for appellant:

On June 3, 1886, the report was sent back for a draft. June 12, 1886, the report was filed with draft annexed. This, as we understand it, was the first moment when the report was complete, and the first time the draft could be seen by us, and made the subject of an exception if it fell below the requirement of the law. No doubt the court so understood it, for in the opinion of June 3, it does not confirm the report, merely referring the report back to be amended by a draft. But two days after the amended report came in, June 14, 1886, the report was confirmed and the road ordered opened. The draft is objectionable, but we have had no chance to have it corrected. This we think was an error. "An entire term must intervene between the confirmation and the order to open."

Boyer's Road, 37 Pa. 257; Ewing's Mill Road, 32 Pa. 282; McConnell's Mill Road, 32 Pa. 285.

An order to open cannot be made until the term succeeding that at which the width of the road has been determined by the court.

Middle Creek Road, 9 Pa. 69.

It will be noticed that the petition for reviewers was filed January Term, 1885. This should have been returned to April Term, 1885. Owing to exceptions being filed it was not passed on by the court until June Term, 1886, when the report was referred back, and confirmed June 14, without any continuing order. This was irregular.

"If for any reason the report cannot be made to the next term, the proper course is to apply to the court to continue the order, and make it returnable to the next succeeding term; a report made and confirmed at a succeeding term or at an adjourned court without such previous order is irregular and may be set aside."

That court, therefore, erred in dismissing our last exception, which claimed that the order to open was premature.

Messrs. Edward J. Fox, Preston M. Gernet and Edward J. Fox, Jr., for appellees:

"It is presumed that viewers endeavored to procure releases." Road in South Abington, 16 W. N. C. 404.

This court cannot consider the depositions in this case or review the questions of fact, but can only consider questions as to the jurisdiction of the court, or the regularity of proceedings, as it appears from the record, of which the depositions form no part.

v.
KNIGHTS OF BIRMINGHAM OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The by-laws of a corporation chartered "for the purpose of benefiting and aiding the widows and orphns of deceased members," provided that the sum of $1,000 should, at the death of each member, "be paid to such person or persons as the deceased may have designated to receive the same as appears on the books of the lodge of which he is a member; if no designation has been made, then to his widow, if no widow survives, then to his child or children;" etc. A member having a wife and children, borrowed $1,000 from his sister who was designated as beneficiary on the books of the lodge. She paid his dues until his death. Held, that she was entitled to recover the amount of his interest, $1,000, from the corporation, as there was in the charter no prohibitory or restrictive language excluding from the powers of the corporation the right to contract specially with the members for the payments of benefits to other persons than his widow and orphans. Nor was such a contract to be held void by reason of any necessary implication from the language of the charter.

JANUARY Term, 1887, No. 87, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 4 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment for the defendant in a case stated. Reversed.

Reported below, 2 Pa. C. C. Rep. 339.

The case stated was as follows:

The defendant is a Corporation duly chartered under the Act of Assembly, approved the 29th day of April, 1874, and the supplements and amendments thereto. By section 5 of its charter, membership is limited to Master Masons in good standing in the fraternity of Free Masons.

The second section of the charter of the defendant is as follows:

"The purposes of this Corporation shall be the maintenance of a society for the purpose of benefiting and aiding the widows and orphans of deceased members."

This object is repeated in the first article of the constitution.

By section 1, of article 19, of its constitution, it is provided that the sum of $1,000 "shall be paid to such person or persons as the deceased may have designated to receive the same, as appears on the books of the lodge of which he is a member; if no designation has been made, then to his widow; if no widow survives, then to his child or children; in default of the foregoing, then to the mother of the deceased or other legal heirs, and in case there is no widow, children, mother, or legal heirs, the lodge may appropriate toward the expenses of the last sickness and funeral of the deceased, the amount not to exceed the sum to which such recipient would have been entitled."

On October 17, 1878, Joseph M. Maneely became a member of the Corporation, to wit: Kensington Lodge, No. 5, of the Knights of Birmingham, of Pennsylvania, and subsequently, on July 24, 1884, he died, being at that time a member of the Masonic Order, and of the corporation defendant in good standing.

The said Joseph M. Maneely, on the 7th day of February, 1881, desiring to borrow from his sister, Mary A. Lamon (on whose behalf this suit is brought by her trustee), the said sum of $1,000, agreed to assign to her as security therefor, all his estate, right, title and interest in and to the said sum of $1,000, to which his legal representatives would become entitled upon his decease, from the said corporation defendant, and for the purpose of ascertaining whether said security would be sufficient, the said Mary A. Lamon sent her agent and trustee, the said William H. Maneely, to the secretary of the said subordinate lodge of the corporation defendant, one Ebenezer Cobb, to ascertain whether such an assignment could be made for her protection; whereupon, the said secretary of the said corporation defendant, being apprised of all the facts aforesaid, and also of the fact that the said Joseph M. Maneely had then a wife and children living, answered the said plaintiff that if the said Joseph M. Maneely would designate the said Mary A. Lamon as the person entitled to receive the said sum of $1,000, in accordance with article 19, of the said constitution, then the said benefit would be paid as designated to the said Mary A. Lamon; whereupon, the said Mary A. Lamon, by the said William H. Maneely, her trustee, loaned to the said Joseph M. Maneely, the sum of $1,000, and the said Joseph M. Maneely, in accordance with said article 19 of the constitution, made and executed upon page 8, of a book authorized by the said corporation defendant for the purpose, the following designation, to wit:

"I, Joseph M. Maneely, being a member of Kensington Lodge, No. 5, K. of B., do hereby authorize and direct the payments allowed to me by the constitution and by-laws of the grand lodge thereof, to be made to William H. Maneely, trustee for Mary A. Lemen, and upon such payment being made, I, for myself, my heirs, administrators and assigns, hereby release said grand lodge from any liability or claim whatever.

---

*Reargument refused, May 9, 1887.

Witness my hand and seal this 8th day of February, 1881. Joseph M. Maneely. [L. S.]
Louis D. Belair. [L. S.]
Ebenezer Cobb. [L. S.]"

And said assignment and designation was witnessed by the said Ebenezer Cobb, as the secretary of said subordinate lodge of the said corporation defendant. The person therein named as "Mary A. Lemen," being the said Mary A. Lamon.

Subsequently the said Joseph M. Maneely became ill, and after so continuing for five months he died.

The said sum of $1,000, loaned as aforesaid, is still due and owing to the plaintiff by the said Joseph M. Maneely.

During the five months mentioned, in order that Joseph M. Maneely should not fall in arrears in the payments which he was required to make to the corporation defendant, and in order to be entitled to the $1,000 aforesaid upon his decease, the said Mary A. Lamon paid his dues to the St. Paul's Lodge, No. 481, of the Masonic Fraternity, of which he was a member, amounting to $13, and also paid his dues and assessments to the said subordinate lodge of the corporation defendant in the following sums, and upon the following dates, to wit: February 21, 1884, $7, March 20, 1884, $1, April 17, 1884, $2, May 5, 1884, $1, June 19, 1884, $1, July 17, 1884, $1; whereby the said Joseph M. Maneely remained up to the time of his death, a member in good standing of the said corporation defendant, and the said corporation defendant upon his death became bound to pay the sum of $1,000.

Upon the death of the said Joseph M. Maneely, the said plaintiff made demand of the said corporation defendant for the payment of the said sum of $1,000, in accordance with the said designation on its said books, which payment was refused.

The said Joseph M. Maneely left surviving him a widow, Caroline, and four minor children, to wit: Joseph L., aged 16 (born of a former marriage), Sarah, aged 12, Samuel, aged 10, and Martha, aged 8, children of said Caroline; and his said widow, Caroline, also made demand of the corporation defendant for the payment of the said sum, claiming that as widow she was entitled thereto, notwithstanding said designation, which payment was also refused.

Defendant is, however, ready and willing to pay the said sum to the person legally entitled to receive the same.

If, upon these facts, the court be of opinion that the said plaintiff is entitled in law to receive the said sum, then judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff, as against the corporation defendant, in the amount of $1,000 with interest from the 24th day of July, 1884. But if the court should be of opinion that the said plaintiff is not entitled to receive said sum, and that the said Caroline Maneely is entitled to receive the same, then judgment to be entered in favor of the said Caroline Maneely against the corporation defendant, for the said sum, with interest as aforesaid.

Judgment was entered for defendant on the facts in the case stated, and at the same time the following opinion was delivered, by ARNOLD, J.:

This is a hard case for the equitable plaintiff. She has bought and paid for a thing to which her vendor could not give her a good title. The charter of the defendant corporation declares its purpose to be the benefiting and aiding of the widows and orphans of deceased members.

The constitution (it had better have been called the by-laws) of the Society provides that the benefits shall be paid to such person or persons as the deceased may have designated to have received the same as appears by the books of the lodge, etc. Here is a direct conflict between the charter and the constitution. In such a case the charter must prevail; and under the charter the widow and orphans are entitled to the benefit as against an assignee of a deceased member. An amendment to the charter must be made if the members wish to have the power to assign their benefits for money to keep them in sickness, as Joseph M. Maneely did.

But we cannot give judgment for the widow in this suit, although the case stated provides that we may do so. She is not a party to the suit. How could an execution be issued in her favor? The judgment must be for the defendant corporation, not against it. It cannot be required to pay the money twice.

Supplee v. Knights of Birmingham, 18 W. N. C. 280, may be referred to, if authority is required for so plain a proposition.

A fi. fa. against a party in whose favor the judgment was given would be an anomaly. Judgment for the defendant in the case stated.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in entering judgment for the defendant and in not entering judgment for the plaintiff.

Messrs. Ellis Ames Ballard and Rufus E. Shapley, for plaintiff in error:

This court decided in Supplee v. Knights of Birmingham, 18 W. N. C. 280, that, under the constitution, a member by a designation of one not the widow can deprive the latter of the death benefit which would otherwise belong to her.

The section of the Corporation Act of 1874, under which this Corporation's charter was granted, provides that charters may be granted for the "maintenance of a society for beneficial or protective purposes to its members from funds collected therein." The constitution was, therefore, in accordance with the Act under which the Association was incorporated; and it was only the restriction (if there was one) in the articles of association which the lower court supposed to limit benefits to widows and orphans that is not in harmony with the Act. Besides, the view of the lower court would preclude unmarried men from the benefits of such associations.

Even if there can be any question as to the right of the widow, there can be none under the facts of this case as to the right of the plaintiff; and this on the ground of an express contract entered into by the company defendant with Joseph M. Maneely, and subsequently ratified and confirmed by the Company with the plaintiff.

It is plain that in two cases the Company is bound to pay twice: 1, where it has paid first to the wrong party; and 2, where it has bound itself to pay to the wrong party.

Mr. John S. McKinlay, for defendant in error:

Under the power conferred upon the District Court of Philadelphia County, by the Act of Assembly of March 11, 1836, in regard to interpleading, and by further legislation, upon the courts of common pleas of said county, it seems apparent that the court below could have treated the case stated as an interpleader between Mrs. Caroline Maneely and the plaintiff in error, and by its order have made her a party to the suit, after her voluntary appearance as a party to the case stated, if that did not of itself have that effect.

Some provision should be made in disposing of this suit, to carry out, if possible, the intent of the parties to the case stated, so as to free the defendant in error from the embarrassment of further litigation.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not, and of course cannot be, questioned, that, under the nineteenth article of the defendant's constitution, the contract in question in this case imposed a legal obligation upon the defendant to pay the money in controversy to the present plaintiff. The contract was made and performed by the deceased and this plaintiff, in strict conformity with all the requirements of the constitution and by-laws of the defendant, and the defendant is willing, to pay the money called for by the contract, but wishes to be protected against a possible wrong payment, and for that purpose only makes defense.

The learned court below was of opinion that there was a fatal conflict between the charter and the constitution, in respect of the persons who may receive benefits from the defendant company, and for that reason alone refused judgment to the plaintiff. The second section of the charter upon which this conclusion is based is in the following words:

"The purposes of this Corporation shall be the maintenance of a society for the purpose of benefiting and aiding the widows and orphans of deceased members."

Construing these words the learned court below held that it was not within the power of the defendant to stipulate for the payment of the benefits to any person other than the widow and orphans, who might be designated as the recipient by the deceased under article 19 of the constitution. We think this is too narrow and strained a view to take of the second section of the charter quoted above. While it is true that the general purpose of the Corporation is there stated to be the maintenance of a society for benefiting and aiding widows and orphans of deceased members, it must be observed that this is only the statement of a general purpose. It is only the recital of an object sought to be accomplished and which doubtless is accomplished in the great majority of cases, even though in exceptional cases the benefits may, by special contract, be paid to other persons than the widow or orphans.

There is no prohibitory or restrictive language, excluding from the powers of the Corporation the right to contract specially with the member for the payment of benefits to other persons than his widow or orphans. Nor is such a contract to be held void by reason of any necessary implication from the language of the charter; for the widow and orphans may be much benefited, and in many ways, by a contract designating another beneficiary—as, for instance, if the member, in his lifetime, desiring to establish a home for his wife and children, which they might hold after his death, borrowed money for that purpose, and so used it, and, to secure the loan, designated the lender as the beneficiary of his membership. Certainly his widow and orphans would be most materially benefited by such an arrangement. Or if, having a home, he met with disaster and was about to lose it by a judicial sale, and should save it by a similar provision, his widow and orphans would be thereby benefited. Or if, having property and also debts, but not to the point of insolvency, he could borrow money by means of a membership with such an association and he should become a member for that very purpose, the creditor possibly also paying the dues, and he could to that extent diminish his indebtedness during his life, and thus leave that much more of his property to his widow and orphans, undoubtedly they would be thereby benefited. Or he might borrow the money and give it directly to his wife or children during his life, pledging his membership to the lender as above; and then also they would receive the full advantage of the transaction without waiting until his death. Many more illustrations of a similar character might easily be suggested, but it is unnecessary. They all prove the same proposition, to wit: that it is entirely possible to benefit the widow or orphan by means of such a membership, although neither of them is the designated beneficiary; and hence, there is no necessary conflict between the second section of the charter and the nineteenth article of the constitution.

But again, the member may be unmarried, or he may have become a widower and without children during his life, although at the time his membership commenced he may have had both a wife and children. Surely, in such a case it would not be contended that the company would resist payment if the action were brought by an administrator, even though the money was needed only for the payment of debts, or if brought by a designated beneficiary who had loaned money on the faith of the membership. Further discussion does not seem to be required. We are of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the case stated.

Judgment reversed and judgment is now entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $1,000, with interest from the 24th day of July, A. D. 1884, and costs.

(Argued Jan. 14, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 178, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett, and Green, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 3 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

Reported below: Birnbaum v. Pass. Cond. Life Ins. Co. of the U. S. 2 Pa. C. C. R. 179.

The declaration was as follows:

The Passenger Conductors' Life Insurance Company of the United States was summoned to answer Sarah F. Birnbaum of a plea of trespass on the case on promises; and thereupon the said plaintiff by W. R. McAdam, Jr., her attorney, complains:

For that, whereas, heretofore, to wit: on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1882, Charles N. Birnbaum was a member of the Passenger Conductors' Life Insurance Company of the United States, the defendant, a Corporation incorporated under and by virtue of an Act of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved March 14, 1871, and he, the said Charles N. Birnbaum, being a member as aforesaid, to wit: a member of the first series of membership, the said defendant did agree, promise and undertake to and with the said Charles N. Birnbaum, for a sufficient consideration, to wit: the undertaking of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, that he should and would fulfill all duties due and owing to the said defendant company by reason of or arising out of his membership in the said defendant company, which said duties he has fulfilled, that if he, the said Charles N. Birnbaum, should die being still a member of the corporation defendant aforesaid, and intestate, that then and in such case the said corporation defendant, should and would pay unto the widow of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, a certain sum of money, to wit: the sum of $3,200; and the said plaintiff alleges that the said Charles N. Birnbaum died intestate on the 12th day of May, 1883; that he was at the time of his death a member of the said corporation defendant, entitled to all the privileges, immunities, rights and benefits of such membership, and that she, the said plaintiff, was at the time of the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, and still is the widow of the said Charles N. Birnbaum; that she has made due proof of the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, and done all other things required by the bylaws of the said defendant to be done by the said plaintiff, and that she is entitled to have and receive from the said defendant a certain large sum of money, to wit: the sum of $3,200; nevertheless, the said defendant disregarding its promises, agreement and undertaking, hath not paid to the said plaintiff the said sum of money, nor any part thereof, although often requested so to do; but the said defendant to pay the same hath hitherto wholly neglected and refused, and still doth neglect and refuse, to wit: at the county aforesaid, to the the damage of the said plaintiff $10,000; and therefore she brings this suit.

And also, for that, whereas, heretofore, to wit: on the 18th day of February, 1882, the said defendant, a Corporation incorporated under and by virtue of an Act of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved March 14, 1871, did agree, promise and undertake in conformity with the constitution and by-laws of the said defendant corporation, to and with Charles N. Birnbaum, the then husband of the said plaintiff, for a sufficient consideration, that if he, the said Charles N. Birnbaum, should die without having disposed, by his last will and testament, of the money, which money, to wit: the sum of $3,200, was to be paid upon the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, as hereinafter appears, that then the said defendant should and would pay or cause to be paid unto the said plaintiff the said sum of money, to wit: the sum of $3,200; provided the said Charles N. Birnbaum had performed during his lifetime certain duties by him to be performed according to the said agreement, promise and undertaking as set forth in the said constitution and by-laws of the said defendant corporation, which said constitution and by-laws are in the words following, to wit:

[Here follows a copy of constitution and by-laws.]

Which said constitution and by-laws the plaintiff brings here into court.

The plaintiff avers that the said defendant while in the exercise of its powers entered into said agreement, promise and undertaking to and with the said Charles N. Birnbaum, and executed and delivered to him, the said Charles N. Birnbaum, the following certificate in manner and words following, that is to say:

"No. 2521. Incorporated by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, March 14th, 1871.

Passenger Conductors' Life Insurance Co. of the United States.

This is to certify that Mr. C. N. Birnbaum, Conductor on North Penna. R. R., is a member of the Passenger Conductors' Life Insurance Company of the United States.

Given under my hand and corporate seal of the Company affixed this 18th day of February, A. D. 1882.

[Signed] A. H. Catlin,
President.
[Signed] Walter Lackey,
Sec'y and Treas."

[Countersigned by the Corresponding Member of the Road or Division.]

Which said certificate the said plaintiff here brings into court.

And the said plaintiff also avers that all the duties concerning or relating to the said agreement, promise and undertaking, necessary on the part of the said Charles N. Birnbaum and of the said plaintiff, to be complied with and performed according to the said agreement, promise and undertaking, have been well and truly complied with and performed at all times by the said Charles N. Birnbaum and the said plaintiff.

And the said plaintiff also avers that, to wit: on May 12, 1883, at the county aforesaid, the said Charles N. Birnbaum being the husband of the said plaintiff departed this life intestate, leaving surviving him his widow, the said plaintiff.

And the said plaintiff also avers that afterwards, to wit: at the county aforesaid, within sixty days after the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, reasonable and satisfactory proof of the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum was made by the said plaintiff to the said defendant, and received by the said defendant. And the said plaintiff and the said Charles N. Birnbaum have always from the time of the said promise, agreement and undertaking, performed and fulfilled all things on their part to be performed and fulfilled according to said agreement, promise and undertaking; and the said plaintiff in fact saith that the said defendant not regarding its said agreement, promise and undertaking, although often requested so to do, did not nor would, after said defendant had received reasonable and satisfactory proof of the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, as aforesaid, nor at any time thereafter, pay or cause to be paid unto the said plaintiff, and belonging to the said plaintiff, to wit: the sum of $3,200, or any part thereof, but has wholly neglected and refused so to do, and still neglects and refuses so to do, contrary to its said agreement, promise and undertaking, to wit: at the county aforesaid, to the damage of the said plaintiff, $10,000, and therefore she brings this suit.

And also for that, whereas, heretofore, to wit: on the 18th day of February, 1882, Charles N. Birnbaum was a member of the Passenger Conductors' Life Insurance Company of the United States, the defendant, a Corporation incorporated under and by virtue of an Act of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved March 14, 1871. And he, the said Charles N. Birnbaum, being a member as aforesaid, to wit: a member of the first series of membership, the said defendant did agree, promise and undertake to and with the said Charles N. Birnbaum for a sufficient consideration, to wit: the undertaking of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, that he should and would fulfill all the duties due and owing to the said defendant company by reason of or arising out of his membership in the said defendant company, which said duties he has fulfilled; that if he, the said Charles N. Birnbaum, should die, being still a member of the corporation defendant, aforesaid, and intestate, that then and in such case the said corporation defendant should and would pay unto the widow of the said Charles N. Birnbaum a certain sum of money, to wit: the sum of $3,200.

And the said plaintiff alleges that the said Charles N. Birnbaum, died intestate on the 12th day of May, 1883; that he was at the time of his death a member of the said corporation defendant, entitled to all the privileges, immunities, rights and benefits of such membership, and that she, the said plaintiff, was, at the time of the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, and still is, the widow of the said Charles N. Birnbaum; that she has made due proof of the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, and done all other things required by the by-laws of the said defendant to be done by the said plaintiff, and that she is entitled to have and receive from the said defendant a certain large sum of money, to wit: the sum of $3,200.

And the plaintiff avers that the said Charles N. Birnbaum has always been, up to the time of his death, ready and willing to perform all the duties to be performed by him, according to the said agreement, promise and understanding; and that he, the said Charles N. Birnbaum, has always performed his said duties under said agreement, promise and undertaking; and that the said Charles N. Birnbaum did repeatedly, to wit: on the third day of March, 1883, on the 9th day of March, A. D. 1883, on the 15th day of March, A. D. 1883, on the 22d day of March, A. D. 1883, on the 26th day of March, A.D. 1883, on the 20th day of April, A. D. 1883, and on the 7th day of May, A.D. 1883, go to the office of the said defendant, at the county aforesaid, between the hours of business, with a sum of money, to wit: the sum of $50, to be paid to the said defendant under the said agreement, promise and undertaking; but that on each of said goings to the said office at the county aforesaid, he, the said Charles N. Birnbaum, found the said office closed, and the said Charles N. Birnbaum could not get in said office, nor was there at the said office anyone to attend to the business of the said defendant, nor to receive the said money.

The plaintiff further avers that the defendant's agent's presence was necessary at the said office, in order that the said money should be paid by the said Charles N. Birnbaum.

The plaintiff also avers that since the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, a tender of said money has been made to the said defendant, and that the said defendant refused to receive the same, and still does refuse; and that the said plaintiff has been always and is now ready and willing to pay the same. And the said plaintiff and the said Charles N. Birnbaum have always, from the time of the said promise, agreement and undertaking, performed and fulfilled all things on their part to be performed and fulfilled, according to said agreement, promise and undertaking; and the said plaintiff in fact saith that the said defendant, not regarding its said agreement, promise and undertaking, although often requested so to do did not, nor would after the said defendant had received due proof of the death of the said Charles N. Birnbaum, nor at any time, pay or cause to be paid unto the said plaintiff the sum of money due to the said plaintiff, and which she is entitled to have, to wit: the sum of $3,200, or any part thereof, but has wholly neglected and refused so to do, and still neglects and refuses so to do, contrary to its said agreement, promise and undertaking, to wit: at the county aforesaid, to the damage of the said plaintiff $10,000; and, therefore, she brings this suit.

The defendant was an Association incorporated by Act of Assembly, March 14, 1871. By the second section of its charter "It shall have power to make such constitution and by-laws as they may deem proper to carry out the object of this Corporation."

Article II of the constitution was as follows: "The object of this Company is to collect money from its members for the relief of the widows, heirs or legal representatives of deceased members."

Article IV of the constitution prescribes "that members shall only be conductors of passenger or mixed passenger and freight trains."

By section 4, article I of the by-laws, it is made the duty of the directors "to order an assessment of two (2) dollars per member for the benefit of the person or persons entitled to receive such assessments upon the death of any member," and "to choose one of their number as chairman, who shall preside at meetings of the board in the absence of the president; said chairman shall indorse all checks drawn by the secretary and treasurer, and approve all proofs of death for which an assessment is to be ordered. Three members of the board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of all business."

Article V of the by-laws provides that "In case of intestacy of a member the money to be paid shall belong to and be paid to his widow."

Article VI of the by-laws enacts:

"Sec. 1. When the death of a member of this Company occurs, notice must be sent to the president and secretary; also a certificate from the attending physician, sworn to before a notary public, justice of the peace, or a clerk of a court of record, which must state the cause, time and place of death; also a notice of who, as representative of the decedent, is entitled to receive the benefits, giving the full name of such person, whether executor, widow or administrator. No assessment to be ordered by the board of directors, until the provisions of this section are complied with."

"Sec. 2. Upon the receipt of the proof of the death of a member as hereinbefore provided, the secretary shall submit said proof to the board of directors, and with their approval shall make the assessment, copies of which shall be sent to each corresponding member for the members on his road or division, and to each member not belonging to a road or division having such corresponding member."

By section 3, article 3, of the by-laws, "Each member shall, upon receipt of notice of an assessment, forward to the secretary and treasurer, or pay over to corresponding member the sum of two (2) dollars for the benefit of the person or persons entitled to receive the same on account of the death of a member; such money to be forwarded or paid over in time to be received by the secretary and treasurer within ninety (90) days of the date said assessment has been made."

And by section 3, article VI, it is provided, that "At the expiration of ninety (90) days from the date of assessments, the secretary and treasurer shall pay over such amounts as may have been collected on such death assessments to the party or parties entitled to receive the same, and said party or parties shall receipt for the amount so received, and release the Company from any further liability."

By article IV it is provided that "All assessments must be received by the treasurer within ninety (90) days after notice thereof shall have been sent by the treasurer to the corresponding member of each road or division, and to each member not belonging to a road or division having such corresponding member. The corresponding member is the agent of the individual members of his road or division, and this Company shall not be liable for the omission of a corresponding member to notify the individual members of his road or division of any assessment, or for his omission to remit amounts collected by him for such assessments; and no assessment shall be considered as having been paid until actually received by the treasurer whose receipt shall be the only evidence of such payment."

"In case the assessment due by any member shall not have been paid by him and received by the treasurer within ninety days after notice of its assessment shall have been sent by the treasurer to the corresponding member of the road or division to which such member may belong (or in case such member does not belong to a road or division having a corresponding member, then within ninety days after notice shall have been sent by the treasurer to such member), then such person shall immediately cease to be a member of this Company, and shall immediately forfeit all the rights, privileges and benefits thereof."

"The conduct or action of any officer or agent of this Company shall not be construed as having waived, changed or modified any of the provisions of this article."

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit to the first and second counts of the declaration and demurred to the third count. But the demurrer was overruled, with leave to plead; whereupon, a plea of non assumpsit was filed to the third count also.

At the trial the following facts appeared:

The plaintiff was the widow of Charles N. Birnbaum, the insured, who died intestate. Until four months he was a member of the defendant company.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the defendant, held December 5, 1882, notice was received of the death of three members: Skinner, Gay and Gillespie. The proofs of their deaths had not then been presented. In order that their families might not be delayed in getting the money that was coming to them (the next board meeting taking place in March) the board directed the chairman to examine the proofs when they should come, and if found correct by him, the secretary was directed to issue notices of an assessment.

The proofs afterwards came, were examined, and found correct, and the assessment on Skinner's death, No. 117, was issued in January, 1883. The assessments Nos. 118, 119, on Gay's and Gillespie's deaths, were issued in February, 1883. Charles N. Birnbaum had notice of all three assessments, but did not pay any of them. He died on 12th of May, 1883. The number of members at that day was about 807.

The plaintiff on the trial gave in evidence the charter, constitution and by-laws of the defendant, certificate of membership, called the secretary of defendant who proved above facts; and rested.

The court charged the jury, as follows:

The evidence establishes the membership of deceased, at the time of his death, under the constitution of defendant. Thereupon it was the duty of the Company to order an assessment, which it did not do. It would require an assessment of $2 upon each member, and it is as if the assessment on plaintiff's testator's death had been made. The defense is that deceased was delinquent in not having paid assesment No. 117, heretofore made on the death of Skinner, which occurred prior to January 1, 1883. If this January assessment had been properly made, the defense would be complete; but inasmuch as the assessment No. 117 was not made according to the constitution and by-laws, we must regard that assessment as illegal, and as if it never had been made, and the Association had no right to strike plaintiff's intestate from membership. He was a member at the time of his death, and as such had a right to recover, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff.

Verdict and judgment were accordingly for the plaintiff for $1,617.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court: 1, in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the third count of plaintiff's declaration; 2, in not charging the jury that plaintiff had failed to make out her case under the pleadings; 3, 4, in charging the jury as above; and 5, in refusing a motion in arrest of judgment.

No exceptions to the charge were taken at the trial.

Messrs. Norris S. Barratt and John Samuel, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff below did not prove the promise set forth in her declaration. Her narr. avers a promise to pay absolutely a certain sum.

The proof was (if any promise at all) a promise to assess each member $2, and to pay over what was collected. This is a substantial variance. Where the averment in the narr. is of an absolute promise, it will not be supported by proof of a conditional promise.

1 Chitty, Pl. 308, and notes; Stump v. Hutchinson, 11 Pa. 533.

It was not demurrable, because the promise as laid was (if proved) a good cause of action, and is therefore not cured by the verdict.

A certificate of membership in a mutual life insurance company provided that on the death of the wife of the plaintiff an assessment should be made upon the policyholders in the company for as many dollars as there were policy holders, and that the sum collected, not exceeding $1,000, should be paid to him within ninety days from the filing of the proof of death. Held, that a declaration containing no allegation of a neglect to make the assessment provided for, and assigning no breach except of a promise to pay $1,000, was fatally defective, and that the defect was not cured by the verdict.

Curtis v. Mut. Benefit Life Co. 48 Conn. 98.

The fundamental error of plaintiff below was in considering the contract between defendant and her husband as one of insurance on his life, and in declaring on it as such.

Although so named, plaintiff in error is not an insurance company. The object of a private corporation is not to be ascertained from its title.

Central Pa. Telephone & Supply Co. v. Thompson, 2 Cent. Rep. 544.

The charter, constitution and by-laws show that it was a mere machine to collect assessments. It is substantially a beneficial or mutual aid association. It has no fixed capital. It is not bound to pay any fixed sum on the death of a member, but only so much as may be collected of that which may voluntarily be paid by surviving members. It cannot be enforced by law.

Commonwealth v. Nat. Mut. Aid Asso. 94 Pa. 488.

It has no assets. The money which it collects on a member's death does not belong to it, but to the nominee or representative of the deceased member. It is but a conduit into which flows the contributions of members, and through which they are transmitted to the parties to whom they belong.

State v. Mut. Protection Asso. 26 Ohio St. 19.

In the present instance these cases are strengthened by the fact that all the members of plaintiff in error must be car conductors—an occupation of the greatest risk to life, and, therefore, most unfit for life insurance; and there is no discrimination in rates for the age of the members.

The objection to the form of the action here is not a technical, but a substantial one, because the judgment in this case is a general one, and binds all assets (if any) of the plaintiff in error, and will not be limited to assessments collected for defendant in error; Seitzinger v. New Era Life Asso. 2 Cent. Rep. 307, 111 Pa. 557; so that should assessments hereafter be collected for the benefit of others, an execution under this judgment would sweep them away, and this, although the supreme court has held that the fund arising from such assessments is neither the estate of the member on whose death they are collected, nor the property of plaintiff in error; but that it is merely a trustee to collect what members, under fear of loss of membership, may voluntarily pay, and hand over what they receive to those entitled.

Hodge's App. and Morrell's Est. 8 W. N. C. 209, 183; Williams' App. and Vollman's App. 92 Pa. 69, 50; Thompson v. Adams, 93 Pa. 55; Folmer's App. 87 Pa. 133.

That plaintiff below cannot recover in this action is evident from another consideration. The promise upon which she sues was not made to her; therefore, if this be one of that class of cases where one can sue on a promise made to another, it can be only in the case where the promising party has had property put in his hands for the benefit of the third party.

Torrens v. Campbell, 74 Pa. 475; Guthrie v. Kerr, 85 Pa. 308.

Here, there is no pretense of any property in hands of plaintiff in error for Mrs. Birnbaum's use. No action by the party entitled to the fund in his own name lies against such an association.

Fairchild v. North Eastern Mut. Life Asso. 51 Vt. 613.

Messrs. W. R. McAdam, Jr., and Henry Budd, for defendant in error:

The second assignment is unsupported by any bill of exceptions. The learned judge was never asked to charge that the plaintiff had failed to make out her case under the pleadings. No points were presented.

Assessment No. 117 and the subsequent ones were without any authority from the board of directors; hence, at the time of Birnbaum's death, on May 12, 1883, there existed no assessment which he was bound to pay, or for which the time for payment had expired; for the irregular assessment was as no assessment at all.

Roswell v. Equitable Aid Union, 15 Rep. 5.

In this case the Act of incorporation mentions the objects of the Corporation only by calling it "The Passenger Conductors' Life Insurance Company of the United States;" still, it is a matter of indifference whether the Company be called an insurance company or not.

State v. Mut. Protection Asso. 26 Ohio St. 19, is not in point.

Mrs. Birnbaum could maintain this action. If one person makes a promise for the benefit of a third, that third may maintain an action upon it.

Marchington v. Vernon, 1 Bos. & P. note 101; Strohecker v. Grant, 16 Serg. & R. 239; Hubbert v. Borden, 6 Whart. 93; Blymire v. Boistle, 6 Watts, 183.

But this the counsel for plaintiff in error deny, and say that the third person can sue in assumpsit "only in the case where the promising party has had property put into his hands for the benefit of the third person," and cite Torrens v. Campbell, 24 Pa. 475, and Guthrie v. Kerr, 85 Pa. 308.

These cases do not, however, support the position they are cited to sustain.

As to the contention of the plaintiff in error, that there was a variance between the narr. and the proof of a character incurable by verdict, it is sufficient to say that whatever is amendable below will be considered above as having been amended. Had the point been raised on motion for a nonsuit, and had the judge been of opinion that the insertion of the words "have not levied an assessment or," was essential to the right to recover, such insertion would have been at once made, and, this being the case, this court will consider the amendment as made.

Kelsey v. Nat. Bank of Crawford Co. 69 Pa. 426.

There can be no pretense here that the defendant was misled, and it is well settled that where there has been a trial on the merits, and the defendant has not been misled, a verdict will not be disturbed.

Brown v. Gilmore, 92 Pa. 40.

An objection which might have been raised on demurrer comes too late after verdict; Commonwealth v. Davis, 4 Phila. 95; and it is to be noted that in the case cited the demurrer which bound the defendant was not his own but the plaintiff's demurrer.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

The first assignment of error was not pressed upon the argument. Indeed, it was admitted that the narr. sets forth a good cause of action and is not demurrable. The real ground of complaint was that the plaintiff did not prove her case as laid in the narr. As this point is not before us it does not require discussion. It is true the second assignment avers that "The learned judge below erred in not charging the jury that plaintiff had failed to make out her case under the pleadings." The court was not asked to so charge, nor do we see anything in the paper book of the plaintiff in error to show that the attention of the court was called to this subject. Nor is this assignment sustained by exception.

So also of the third and fourth assignments, in which error is averred in the charge of the court. The paper book contains nothing from which we can infer that an exception to the charge of the court was taken. No bill of exceptions is printed, and for aught we know there was none. If such matters as these do not appear in the paper book, we must presume that they do not exist.

The fifth and last assignment alleges that the court erred in not arresting the judgment. As the narr. sets forth a good cause of action this assignment is not sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA & NEW YORK CANAL & R. R. CO., Plff. in Err.,

v.

Emma J. HUFF et al.

In an action to recover damages for the death of a person killed by a railroad train, while attempting to ride over the track at a public crossing, in a wagon driven by his servant, where the evidence showed that when deceased approached the track he stopped, looked and listened, and the contention was whether the place where he stopped was a suitable one to see and hear, and whether due effort was made to ascertain if a train was approaching; held, that the evidence justified a finding for plaintiff, and that it was not error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury that under all the evidence the plaintiff could not recover, and that unless the deceased stopped at a certain point and looked, plaintiff could not recover.

(Argued March 17, Decided March 28, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, No. 333, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Bradford County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiffs in an action to recover for the death of plaintiffs' intestate at a railroad crossing. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs' intestate while riding in a lumber wagon with his hired man, Walker, who was driving, on a public highway crossing defendant's railroad, was struck by an irregular train consisting of a locomotive and an express car, running at a high rate of speed, and was instantly killed.

At the trial in the court below before MORROW, P. J., it appeared that the railroad ran about north and south, and that the highway crossed the same at a right angle; the train in question was bound south and Huff, the deceased, and Walker were approaching the crossing from the west; the view of the railroad from the highway towards the north in the direction of the approaching train was greatly obstructed on the west side by an orchard and a coal shed, the latter standing in the angle formed by the highway and the railroad. The coal house is 17½ feet from the west rail of the south bound track, on which the train in question was running. It appeared that the view of the track, after passing the coal house on the road, was unobstructed for a distance of a mile or so; but the view before reaching that spot was somewhat limited, and at the time of the accident a strong south wind was blowing. It appeared from the testimony of Walker, who was plaintiffs' principal witness, that they stopped before reaching the crossing and looked both ways, but did not see the approaching train or hear any noise of the same until the moment they were struck.

Other evidence was given that the parties stopped and looked before approaching the crossing, but the evidence was quite conflicting as to the spot where they stopped; the principal part of this evidence was fairly reviewed by the judge in his charge to the jury.

The defendant, inter alia, presented the following points:

1. That under all the evidence in the case the plaintiffs cannot recover.

Ans. We refuse to charge as requested in this point.

2. That unless the jury find from the evidence that Huff or Walker stopped their team after passing the coal house, and looked in the direction in which the train was coming, it was negligence per se, and the plaintiffs cannot recover.

Ans. This point is affirmed, if you find that Mr. Huff did not stop, look and listen west of the coal house. Even if he did, I submit to you to say whether it was a proper place for him to stop, look and listen, with the wind blowing from the south, and the view to the north obstructed by the orchard; if it was not, it was negligence to drive on the track without stopping and looking east of the coal house; and the plaintiffs cannot recover.

4. That, unless the jury find from the evidence that Walker looked up the track after passing the coal house and before the accident, the plaintiffs cannot recover.

Ans. The point is refused. The undisputed evidence is he did not look up the track at this point. If they had not stopped, looked and listened west of the coal house, it was negligence to drive on the track, as sworn to by Walker, and the plaintiffs cannot recover.

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiffs for $5,750.

After hearing of motion for a new trial the court ordered plaintiffs "to remit from the verdict all in excess of $2,500 and file no bill of costs; rule for a new trial to be discharged; otherwise, to be made absolute and a new trial granted."

The plaintiffs remitted all in excess of $2,500; and judgment was entered accordingly.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in refusing the motion for a compulsory nonsuit and the answers to defendant's points given above.

Messrs. Davies & Hall, and Henry Streeter, for plaintiff in error:

It is uncontradicted that there is a practically level piece of ground, 17½ feet wide, between the coal house and the west rail, on the approach to the track from the cross road upon which Mr. Huff and Walker were traveling. It was their plain duty to have stopped at that place; and the learned court should have said so in plain, unmistakable language.

Messrs. Evans & Maynard, and Rodney A. Mercur, for defendants in error:

The rule is that where there is any evidence which alone would justify an inference of the disputed fact, it must go to the jury, no matter how strong or persuasive may be the countervailing proof.

The judge at the trial charged that "The rule is imperative that his duty was to stop, look and listen before driving on the track. If he approached the track without having stopped and looked and listened, he cannot recover, because it was negligence per se." Again: "The evidence of the other witnesses bearing upon this question you will call into consideration in determining this question whether they did stop; because if they did not stop west of the coal house, then it was their duty to have stopped down by the track; and if their view was obstructed there and they could not see, it was their duty to get out and see if there was a train coming. It has been said in one case that when the view is obstructed so they cannot see, it is the duty of the person or traveler to get out and take his horse by its head and look."

It is the duty of the engineer, when his train approaches a public highway, to give warning by sounding whistle or other sufficient alarm.

Also to give proper and timely warning of the approach of its trains.

Also to give sufficient long and loud warning of some kind.

Such warning must be reasonable and timely.

The failure of an engineer approaching a highway to give warning is negligence per se.

If the train was a special one, it was more incumbent upon the Company to slacken their speed and sound the whistle and ring the bell, than if the train were running on regular time.

Continental Improvement Co. v. Stead, supra.

Per Curiam:

It would clearly have been error for the court to have taken this case from the jury. Henry Huff was killed while attempting to ride over the railroad at a public crossing. The unquestioned evidence is that when he approached the railroad he stopped, looked and listened. The contention was whether the place where he stopped was a suitable one to see and hear, and whether due effort was made to ascertain if a train was approaching. The evidence as to this was well submitted by the court and justified the finding of the jury.

We see no error in the charge nor in the answers to the points.

Judgment affirmed.

v.
Tomas CAMPOY Y PARDO.

1. If a writing which is in the possession of the opposite party is required to be given in evidence, notice to produce the original must be given to him or his attorney; and without proof of such notice secondary evidence of the contents of the writing cannot be given.
2. The fact that the opposite party is in a foreign country, where he resides, does not affect the application of the rule.
3. Evidence of agency insufficient to submit to the jury.

(Argued March 30, Decided April 11, 1887.)

JANUARY Term, 1886, No. 304, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Trunkey, Sterrett, Green, and Clark, JJ.

Error to Common Pleas No. 4 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

The facts as they appeared at the trial are stated in the opinion of the court on a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted, by ARNOLD, J.:

This is an action of assumpsit commenced May 19, 1884, by a writ of foreign attachment. The defendant is a citizen and resident of Spain. The plaintiff claimed commissions on a contract for the sale of 16,000 tons of iron ore by the defendant to Alfred Earnshaw, the garnishee, which sale the plaintiff alleged that he negotiated; also for services in translating the contract from the Spanish to the English language; and also for money loaned and expended by the plaintiff on account of the defendant.

The plaintiff's dealings were not with the defendant in person, but with his son, Tomas Campoy, Jr.; and the main question in dispute was whether the son was the general agent of his father. In order to prove the agency the plaintiff compelled the attendance of the son of the defendant by a subpena duces tecum, requiring him to produce all the letters which he had received from his father since he arrived in America, in August, 1881. The son produced a large bundle of letters, from which the plaintiff extracted and used two, one of them dated April 13, 1882, and the other May 13, 1882. It was then asserted by the plaintiff that there was another letter bearing upon the question of agency, dated December 3, or 4, 1881.

The son testified that he had produced all the letters from his father which he had in his possession; that his letters had been in the possession of a Mr. Mares, of Baltimore; that he did not remember whether there was a letter from his father dated in December, 1881, but that if there was, Mr. Mares must have it; that he had not asked Mr. Mares for his letters since October, 1883; and that the last time he saw them was within the last year, when Mr. Mares produced them in the Court of Common Pleas No. 2, of this county, and they were read to the jury in a case then being tried in that court.

Mr. Earnshaw testified that he entered into a contract with the defendant for the purchase of the iron ore, and that the plaintiff translated the contract; and that by direction from the defendant, he paid the commissions to his son. The plaintiff then proposed to prove by his own testimony, the contents of a letter from the defendant to his son, dated December 3, or 4, 1881, and that he had read the letter, to which objection was made on the ground that notice to produce the letter had not been given to the defendant. The evidence was rejected.

In order to enable the plaintiff to produce the letter or prove it it by depositions on a commission, or to give notice to the defendant to produce it, so as to prepare the way for the reception of secondary evidence at another trial, I told the plaintiff that I would withdraw a juror and continue the case; but he, acting on his own judgment, refused to accept the offer, and insisted on going to the jury.

It is laid down as elementary law that if a writing, which is in the possession of the opposite party is required to be given in evidence, notice to produce the original must be given to him, or, as is more proper, to his attorney. 2 Phil. Ev. 10th ed. p. 525.

If the instrument is in the possession of the adverse party, before secondary evidence of its contents can be admitted it must be shown that he has received notice to produce it. Id. p. 519.

In certain cases, although the instrument which is required is not in the possession of the party to the suit, but in the possession of a third person, yet, if there is a privity between such third person and the party, or if the instrument may be considered as under the control of the party, it is deemed to be virtually in his possession; and therefore a notice to produce it, given to the party himself, will, in such cases, be sufficient. Id. pp. 521, 522.

It does not follow that on notice being given, the party is compellable to give evidence against himself; or that, if he refuses to produce the paper required, such a circumstance is considered as conclusive against him; but the consequence will be that the other party, who has done all in his power to supply the best evidence, will be allowed to go into evidence of an inferior kind, and may read an examined copy, or give parol evidence of the contents.

Without proof of notice to the opposite party to produce the original writing, which is in his possession, secondary evidence of its contents cannot, in general, be given. This rule has been made with good reason, that parties may obtain the best evidence in their power. When it is traced to the hands of the opposite party, no further evidence can be given of it, without a notice to produce. Id. pp. 525, 526.

These are the elementary rules. The application of them in the myriad of reported cases shows no material deviation from them.

Where a paper was traced to the hands of an agent of a party, and notice had been given to produce it, and the party showed that it had been delivered by the agent to the stamp officer to have it stamped, the other party was allowed to give parol evidence of its contents. Sinclair v. Stevenson, 1 Carr. & P. 582.

It will be observed that in this case notice to produce the paper had been given; and it appearing that the notice had not been served in time, the matter was disposed of on that ground. If a check drawn by a party to a cause is proved to be in the hands of his banker (having been paid), the other party may call for it under a notice to produce; and he need not call the banker's clerk. Burton v. Payne, 2 Carr & P. 520.

And a paper deposited in a court of equity by a party who has leave to withdraw it is sufficiently under his control and power to let in secondary evidence of its contents, after notice and refusal to produce it. Rush v Peacock, 2 Moody & Rob. 162; Jackson v. *Shearman, 6 Johns. 19; but it is otherwise if the document is held by a stakeholder between the party in the cause and a third person. Perry v. Mays, 1 Hill (S. C.) 76.

Where it appeared that the muniments of the plaintiff's title were in the hands of his counsel at a former trial, it was held that the conclusion was that he could have produced them if he had pleased; and notice to produce the papers having been served a reasonable time beforehand, it was further held that the defendant had done all that the law required of him to entitle him to give secondary evidence of the execution and contents of the papers. M'Kellip v. M'Ilhenny, 4 Watts, 317.

It will be observed that in that case the court said that the defendant, by giving the notice to produce, had done all that the law required of him; from which the converse may be fairly deduced: that if he had not given the notice, he had not done all that the law required of him before offering secondary evidence.

To the same effect is Irwin v. Lever, 2 Foster & F. 296. The semble which the reporters put in the syllabus, that it would have been so even without notice to the attorney, must be confined to the agent and not to the principal, as to whom notice is not dispensed with.

In general it may be said that the fact of agency cannot be proved by parol while the written evidence of it exists; M'Kinney v. Leacock, 1 Serg. & R. 27; James v. Gordon, 1 Wash. C. C. 333; May v. May, 1 Porter (Ala.) 229; nor can the declarations and acts of a man be given in evidence to prove that he is the agent of another. Plumsted v. Rudebagh, 1 Yeates, 502; James v. Stookey, 1 Wash. C. C. 330; Whiting v. Lake, 91 Pa. 349; Owen v. Evans, 40 Legal Int. 26.

There are, however, some exceptions to this; as, for instance, when the defendant alleged that he had settled with the agent, who was also the wife of the plaintiff, and offered a witness to prove that he saw the power of attorney and what its contents were, it was held that while the defendant must produce the writing or give notice to produce it, so as to entitle him to give secondary evidence of its contents, yet he might give evidence of the plaintiff's admission that he had given the power: Curtis v. Ingham, 2 Vt. 289; and this without previous notice to produce it; but as to this last, the learned annotator to 1 Phillipps on Evidence puts a query on page 515, note 148; and so where it is plain that the notice would have been unavailing, as in the case where it is proved that the power of attorney has been destroyed by fire, in that case the person to whom the power was given was admitted to prove its contents; Jackson v. Neely, 10 Johns. 374; Cornett [Nash] v. Williams, 20 Wall. 226 [87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 254]; and also where the paper is proved to be lost or destroyed: Fox v. Wood, 1 Rawle, 143; Burton v. Driggs, 20 Wall. 125 [87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 299]; but the loss of the power of attorney must be first proved, before receiving secondary evidence of the declarations of the principal as to its contents. De Haven v. Henderson, 1 Dall. 424 [1 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 206]; Vanhorn v. Frick, 3 Serg. & R. 278.

The statement in Burton v. Driggs, supra (that if books or papers, necessary as evidence, be in the possession of a person living in another State, secondary evidence may be given to prove the contents of such papers, and that notice to produce them is unnecessary), must be confined to cases like that, in which the books and papers were in the hands of a third person, who was not subject to the control of the opposite party; in which case notice would be useless, and of which books and papers the evidence offered was a copy of a lost deposition which proved the contents thereof.

In this State the rule has always been strictly adhered to; and if a party desires to prove the contents of a paper which is in the hands of his adversary, notice to produce it must be given. Alexander v. Coulter, 2 Serg. & R. 494; Eilbert v. Finkbeiner, 68 Pa. 243.

But to this there are some exceptions, as in trover, replevin and detinue, and other actions directly upon the paper, the plaintiff may give parol evidence of its contents, without giving notice to produce the paper, because the form of the action gives all the notice that is required. M'Clean v. Hertzog, 6 Serg. & R. 154.

And so it is in England; Hammond v. Plank,

P.* 143; and so on an indictment for stealing a bill no obligatory proof of its contents may be given without notice to produce, differing in this respect from the English rule.

Commonwealth v. Messinger, 1 Binn. 273.

And on an indictment for forging bank notes, parol evidence of letters received by the defendant from an accomplice may be given without a notice to produce them; U. S. v. Doebler, 1 Baldw. 519; because otherwise guilty persons might escape, as it is not in the power of the Government to withdraw the case from the jury and put the defendant in jeopardy a second time.

Where the party to be affected by a letter is a merchant, it will be presumed that he kept a letter book, which would have afforded better evidence than mere parol proof of the contents of the letter; therefore, when sufficient notice to produce the letter book has not been given, an extract from a lost letter cannot be given in evidence. Dennis v. Barber, 6 Serg. & R. 420; Coxe v. England, 65 Pa. 212.

The question whether proof that a paper is out of the State will, alone, be a sufficient foundation for secondary evidence of its contents, without further efforts to obtain it, has been decided in the negative in Connecticut and Louisiana. Townsend v. Atwater, 5 Day (Conn.) 298; Lewis v. Beatty, 8 Martin (La.) N. S. 287.

In Kentucky secondary evidence of a paper proved to be out of the State was admitted, the court likening the case to that of a subscribing witness who is absent from the State. The fact that there was such a paper came out on cross examination; and the question whether notice to produce it was required was not mooted. Boone v. Dyke, 3 T. B. Mon. 532.

In New York a paper so situated is allowed to be proved on a commission, without requiring it to be produced in court. Bailey v. Johnson, 9 Cow. 115.

In South Carolina a party offered parol evidence of a paper which was in the hands of his agent, who had gone to another State; and it was held inadmissible, because no commission had been sent to examine the agent or ascertain what had become of the paper, and there was, besides, some reason for suspecting a design to suppress it. The question whether notice to produce was necessary did not arise, as the evidence was offered by the principal; but the judgment is important in this respect, it attributes the suppression of the paper to the principal, because it was presumed to be in his control; and if the other party had offered the evidence, it would have been admitted, provided notice to produce it had been given. Bunch v. Hurst, 3 Desau. Eq. 290. See also, as to whom the consequence of the suppression of a paper is to be imputed, Hart v. Yunt, 1 Watts, 253.

In this State a deposition which went to prove the contents of a paper was rejected, because it was not shown that the paper was unattainable. M'Kee v. Reiff, 4 Yeates, 340.

The great desire of the court in insisting upon the best evidence of the contents of a paper, by requiring its production, on notice, or proof under a commission, before receiving secondary evidence of its contents, is to save the party to be affected by it from a parti-colored account of the paper, when better evidence can be had. Dwyer v. Collins, 7 Exch. 639.

The present is a case in which the wisdom and justice of the rule are so plain that they cannot be gainsaid. The defendant is in Spain, where he resides. His case here is defended by his counsel, who is without a client to advise or witnesses to assist him. He can do nothing but look on and see that his client is condemned on legal evidence only, and to prevent the reception of any evidence which is improper. If, as the plaintiff alleges, the son of the defendant was also his agent, his counsel was entitled to reasonable notice to produce the letter which is said to have been written, but not proved to be lost, which vitally affects the case, and which is potentially in his possession or control; and of which he may be presumed to have a copy which he could have produced, in case he could not get the original; otherwise, he might be overwhelmed by what Mr. Justice Woodward, in Ellis v. Guggenheim, 20 Pa. 287, called the "compendious criticism" of a witness, himself an interested party, who would give his interpretation of the letter, rather than its contents.

The letters of April 13, and May 13, 1882, do not prove that the defendant's son was his general agent. They merely show that the defendant authorized his son to sell the iron ore on a commission fixed by the letters. It seems too plain to require any citation of authority to show that an agent authorized to sell on a commission is not a general agent, and that he has no power to employ other agents under him at the expense of his principal; nevertheless, if authority be wanted, the principle may be found in the maxims that one agent cannot lawfully appoint another in his place, for a delegated authority cannot be redelegated; Broom, Legal Maxims, *839–40; and the application of the principle may be found in Hill v. Canfield, 63 Pa. 77.

If the agent does employ another, he is responsible for the acts of his substitute or assistant; Bradstreet v. Everson, 72 Pa. 124; Morgan v. Tener, 3 W. N. C. 398; and consequently liable for his compensation.

The commissions agreed to be paid include all that the principal is liable for, and they cannot be increased without his consent; Freeman v. Shreve, 86 Pa. 135; otherwise he might be called upon to pay away the entire proceeds of his property to a succession of brokers not selected by himself, but depending upon each other for authority.

The letter from the defendant to the plaintiff, dated February 4, 1882, is simply an expression of thanks for the kindness of the plaintiff to the defendant's son, and the solicitude of the father for the welfare of his son. It contains nothing of a contractual nature, nor any admission that the son was invested with unlimited authority to bind his father. If such letters are to be perverted so as to raise an obligation to pay for the amenities of life, the writing of letters of courtesy and interchanges of civility must cease, unless they are accompanied with a protest that they are not intended as an acknowledgment of a liability to pay for the amenities bestowed, and are concluded with a nota bene that they are sent "without prejudice."

As there is nothing in the evidence to prove that Tomas Campoy, Jr., was the general agent of the defendant, the claim of the plaintiff lacks this material prop to support it, and the jury were properly instructed to render a verdict for the defendant.

The following are the letters of April 13, May 13, and February 4, 1882, heretofore referred to, written by Tomas Campoy y Pardo to his son:

Translations of inclosures in letter of Tomas Campoy y Pardo to his son, dated Portman, April 13, 1882. Private.

"Tomas, the business that you do with Mares, I cannot give more than what I tell you both in the letter, on account of furnishing you superior ore; but if the offer which I sent you is accepted by a good house, whether it be for the whole amount which I say or for one half of it, you may count on it that I will give you for commission five cents per ton and besides five cents per unit gained over 50 per cent. You see this is half of the profits for you, and the other half for me. Keep all this to yourself; and whenever those conditions are accepted you must rely on what I said. Now try to do business; but the most important is to deal with good houses. Tomas, be careful of what you are doing on account of your being there. All parties here have contracts for minerals except myself.

Preparing for your transactions I have accumulated stocks, but am in need of funds; tell me how much money you have received this year from Messrs. Holloway Bros. Make Mares, if you both want me to send some cargoes besides the one I am going to send, remit drafts on Barcelona on signing bills of lading. If not I cannot send you any more than the one cargo. Your brothers-in-law all have gone away, as they consider it humiliating to stay with me earning a salary. If the contract is accepted, telegraph me.

Tomas, I approve with pleasure your arrangements with Mr. Mares, and you may rest easy that if you have little business and I make any contract with Earnshaw direct, I will write him, particularly if I obtain two reals more per ton, and will tell him what he has to give you apart of what I give you both for commission. You will understand that the letter will be in a form to be presented to Mr. Mares and Earnshaw. It is convenient to hurry, stirring up business for next year, but in some way not showing great audacity."

"Portman, May 13, 1882.

"Dear Son: I have received yours of the 25, April, and I am informed of its contents, seeing that you are well, and, thank God, we are the same at present. Tomas, what you tell me, referring to business, that you have formed a partnership with Mr. Mares, is all right; and it is necessary that you notify me in time if at any time you should make any contracts that any document that you should require to be sent, whether it is to be named or entitled Campoy & Mares or Mares & Campoy, for me to have an understanding of all the business. In reference to what you say, that I must speak to Bapata, to ask him to fix a commission for you. I do not speak to him (particularly on business), as you know how mean he is; and in this bad season that I am passing through, he has injured somewhat my business; still I have sent him word through his nephew. What you ought to do is to address him a letter, as though you had not heard from me, saying that on account of having formed a copartnership with a gentleman of that place (without telling him who he is), that it is necessary for him to fix a commission, as otherwise you will not be able to attend to his business; but I must warn you that when he replies to you or to Mr. Mares, with the purpose of doing business direct with you both, and you should accept some contract, I would withdraw my connection with you immediately, because you know as well as I do that he would establish opposition to me at the mines. To make the business a success it would be convenient that you both should take hold of all the foundries possible, as I have most of the mines and animals necessary. You had better tell this to Mr. Mares, for him to bear in mind all these convenient particulars, because these indications are the principal bases to obtain good minerals, which could not be done without several parties.

Your question about what commission I will give you both, I have told you on several occasions that for both to have a success I cannot give you the minerals at less than thirty-four reals per ton, alongside of vessels; and with that idea I have closed for two years the Escondrigo, which is the best of the mines, as you know very well that it costs there fifteen reals per ton, fifteen reals transportation and four reals shipment. I have no other advantages than the proximity of the mines and what I may earn in shipments and advances in dispatch money, as I have established four gangs, and when the opportunity is offered I can ship 600 tons or more in a working day, and you can make the difference in price, besides half of the percentage gained over 50% and half of the dispatch money as this is the custom here. Do not Jew me down too much in the arrangements, as you know that this would prevent me from procuring good minerals, and the prejudice would be against me and you also. Above all, do not be ambitious, because to become rich does not require haste. Do not forget in making contracts that the moisture is to be deducted from the weight and not from the units. Nothing else at present. Our compliments to Mr. Mares, and love for you from all the family.

Your Father,

Tomas Campoy."

February 4, 1882.

"My Dear Sir:

I received yours dated January 11, by which I see with pleasure the pleasant relations which my son has together with yourself; because, as you may understand, my desire is that he avail himself of friends that will not deceive him, and will advise him and guide him in what he is ignorant of; consequently your assurance has filled me with satisfaction. With respect to what you tell me with regard to business, my object in sending him there has been solely for that purpose, and the only thing that delays me in pushing this business is the waiting till he is acquainted with the language and customs of the country, as well as the manner of conducting business, and (on the other hand) besides the vessel freights are so high that they exceed the ordinary costs of seven or eight shillings. Notwithstanding what I here say of the stacks of (iron ore) that have accummulated since he left me, I am putting aside superior qualities with the object of sending them to him in a cargo of 500 to 600 tons, so that he may examine them and my son ascertain the way of making contracts and——what it interests me is to send cargo on my own account by contract and on these particulars, I have already given my instructions and I——you that what would suit me better will be making contracts for large quantities. I believe the freights being as I mention there is better chance of obtaining them there than here, and besides it is necessary that funds should be placed by people who contract for the ore, in the Bank of London, to be able to draw against them; for, as you know, if the contract should be a large one, it would not be possible to send many vessels, or hope for a realization of their cargoes there (in America.) Without further to note to-day, I thank you for the interest you manifest in my son and business, and I avail myself of this to assure you, I am,

"Yours Truly."

The assignments of error specified: 1, the refusal of the court to admit evidence as to the contents of the letter of December 3, 1881; 2, the rejection of the letter of February 4, 1882; 3, the refusal to allow testimony as to the kind and value of services rendered by the plaintiff, and 4, the instruction of the court to find for the defendant.

Mr. William Drayton, for plaintiff in error:

The reason of the rule requiring a notice to produce before offering parol testimony is to notify the person who has control of a paper to produce it. Here we did notify the very person who naturally would have such control, who had last had the letter and who testified on the stand, not that he had returned it to his father or to his father's counsel, but that he had left it in a foreign jurisdiction. Having thus accounted for its absence plaintiff was entitled to proceed; for proof that a letter is beyond the jurisdiction of the court is identical with proof of its destruction, and secondary evidence is admissible.

Burton v. Driggs, 20 Wall, 125 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 299); Fox v. Wood, 1 Rawle, 143.

This is so when it is known beforehand that the paper is out of the jurisdiction; but when it is ascertained before the trial that the paper is in the possession of a witness, the fact that it is removed from the jurisdiction, without the knowledge of the party seeking to use it, will excuse him from further efforts; as in Leeds v. Cook, 4 Esp. 256, where a letter was before the trial handed over, by the witness subpenaed to produce it, to one of the parties, the letter not being produced Lord Ellenborough said he would admit evidence of its contents; that it belonged to the witness called and was subtracted in fraud of the subpena.

In England the general rule is that if the fact is known prior to the trial that a document is out of the jurisdiction of the court, a demand must first be made on the party known to possess the document.

Boyle v. Wiseman, 10 Exch. 647; 11 Exch. 360; Crispin v. Doglioni, 32 L. J. U. S. Prob. Div. 109.

But it must be made on the party legally entitled to the custody.

Freeman v. Arkell, 2 Barn. & C. 494; Crispin v. Doglioni, supra.

The American rule is that if from the nature of the case itself it is manifest that a more satisfactory kind of evidence exists, the party will be required to produce it; but where the nature of the case does not of itself disclose the existence of such better evidence the objector must not only prove its existence, but must also prove that it was known to the other party in season to have been produced at the trial.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 84, n. 2.

If, therefore, the paper is in the possession of one who refuses, on the ground of privilege, to produce it, secondary evidence may be given of its contents.

Ditcher v. Kenrick, 1 Carr. & P. 161; Marston v. Downes, and Mills v. Cady, 6 Carr & P. 381, 782; Doe v. Ross, 7 Mees. & W. 121; Newton v. Chaplin, 10 C. B. 356; Lynde v. Judd, 3 Day (Conn.), 499.

These are all cases where attorneys who had been subpenaed to produce papers refused, on the ground that they held them as attorneys for third persons, and in every case secondary evidence was admitted.

If the paper is out of the jurisdiction of the court, and in the possession of one who refuses to allow it to be brought in, secondary evidence is of course admissible.

Carpenter v. Bailey, 56 N. H. 283, was the case of a letter, on the files of the Navy Department, alleged to contain a libel. The secretary declined to permit its removal, and parol evidence of its contents was given, and not by deposition.

U. S. v. Reyburn, 6 Pet. (31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 424) was the case of a privateer whose papers could not be obtained.

Nor is there any difference between a copy and parol evidence of contents. If the oral testimony is clear as to the language used in the letter, it is for the jury to say whether the statement is correct or not; and the judge had no right to take it from them.

The party offering the testimony is expected to show that he has in good faith exhausted in a reasonable degree all the sources of information which the nature of the case suggests.

Vaughn v. Biggers, 6 Ga. 188.

If books or papers necessary as evidence in a court in one State be in the possession of a person living in another State, secondary evidence may be given to prove the contents of such papers, and notice to produce them is unnecessary.

Burton v. Driggs, 20 Wall. 125 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 299).

The person in whose possession the paper is last seen is the proper person to notify.

Waller v. Cralle, 8 B. Mon. 11; Stirling v. Buckingham, 46 Conn. 461.

The error in the mind of the judge who tried the case was caused by a confusion between letters written to the opposite party by the plaintiff or defendant; in which case it is, of course, necessary to give notice to produce before offering secondary evidence, as in Pratt v. Patterson, 81 Pa. 115; Marsh v. Hand, 35 Md. 123, and papers written by the opposite party to third persons. In the latter case notice or a subpena should be served on the recipient of the letter alone.

See also Shepherd v. Giddings, 22 Conn. 282; Eaton v. Campbell, 7 Pick. 10; Boone v. Dyke, 3 T. B. Mon. 532; where the mere fact of a paper being out of the jurisdiction of the court was held sufficient, although before trial this fact was known to the party offering secondary evidence of its contents.

Binney v. Russell, 109 Mass. 55; Mauri v. Heffernan, 13 Johns. 58; Moody v. Commonwealth, 4 Met. (Ky.) 4; Shorter v. Sheppard, 33 Ala. 648; Wisconsin River Lumber Co. v. Walker, 48 Wis. 614; Burnham v. Wood, 8 N. H. 334; Dunbar v. Marden, 13 N. H. 311; Waller v. Cralle, 8 B. Mon. 11; Moore v. Beattie, 33 Vt. 219; Alivon v. Furnival, 1 Crompton, M. & R. 291.

The cases which closely resemble the one before the court are Brown v. Wood, 19 Mo. 475, and Hibberd v. Knight, 2 Exch. 11.

Where a deed is in the possession of a person which he is not obliged to produce in answer to a subpena, you may give secondary evidence of its contents.

Marston v. Downes and Mills v. Oddy, 6 Carr. & P. 381, 732.

In Pennsylvania all that is required is a search among the papers of the person into whose possession the papers in question are last traced. Where a deed was written by a conveyancer from a father to a daughter, and the daughter had given all her papers to her father, and after his death, her brothers swore they had never seen the deed, and there was a notice to produce, but no proof of search, it was held sufficient to introduce secondary evidence.

Emig v. Diehl, 76 Pa. 359.

Where the witness testified he had looked among all his papers and could not find it, proof of the contents of a letter seven years old, was admitted.

Brown v. Day, 78 Pa. 131.

In Spalding v. Bank of Susquehanna Co. 9 Pa. 28, parol proof of a release was admitted where it had been in the possession of one C., who had left the State. His books and papers, left in Pennsylvania, were searched here, and witness had inquired of C's wife, who said she had no business papers in her possession. Held sufficient.

After proof that the son acted as agent the court should have admitted proof of what was done by plaintiff in furthering the very contract brought about by plaintiff's aid.

Reed v. Ashburnham R. R. Co. 120 Mass. 48.

Services rendered to an agent, outside of the scope of his duty, cannot bind the principal; but it is equally clear that an agent has power to bind his principal within the scope of his duties.

Williams v. Getty, 31 Pa. 463.

Any recognition of similar services by a principal will bind him, more especially when the agent stands in the relation of child or wife. Thus it was held in Tucker v. Woolsey, 6 Lans. 482, that an agent sent here to sell his principal's goods might bind his principal for rent of a place to store the goods.

In Mundorff v. Wickersham, 63 Pa. 88, where a clerk signed a receipt for a note which included a promise to protect it at maturity, held, the principal was bound by this promise, although it did not appear he had authorized it.

In Kelsey v. Nat. Bank of Crawford Co. 69 Pa. 426, where a cashier with the approbation of some of the directors, offered a reward for the apprehension of a thief, held, the bank was bound, although not formally notified. Held, further, that the circumstance of its being a small town would imply a knowledge.

M'Cord v. Bergautz, 7 Watts, 487, is authority for the fact that it is absurd to say that you trust a man to exercise the most extensive authority over land for your benefit, but he must not save it from utter loss as by paying taxes.

The same rule applies to persons and corporations.

Tanner v. Oil Creek R. R. Co. 53 Pa. 411; Adams Express Co. v. Schlessinger, 75 Pa. 256.

As to the inference of notice to principal, Bredig v. Dubarry, 14 Serg. & R. 30, is directly in point.

Where services are requested by a third party for one not connected with him, such request will be ground for an action.

Berry v. Pusey, 80 Ky. 166.

This is stronger when it is the case of a father or husband.

Van Valkinburgh v. Watson, 13 Johns. 480.

And much greater weight is given to acts of a son who is acting in any capacity for his father than to those of an outsider; Valentine v. Packer, 5 Pa. 333; so that, even if the agency is narrowed down to obtaining contracts for his father, and not even making them himself in his father's name, which last is certainly inferred, if not proved, the evidence of acts done at the son's request for his father in furthering and obtaining these contracts—acts which Mr. Earnshaw shows were necessary and proper—should have been submitted to the jury, together with evidence of the agent's instructions to plaintiff, especially in view of the fact that the father admits that he knew that his son was receiving services, and speaks freely of his intention and mode of doing business in America.

Foster v. Berg, 14 W. N. C. 215.

Mr. Richard C. McMurtrie, for defendant in error:

The letters produced were not sufficient to authorize an employment by the son for the father at the expense of the father.

To anyone familiar with the usages of factors of any kind it did seem this was not arguable. I employ a broker to sell my house or iron. Has the newspaper who advertises the property by direction of the broker, or the person employed to post the notices, a claim on me?

It is assumed by the plaintiff in error that the only point involved in the question as to the admissibility of secondary evidence of the contents of the letter was that a party having subpenaed a witness in whose custody the paper is, on proof that it is without jurisdiction, can state his recollection of the contents.

There is nothing on the bill of exceptions to show that there was a proper effort to compel the production of the original. There was no notice to produce the letter—or a copy.

The paper consisted of a letter alleged to contain an agency to hire at the cost of the principal. Such a paper as that was the property of the defendant quite as much as of the agent. It was almost certain that he would have a copy, and quite probable that he could produce the original, if he had any reason to suppose it was wanted.

But the evidence wholly failed to establish the existence of such a letter, so as to lay the foundation for proof of contents.

The existence of the original is not proved but assumed.

Per Curiam:

There is no error in this record. The action of the court in directing the jury to find in favor of the defendant is well sustained by the opinion of the learned judge in overruling the motion for a new trial.

The evidence relating to the letter and its contents was properly rejected.

Judgment affirmed.

v.
Joseph SLOCUM.

1. In an action to obtain possession of land bought at an execution sale, where the wife of the execution debtor claimed the property as her separate estate, which claim was alleged by the plaintiff to be fraudulent, held, that evidence offered by the defendants (the execution debtor and his wife) to show that before the plaintiff had become a creditor of the execution debtor the latter had assigned the property to his wife and had consulted counsel as to the validity of the transfer, should have been admitted—it appearing that the property had been acquired with the wife's money.
2. Held also, that evidence of any fact or circumstance occurring at the time, showing and explaining the true character of a transfer of the land by the debtor to a third person and by the latter to the debtor's wife, would have been competent; but an offer seeking to introduce the opinion of such third person as to the purpose of the transfers was properly refused.
3. Where an offer of evidence as a whole includes evidence which is irrelevant as well as evidence which would, by itself, be relevant, it is proper to refuse the whole offer.
4. The defendants claimed that although the land was originally acquired with the wife's money, the deed was made out to the husband; that thereafter he indorsed an assignment to his wife on the deed; that subsequently the husband transferred the property to a third party and such third party transferred it to the wife. Held, that the defendants were not precluded from putting in evidence such original deed and the assignment indorsed thereon, by the fact that an affidavit made by the wife in this proceeding stated that she did not come into possession and did not claim to hold under the execution debtor (her husband), but that she came into possession under the title of such third party.
5. If the husband had possession of the wife's money and used it in the purchase of the property, it would support the wife's title.

(Argued Feb. 21, Decided March 21, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 89, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action of ejectment. Reversed.

This action was commenced by proceedings before an alderman, to obtain possession of land under the provisions of the Act of June 16, 1836, and Supplement of May 24, 1878, brought by Joseph Slocum against Mary Heath and William H. Heath, her husband, said land having been sold to Joseph Slocum on execution sale as the property of William H. Heath and claimed as the property of his wife.

On affidavit filed by Mary Heath, the case was removed to the court of the common pleas, and there tried before HAND, P. J. The material facts appear from the opinion of the supreme court.

At the trial, defendants offered to prove by one DeWitt, an attorney at law, that in 1875 he met them in the City of Scranton; that they had with them the original deed from Joseph Fellows for the lot in suit; that upon it there was an assignment from W. H. Heath to Mary Heath; that they asked him whether that was sufficient in law to convey the estate; that he said the more regular and legal way was to convey the property to a third person as trustee, and let him convey it back to Mary Heath.

Counsel for plaintiff objected to the offer as immaterial and irrelevant; and that any conversation between Dr. Heath and his wife and the witness on the stand, in the absence of Joseph Slocum, is not evidence.

The Court: We sustain the objection and reject the evidence. First assignment of error.

Counsel for defendants proposed to prove by Miss S. A. Gardner that the purpose of the deed and assignment was to convey the legal estate in the land in question from Wm. H. Heath to Mary Heath, and that the transfer to S. A. Gardner and her assignment was for that purpose.

Counsel for the plaintiff objected to the offer as irrelevant, and they cannot show the intention in any such way; the papers must speak for themselves.

Counsel for defendants: That offer is to be preceded by the offer and admission of the deed.

The Court: We will sustain the objection and reject the evidence. Second assignment of error.

Counsel for defendants offered to prove by

A. D. Dean that at the time Dr. Heath signed the note to Joseph Slocum of $6,240, April 7, 1877, he, Wm. H. Heath, was the owner in his own right of real estate, to the value of from $20,000 to $30,000 outside of the land in question in this case, and that at the time the said money was borrowed there were no incumbrances against said property; that the real estate purchased by Slocum on the sheriff's sale on Slocum's judgment was sold for a nominal consideration, and that Joseph Slocum, as the result of the sheriff's sale, has been in possession of property at least to the value of $20,000, and is now the owner of the same. This offer is made for the purpose of rebutting any presumption of fraud in the conveyance of the title to the land in question from Dr. Heath to his wife, or in the perfecting of the title in Mrs. Heath, which Mrs. Heath claims was in her deed; and that at the time the deed was transferred through S. A. Gardner to Mrs. Heath, the property included in the offer was still owned by Dr. Heath.

Counsel for the plaintiff objected to the offer as irrelevant.

The Court: Objection sustained and evidence rejected. Third assignment of error.

L. W. DeWitt, Esq., a witness on the stand, was shown the original deed from Joseph Fellows to W. H. Heath for the land in dispute, and counsel for the defendants proposed to prove that the witness saw it in 1875, and the assignment to Mrs. Mary Heath was on the back of it at that time.

Counsel for plaintiff objected.

The Court: We will sustain the objection, and reject the evidence. Fourth assignment of error.

It is admitted that the subscribing witness to the assignment on the back of the Fellows deed to W. H. Heath, E. H. Heath, is not a resident of Pennsylvania, and not within the State.

Counsel for defendants offer in evidence now the assignment dated November 20, 1869, from W. H. Heath to Mary Heath of the Fellows deed.

Counsel for the plaintiff objected to the offer as irrelevant.

Counsel for defendants: You admit that it is the signature of Dr. Heath?

Counsel for plaintiff: Yes, sir.

The Court: I don't think this is evidence under her affidavit. We will reject this. Fifth assignment of error.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"It seems that Mrs. Heath received from her father's estate a considerable sum of money; this is not in dispute. The evidence on this point is clear. Now did she actually purchase this property with her money as her property? She says she did. She further says that the deed was by mistake made to her husband.

"How does she trace her own money into this lot? And how does she show that her husband held this in trust for her? She says she loaned $1,000 to her husband, when at Dalton. She says he paid a part of this back again to her, and that it went into this lot. She afterwards says she paid $1,200 for the lot, which was the consideration mentioned in the deed.

"I do not recollect that she specifically traces the whole of this money into this lot (if the evidence shows it why the jury will correct me if I am mistaken upon that point) except by perhaps a general assertion." Sixth assignment of error.

"Now, you heard all her evidence. Does she clearly satisfy you that she put her money into the lot? Does she trace her money into the lot? If she fails to do this, she does not make her title to it: and she must clearly trace the whole of the money into the lot. She cannot mix her money with her husband's and then claim that the lot is hers.

"How does she prove the trust? She says in effect that when her husband brought the deed he was sorry he had it made to him, but if they sold it he could convey it; if not, he could arrange it." Seventh assignment of error.

"Under these circumstances does Mary Heath give you the true version of this transaction from beginning to end? Because the whole of it must come before you under all the evidence. If she gave the money to her husband, that is, if she gave it to him as his, then she cannot recover. She must have given him the whole amount of $1,200 for the purpose of buying this lot, and he must have bought it with that money for her." Eighth assignment of error.

"Now, was that whole transaction an honest transaction? It is alleged by the defendant that this deed was made simply to carry out the trust of Dr. Heath in favor of his wife.

"The difficulty with this position is that Dr. Heath and his wife did not put it upon that basis, at the time that they made the deed. The attempt was to give the deed the appearance of a purchase and sale for the sum of $5,000, and Mary Heath set this up in her affidavit." Ninth assignment of error.

"Your attention has been called to this deed, and the alterations upon it. The alterations upon the deed raise some suspicions in regard to the deed, and they must be clearly proved before the deed is allowed to come in evidence.

"Now all the facts sworn to in regard to this are facts in the case; and they are facts which we leave to you, under all the circumstances, to determine whether the claim set up here is an honest bona fide claim." Tenth assignment of error.

Defendants' fifth point was as follows:

"There is no evidence of actual fraud on the part of Mary Heath in the purchase and conveyance of said land."

Ans. That, gentlemen, is a question of fact for you under all the evidence. Eleventh assignment of error.

Messrs. H. M. Edwards and S. B. Price, for plaintiffs in error:

The declarations of Mr. and Mrs. Heath before or at the time of these conveyances, expressive of an honest motive in the transaction, were admissible as part of the res gestæ.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 108.

On the same principle, the assignment on the back of the Fellows deed of November 20, 1869, should have been admitted.

It is competent for a party to show his acts in carrying out an agreement.

It is competent to show that the consideration of a deed, which is expressed as pecuniary, was one of kindred or marriage.

If a wife permits her husband to take title to her lands, and to hold himself out to the world as the owner of them, and to contract debts upon the credit of such ownership, she cannot afterwards, by taking title to herself, withdraw them from the reach of his creditors and thus defeat their claims.

The alleged declarations were not part of the res gestæ.

First. Declarations to become part of the res gestæ must be those which may truly be said to be part of "the things done."

Second. They must be contemporaneous with the facts to which they relate.

Fourth. They must not be a narrative of past events.

Declarations of a party in his own favor, not part of the res gestæ, are not evidence.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

We think it was error to exclude the evidence referred to in the first assignment of error. The defendants below were charged with fraud; and it is familiar law that in such cases the party alleging the fraud is entitled to a wide range of evidence to sustain such charge. This grows out of the difficulty of proving fraud. It is usually secret, and is pursued by intricate and crooked paths. At the same time a reasonable liberality must be allowed to a defendant in his attempt to rebut or disprove such a charge. It is a serious accusation to make, as it affects not only property but reputation as well.

The particular fraud with which the defendants below were charged was an attempt by the defendant William H. Heath to convey the property in dispute to his wife Mary Heath, without consideration, and in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff, who held a judgment against him for $6,240.

Chronology is sometimes of importance. The plaintiff entered a judgment against the defendant William H. Heath, on March 12, 1878, for $6,240, on a note dated April 7, 1877. The defendants conveyed the premises in controversy to S. A. Gardner by deed dated October 11, 1877, for the consideration of $5,000. This consideration was never paid. S. A. Gardner gave William H. Heath her note for $5,000, and on the 25th of November, A. D. 1877, she conveyed the property to Mary Heath; whereupon, her note was surrendered to her. The plaintiff sold the premises on August 9, 1879, under an execution issued upon his judgment against William H. Heath, and bought the same at sheriff's sale. He received a sheriff's deed therefor.

This, without more, would leave the title in the plaintiff by virtue of his purchase at sheriff's sale. But the defendant Mary Heath contends that the property belonged to her; that it was purchased for her by William H. Heath, her husband, acting as her agent, and paid for out of her separate estate, of which she had ample for that purpose; that the placing of the title in her husband's name was a mistake, to which his attention had been called as soon as it was discovered; that he had promised to correct it, or make it right; that in pursuance of said object and for such purpose, the said William H. Heath made an assignment to the said Mary Heath, of said deed, which was indorsed on the back thereof, and dated November 20, 1869; that this deed with the indorsement thereon was submitted to counsel, and his opinion asked as to whether that was the proper mode of conveying the estate; and the defendants were advised that "The more regular and legal way was to convey the property to a third person as trustee, and let him convey it back to Mary Heath;" and finally that the conveyance by the defendants to S. A. Gardner was made for the purpose of putting the title in the said Mary Heath, where she alleged it properly belonged. There was evidence that Mrs. Heath had ample separate estate derived from her father, to pay for the property.

It was under such circumstances that the offer of evidence embraced in the first assignment was made. Surely it was competent for the defendants, when charged with such a fraud as this, to show that, years before the plaintiff had become a creditor of William H. Heath, the latter had assigned the property to his wife, and had consulted counsel as to the validity of the transfer. That the assignment was not recorded does not affect the competency of the evidence; the legal title was out of William H. Heath before the plaintiff entered the judgment against him.

It was not error to reject the offer of evidence referred to in the second assignment. It was an offer to prove by the witness on the stand, Miss S. A. Gardner, that the purpose of the deed and assignment was to convey the legal estate in the land in question from William H. Heath to Mary Heath, and that the transfer to S. A. Gardner and her assignment was for that purpose; to be preceded by the offer and admission of the deed.

We can see no objection to the admission of the deed, and we think it was competent to prove any fact which tended to throw light upon the conveyance to Miss Gardner and from her to Mary Heath. The cross examination of the witness Gardner had left that transaction in an equivocal shape. It shows that the consideration named in the deed had not been paid. Now this conveyance may have been a fraud, or it may have been a bungling way of doing a perfectly lawful thing, that is: the conveying of the title from William H. Heath to his wife, where, according to the theory of the latter, it should have been placed originally; hence, we think that any fact or circumstance occurring at the time, showing and explaining the true character of the transaction, would have been competent evidence. The witness was merely asked for an opinion. What was needed were the facts of the case; from which the jury could judge of the nature of the conveyance.

The third assignment is not sustained. We think it was competent to show that at the time Heath gave the judgment to the plaintiff he was the owner of from $20,000 to $30,000 worth of unincumbered real estate, for the reason that it tended to rebut the allegation of an intent to defraud creditors. But it was accompanied by an offer to show the extent and value of other real estate purchased by the plaintiff under his execution. This was not relevant to the issue trying; and as the evidence was offered as a whole it was not error in the court to reject it. There is sometimes peril in overloading an offer of evidence.

We sustain the fourth assignment. It was competent, in rebuttal of the alleged fraud, to show by the witness, L. W. DeWitt, Esq., that he had seen the deed from Joseph Fellows to William Heath, with the assignment to Mary Heath indorsed thereon. This was in 1875, about two years before the plaintiff loaned his money to Heath. What has been said in regard to the first assignment renders a further discussion of this point unnecessary.

We also sustain the fifth assignment. The deed referred to, with the assignment to Mary Heath indorsed thereon, should have been admitted in evidence. This would seem to be obvious from what has been already said. The court rejected it as inconsistent with the affidavit of Mary Heath made in the proceeding before the justice, to obtain possession under the Act of Assembly. In that affidavit she said that she did not come into the possession of the premises, and did not claim to hold the same under the said William H. Heath, the defendant in the execution, but that she came into possession under the Gardner title derived from the said William H. Heath before the date of the plaintiff's judgments, etc. If the property belonged to Mrs. Heath, as claimed by her, she might well have made such an affidavit; and if the Gardner conveyance was an honest transaction, although a clumsy one, it would be harsh to hold her to such a rule as this. We think the deed should have been admitted.

The sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth and tenth assignments allege error in the charge of the court, and are not sustained. Some stress was laid upon those portions of it which refer to the question whether the money of Mary Heath was traced into the purchase of this property. That she had the means to do so was not seriously disputed. This is not sufficient, however. It is not enough to have the means; they must be actually applied to the purchase. If, however, her husband had her money in his possession, and he used it in the purchase of the property, it would support her title. When a wife allows her husband to act as her agent in the care and investment of her money, no presumption of a gift arises. On the contrary, if he invests it in real estate and takes the title in his own name a resulting trust arises in her favor.

The eleventh assignment is not sustained. The question of actual fraud could not have been properly withdrawn from the jury.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

APPEAL OF Richard WISTAR et al.

1. Where the title of all parties is set forth in the petition for partition, and it appears therein that the dispute respecting it has been adjudicated, and in consequence the tenants in common are in joint possession, the mere denial of the tenancy and right of partition is not enough to require the court to suspend proceedings until another trial of the right of some of the parties.
2. Not having denied the facts averred in the petition, they are taken as admitted by the appellants. They must point out some defect in the petition or aver their own title or adverse possession to justify the court to refuse to proceed in the partition.
3. In such proceeding a plea may be treated as an answer; the rules do not permit filing a plea.
4. An appeal does not lie from a decree awarding an inquest; and the court is not bound to stay partition because of the entry of an unauthorized appeal.

(Argued Jan. 19, Decided March 28, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 198, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Green, JJ:

Appeal from a decree of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia County, ordering a sale on petition for partition of land. Affirmed.

In February, 1886, a petition for partition was filed by Lewis A. Scott, guardian and next friend of Alexander H. Scott, a minor, John M. Scott and Lewis A. Scott, Jr., which alleged that Richard Wistar, late of the City of Philadelphia, died in June, 1821, seised in fee of a certain lot of ground called Prospect Hill (describing it), being a portion of the premises which the said Richard Wistar, deceased, purchased from George Clymer and wife, having first made his last will and testament dated February 24, 1816, which was duly proved June 25, 1821, and registered in the office of the register of wills, for the City and County of Philadelphia; wherein he devised and bequeathed the said premises as follows:

"Item. I do hereby give and devise unto my said daughters, Catharine and Sarah, all that my lot or piece of land called Prospect Hill, containing about six acres and a half, and all the buildings and improvements thereon, * * * together with the appurtenances, to hold to them for and during all the term of their natural lives and the life of the survivor of them; and from and immediately after the decease of the survivor of them, I give the same unto the male issue then living of my said son Richard, their or his heirs and assigns in fee; but if no such issue shall then be living, in such case I give the same unto all the children of my said daughters, Catharine and Sarah, and my said son Richard, their heirs and assigns in equal parts, according to the number of them."

That said Catharine Wistar died leaving her sister, Sarah Wistar, surviving; and that the said Sarah Wistar died September 25, 1866.

That the male issue of testator's son Richard, living at the time of the death of Sarah Wistar, were his sons Richard Wistar and William Lewis Wistar, also John M. Scott, Lewis A. Scott, Jr., and Alexander H. Scott, a minor, sons of Lewis A. Scott and his wife, Fanny W., daughter of the testator's son Richard, and Richard W. Hopkinson, son of Dr. Joseph Hopkinson, deceased, and his wife Sarah W., daughter of said testator's son Richard, which said Sarah W. Hopkinson, after the death of said Dr. Joseph Hopkinson, intermarried with James M. Gillilan.

That the said Richard W. Hopkinson died intestate December 30, 1881, leaving no issue or brothers or sisters or descendants, but leaving a widow, Lillie Hopkinson, and leaving his mother, the said Sarah W. Gillilan, in whom, under the Intestate Act, his estate vested.

That said real estate, upon the decease of Sarah Wistar, passed under said will to the petitioners and Richard Wistar, William Lewis Wistar and Richard W. Hopkinson, as male issue of the testator's son Richard in equal undivided sixth parts.

That said Lewis A. Scott, was duly chosen and appointed guardian of the said Alexander H. Scott, May 29, 1880.

That the said Richard and William Lewis Wistar conveyed, without the consent of the petitioners or of Richard W. Hopkinson, a portion of the said premises, being a triangular lot of ground, to Samuel K. Haines by deed dated October 1, 1868.

That by divers mesne conveyances, etc., all of Samuel K. Haines' title under said deed passed to Servetus Supplee, who is now in possession of two undivided one sixth parts of said triangular lot.

That each of the petitioners is now in possession of his undivided one sixth in the whole of the said first above described premises, which possession was delivered to your petitioners, by the sheriff under writ of habere facias, etc., issued out of court of common pleas No. 1, in an action of ejectment, of March Term, 1882, No. 58, against said Richard Wistar and William Lewis Wistar, and others. (See Wistar v. Scott, 105 Pa. 200.)

And the said James M. Gillilan and his said wife, the said Sarah W., in right of said Sarah, are now in possession of one other undivided sixth part of the first above described premises, which possession was delivered to said James M. Gillilan and said Sarah W., in right of said Sarah W., by the sheriff under writ of habere facias, etc., issued out of court of common pleas No. 3, in an action of ejectment of March Term, 1882, No. 579, against said Richard Wistar and William Lewis Wistar and others, subject to the interest of said Lillie Hopkinson, widow of the said Richard W. Hopkinson, under the intestate laws, in said one undivided sixth part thereof.

That said Richard Wistar is now in possession of one other undivided sixth part thereof, with the exception of the triangular lot above described.

That the said William Lewis Wistar is now in possession of one other undivided sixth part thereof, with the exception of the triangular lot above described.

And that the said Servetus Supplee is now in possession of two undivided one sixth parts of the above described triangular lot of ground conveyed to said Haines, as aforesaid. Jacob Dowler is tenant from year to year (paying rent) of petitioners and of Richard Wistar, William Lewis Wistar, James M. Gillilan and wife, of a certain other portion of the premises. William T. Dowler and Jacob W. Dowler are tenants from year to year (paying rent) of petitioners and of the said Richard Wistar and William Lewis Wistar, James M. Gillilan and wife, of a certain other part of the premises. All the other portions of the premises are vacant lots.

No partition of the said real estate has been had, and your petitioners are desirous to have partition thereof, in accordance with the Acts of Assembly in such cases made and provided.

In pursuance of the prayer of the petition the court awarded citations to issue to all the parties, which were duly served.

James M. Gillilan and Sarah W., his wife, in right of said Sarah W. Gillilan, filed an answer to the petition, and for cause why the inquest in partition prayed for should not be awarded, assigned the following reasons:

1. Because, by one and the same proceeding, the petitioners have sought to accomplish partition of two parcels of property held in different shares and by different parties.

2. Because the petitioners have recited and set out in their petition as parties to the proceedings, Jacob Dowler, William T. Dowler and Jacob W. Dowler, whom they aver to be mere tenants from year to year of portions of the premises whereof partition is sought to be made, and that the said three Dowlers, or any of them, have no such interest in the premises as to entitle them or justify their being made parties to the proceedings.

Servetus Supplee filed an answer to the petition, and for cause why the inquest in partition prayed for should not be awarded assigned the following reasons:

1. Because by one and the same proceeding, they, the said petitioners, have sought to accomplish partition of two parcels of property held in different shares and by different parties.

2. Because the writ of ejectment against Richard Wistar and others in the Court of Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, March Term, 1882, No. 58, recited in the petition, was not against respondent, who is in possession, claiming adversely to petitioners, and is not averred in said petition as having been against this respondent, and that the said alleged writ of possession was not against this respondent, and respondent's possession was not disturbed thereunder.

Richard and William L. Wistar filed the following:

"Richard Wistar and William Lewis Wistar served with a citation in the above matter, come into court and, for a plea to said petition, say:

"That they deny that the said petitioners are tenants in common with these respondents, of the premises in said petition mentioned, or any part thereof; and these respondents deny the right of the said petitioners to said property, or any portion thereof, or to have partition made of said property, or of any part thereof, as prayed for in said petition, these respondents claiming to hold the real estate in said petition described, not already by them conveyed, to the exclusion of the petitioners."

Ledden D. Garrison, a citizen and resident of the State of New Jersey, filed the following plea:

"That by indenture dated March 30, 1886, he has become seised and is entitled, for the term therein named, to all the interest of Richard Wistar and William Lewis Wistar, the defendants, in and to all the premises described in the petition filed in the above case.

"That the said Richard Wistar and William Lewis Wistar were not at the time of the filing of said petition, nor have they since been, nor are they now, tenants in common, nor is this respondent (claiming their estate as aforesaid) tenant in common with the petitioners in this case or with any of them, or with any other persons in the premises in said petition mentioned or in any part thereof.

"And this respondent denies the right of the said petitioners to said property or any portion thereof, or to have partition made of said property or of any part thereof, as prayed for in said petition.

"And this respondent claims to hold the real estate in said petition described to the exclusion of the said petitioners, and, in maintenance of his right therein, has brought his action of ejectment against said petitioners and others."

In the court below HANNA, P. J., delivered the following opinion:

If the seisin of testator was denied, and respondents claimed to hold adversely, it would be proper to stay proceedings until the question of title be determined; it being well settled that in such case ejectment is the proper remedy, and not partition. Ell's Est. 6 Pa. 457; McMasters v. Carothers, 1 Pa. 324; Flaherty's Est. 5 Phila. 477; Law v. Patterson, 1 Watts & S. 184.

But here no such bar is interposed. Nor does any dispute arise as to the heirship of the parties. Had this entered into the controversy, the court has ample jurisdiction to determine it. Davis' Est. 9 W. N. C. 380.

Neither is the objection that the proceedings are defective by reason of petitioners including in the petition two separate parcels of property held in different shares and proportions and by different parties, instead of filing a separate petition for an inquest as to each parcel of land, valid and sustainable.

If the effort was to make partition of land held by petitioners and respondents and their vendees, under different and distinct titles, the objection would be applicable, for in such case the proceedings must be separate. Snyder's App. 36 Pa. 166.

But here all the parties claim under one and the same title, viz.: that of testator; and the respondents as coheirs, with their vendees by different conveyances, and tenants, may be properly joined in the same proceedings. Harlan v. Langham, 69 Pa. 237.

The contrary would be very unfortunate, and would work great practical injustice, as there shown by Sharswood, Justice.

As to the plea filed by two of the respondents, this is irregular and not in conformity with the rule of court which provides that "The mode of proceeding in controverted cases shall be by petition, answer, replication," etc. Rule X, § 2.

Even if allowable by the rules of equity practice, which have only been adopted "so far as they are applicable to the practice and proceedings of this court," it is defective from the absence of an affidavit that it is not for delay.

Nor does it deny the title set up by the petitioners, but that they are tenants in common with the respondents.

This is a conclusion of law, and in no wise affects the title of the testator, under whom all parties claim.

For this reason alone the plea is bad.

But respondents also claim to hold the lands, not already conveyed by them, "to the exclusion of the petitioners."

But no facts or circumstances are set forth, nor any evidence given, showing how and by what means they claim the exclusive possession.

They do not set up adverse possession, nor facts from which it may be presumed. As said by Rogers, Justice, in McMasters v. Carothers, supra: "An adverse holding by one tenant in common, for any length of time, however short, previous to the institution of an action of partition, will bar a recovery in such form of action; for ejectment and not partition is the proper remedy against a person holding adversely."

But this is neither alleged nor proved; and therefore the plea is additionally defective. Treating it as an answer, insufficient and defective, for the reasons given, it must be overruled.

It is urged by other respondents that lessees for a term of years are improperly made parties. But this is proper and necessary. A lessee or tenant has an interest in the land, is entitled to notice of the proceedings, and will not be prejudiced by a partition to which he is not a party. Duke v. Hague, 15 W. N. C. 353; 107 Pa. 57.

Where persons are included, who have no interest in the title with the petitioners, and such joinder cannot affect the title of the respondents, the irreguluarity is immaterial. Barclay v. Kerr, 1 Cent. Rep. 558.

On the other hand, if parties proper to be included are omitted, the correct practice is to apply to the court for leave to intervene and be made party to the proceedings; not to obtrude upon the record, without leave or notice to the other parties interested.

In this case a stranger to the record, and claiming as a vendee of two of the respondents, to hold all their interest in and to the premises sought to be divided, and by deed subsequent to the filing of the petition, has also filed a plea. But this cannot be recognized. It is irregular, in violation of good practice, and must be stricken off.

For the reasons stated, no sufficient ground for refusing the inquest is shown. And upon the facts contained in the petition, not properly denied nor contradicted, the petitioners are entitled to an inquest.

It is accordingly granted, as appears from the decree which counsel will prepare.

A decree was accordingly entered, dismissing the petition as to Servetus Supplee, and the premises claimed by him; and striking off the plea of Ledden D. Garrison, it having been filed without leave of court; and "having considered * * * the answers (therein denominated pleas) of Richard Wistar and William Lewis Wistar," awarding an inquest to make partition of the residue of the land in the petition mentioned between the petitioners, Alexander H. Scott, John M. Scott and Lewis A. Scott, Jr., and the said Richard Wistar and William Lewis Wistar and Sarah W. Gillilan, wife of James M. Gillilan, and Lillie Hopkinson, widow, etc., according to their several and respective shares as set out in the said petition.

An inquest was accordingly issued.

Ledden D. Garrison thereafter filed a petition for leave to intervene, which set forth: that he is a citizen of the State of New Jersey; that Richard and William Lewis Wistar, by indenture duly executed, etc., bearing date March 30, 1886, leased to petitioner all that tract of land called "Prospect Hill," for a term of six years, beginning March 30, 1886; that since the execution of said indenture the petitioner has been informed of the petition, by Lewis A. Scott, et al., for partition of said land; that petitioner has not been made a party to said proceedings in partition, although he claims to have the actual and exclusive possession of the land therein described, and to hold the same adverse to the petitioners named; that no notice of the citation issued by the court in such proceeding was ever given to the petitioner; and that an inquest of partition was awarded therein; that petitioner is a party in interest entitled to absolute and exclusive possession (of the land in said petition described) for the term of years aforesaid; that his lessors are seised of the entire and absolute estate in fee of the land leased, and that neither the lessors of the petitioner nor the petitioner derive title through, from or under any of the petitioners in said petition named, but in their own exclusive right; and that petitioner denies that the complainants in said petition are in lawful possession thereof, or have any right to the possession thereof, but that he has a good right and is entitled to hold the possession thereof for said term of years, against all and every person or persons whomsoever; and petitioner prays that by an order of this court he may be allowed to come in and be made a party defendant with the other defendants therein named.

The court granted a rule to show cause why said Garrison should not be allowed to come in and be made a party defendant.

Answers to the petition of Garrison were filed by James M. Gillilan and Sarah W., his wife, and by Lewis A. Scott, which denied that the lease was taken by Garrison in good faith and asked for an examination of the circumstances under which it was taken, and an examiner was duly appointed by the court.

Thereafter a return of inquest was made; and on motion of attorneys for the petitioners the same was confirmed and the court granted a rule upon parties to show cause why the real estate or such purparts or parcels as should not be accepted and taken at their valuation should not be sold. This order was duly served; and thereupon Garrison filed a petition and an answer thereto which alleged the previous appointment of the examiner; that said examiner had not yet filed his report; and objected to the consideration of the said rule and to all actions in the inquest proceedings until said Garrison's right to intervene should have been determined by the court.

On the same day Richard and William Lewis Wistar filed an answer alleging that they had previous to the return of the inquest, appealed from the order awarding the inquest; and that a certiorari from the supreme court was duly served on the clerk for removal of the record in the case; and submitting that pending said appeal and certiorari no proceedings could be had under the inquest, and no action should be taken upon the rule to accept or refuse the purpart or parcel of land.

July 17, 1886, an order awarding a sale was entered, and Richard and William Lewis Wistar took this appeal therefrom, assigning as error: 1, the action of the court in striking off the appeal of Richard and William Lewis Wistar; 2, in awarding the inquest; 3, in proceeding with the partition pending the appeal from the award of inquest; 4, in awarding the order of sale.

Messrs. William Gorman and T. Carroll Brewster, for appellants:

The allegation in appellants' plea: that they did not hold as tenants in common with the petitioners, was sufficient to make up an issue.

The court below has seen proper, without trial of the disputed questions of fact, to award an inquest. The right of the petitioners to demand partition should have been first established.

The appellants chose to deny the petitioners' right and title by filing a plea containing averments to that effect. That they had the right to do this without going into the particulars of their case by an answer is undoubted.

Wilkin v. Wilkin, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 111 (1814); Lewis v. Pratt, 2 Whart. 81 (1836); Law v. Patterson, 1 Watts & S. 184; McMasters v. Carothers, 1 Pa. 325.

Messrs. John M. Scott and J. Howard Gendell, for appellees Scott et al.:

Appellants' plea was not stricken off. It was Garrison's plea which the court struck off, because filed by a stranger, without leave.

The only objection made to the award of the inquest is that the title is denied; but the title depends upon the facts, and none of these is disputed or questioned.

The cases cited by the appellants are not in point.

Lewis v. Pratt, 2 Whart. 81, was a petition for partition on the basis of an intestacy. The respondent set up, not only that he claimed the whole of the land, but that he claimed it under a devise, etc., and that he was in actual possession thereof.

Law v. Patterson, 1 Watts & S. 184, and McMasters v. Carothers, 1 Pa. 325, were cases of land held and occupied adversely.

The authority of the orphans' court to make partition is higher than that of a court of chancery. That court is for the decision of questions of equity; and where purely legal questions arise, it will send the parties to law and retain the bill in the meanwhile; but the right to make partition in the orphans' court being given by statute, the right to determine all preliminary questions is likewise given.

Davis' Est. 9 W. N. C. 380, 479; Kiegel's App. 12 W. N. C. 179; Smith's Est. 2 Del. Co. Rep. 428; Erisman's Est. 8 Lanc. Bar, 169; Church's App. 17 W. N. C. 541; Freeman, Partition, § 425.

The third error assigned is proceeding with the partition pending the appeal from the award of inquest.

Appellants have not argued this assignment. We have shown in our counter statement that there was no such appeal, but that the appeal is in the Supplee matter.

Independently of this, no appeal lies from the award of the inquest.

Gesell's App. 84 Pa. 238. See also Cristy & Burk's App. 48 Legal Int. 251.

Such an unauthorized appeal may be treated as a nullity and the proceedings may go on.

Robinson v. Glancy, 69 Pa. 89-93.

Mr. J. B. Townsend, for appellee Sarah W. Gillilan.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioners set forth their title, the names and interest of the tenants in common, and the adjudication resulting in the possession by each tenant of his undivided interest in the land embraced in the partition. Upon the answer of Supplee the lot in his possession, which he claims adversely to the petitioners, was excluded.

The appellants filed a plea denying that they are tenants in common with petitioners, denying the right of the petitioners to any portion of the land, or to have any partition thereof; and they claim to hold the real estate exclusive of the petitioners. This plea is unsupported by averment of any fact at variance with the averments in the petition. It avoids denial that the petitoners are in possession with themselves; it merely asserts their claim. The validity of the will, under which all the parties claim, is unquestioned; the dispute between them was about its construction,

In the ejectment against the appellants the title was adjudicated, and in execution of that judgment the petitioners were put in possession by the sheriff.

Where the title of all parties is set out in the petition, and it appears therein that the dispute respecting it has been adjudicated, and in consequence the tenants in common are in joint possession, the mere denial of the tenancy and right of partition is not enough to require the court to suspend proceedings until another trial of the right of some of the parties to take under the will. Such denial is not persuasive that there is a real dispute. Not having denied the facts averred in the petition for the purpose of awarding the inquest, they are taken as admitted by the appellants. They presented nothing to enable the court to see that they had title to the land, or had adverse possession; a claim to hold the real estate exclusive of the petitioners shows neither title to the whole, nor possession in themselves. They must point out some defect in the petition, or aver their own title or adverse possession, to justify the court to refuse to proceed in the partition.

The ruling of the orphans' court is not inconsistent with the cases cited by the appellants, namely: Lewis v. Pratt, 2 Whart. 81; Law v. Patterson, 1 Watts & S. 184; and McMasters v. Carothers, 1 Pa. 324.

In the first, Lewis averred that the decedent devised the land to him, and that he was seised and had actual possession of said land under the devise, and held the same by virtue thereof. He not only had adverse possession, but prima facie a good title; for the court held that the issue which had been tried, only settled that the decedent died intestate as to his personalty. Both title and adverse possession were properly averred in the answer.

It clearly appeared in Law v. Patterson that Law had adverse possession under claim of title. And in McMasters v. Carothers a part of the land was in the adverse and exclusive possession of Chalfant. Here the facts are different.

The second assignment alleges error in striking off the plea. But the plea was not struck off. The court remarked its defects, and treated it as an answer, for the reason that the rules did not permit filing a plea, overruling it for insufficiency.

The third assignment is to alleged error in proceeding pending the appeal from the award of inquest. It is denied by the appellees that an appeal was entered from that decree. It matters not if there was; for appeal from a decree awarding an inquest does not lie, and the court was not bound to stay partition because of the entry of an unauthorized appeal.

Decree affirmed, and appeal dismissed, at the costs of appellants.

Mason C. RHODES, Exr. of Sidney Bailey, Deceased.

Pension money which has been received by the pensioner and deposited by him with a friend for safe keeping, is subject to attachment in the hands of the depositary for the debts of the pensioner, by attachment execution under the Act of June 16, 1836.

(Argued Feb. 21, Decided April 18, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 17, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Paxson, Trunkey, Sterrett and Clark, JJ.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment for the plaintiff on demurrer to a plea in attachment execution. Affirmed.

Reported below, 2 Pa. C. C. R. 5.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Alton Davis and R. H. Holgate, for plaintiff in error:

A special deposit of money for safe keeping, to be returned identically as received and not its equivalent in value, is not subject to attachment in the hands of the depositary.

Act of June 16, 1836, §§ 22, 23, 35.

Under the last two sections it has been decided that the following are not liable to seizure in the hands of the depositary under an attachment proceeding: goods left with a warehouseman, the depositor paying storage for the same monthly; Lennig's App. 9 W. N. C. 503; horses and carriages left with a livery stable keeper; Buckner v. Croissant, 3 Phila. 219; Hall v. Filter Mfg. Co. 32 Legal Int. 420; S. C. 2 W. N. C. 154; contents of a safe in a safe deposit company's vaults; Gregg v. Hilson, 8 Phila. 91; goods deposited in a store; Good v. Obertauffer, 1 Troubat & H. Pr. p. 947.

The reason assigned is that the goods must be actually pawned or pledged for a debt or liability of the defendant, and that the bailee must have some other interest in the goods than a lien for their keeping.

For a like reason the clause "deposits of money," in the twenty-second and thirty-fifth sections of the Act must be construed to mean a deposit where the depositary becomes the debtor of the depositor, and can only be relieved from civil liability by repayment of the amount received to the depositor.

Any other construction would make a new contract of the bailment. A mere depositary being only answerable for ordinary care would only be liable for the loss, theft or destruction of the money received by him, occasioned by his gross negligence. If such a deposit is subject to attachment in his hands, then, immediately upon the service of the attachment, the depositary would become liable for the value of the money so attached in his hands, although subsequently lost, stolen or destroyed without any negligence on his part, and notwithstanding he may have kept it with the greatest care. Nor can he relieve himself from this liability in any manner. He cannot pay it to the defendant, because prohibited by the attachment; he cannot pay it to the attaching creditor, because the defendant may have a valid defense; he can only hold it, and hold it insuring its safe keeping: for if it be decided to belong to the attaching creditor, he must satisfy his debt; but if to the debtor, he must return the identical money received.

Such, however, was not the original contract. The depositary contracted to use ordinary care and only to be answerable for gross negligence. No act of a third party, although done through the medium of legal machinery, can enlarge his undertaking or increase his liability. Again; a special depositary contracting for the safe keeping of a sum of money is liable criminally for its conversion to his own use, while a general depositary is only liable for the debt.

If proper process was issued and money deposited with a naked bailee for safe keeping, to be returned as received, is subject to attachment, the present money is not attachable, being the identical money paid to defendant below as a pension by the United States.

Section 4747, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides as follows: "No sum of money due or to become due to any pensioner shall be liable to attachment, levy or seizure by or under any legal or equitable process whatever, whether the same remains with the pension office or any officer or agent thereof, or is in course of transmission to the pensioner entitled thereto, but shall inure wholly to the benefit of such pensioner."

Subsequent enactments of the United States clearly show that it is the intention of the United States in awarding pensions to award them for the use, maintenance and support of the pensioner, free and protected from seizure for any previous debts of the pensioner and from the assignments or pledges extorted from the pensioner by importunities or by his necessities.

The courts of common pleas of this State, where the question has arisen, have, so far as evidenced by reported cases, uniformly held that pension money in the possession of the pensioner is exempt from seizure.

Moore v. Marsh, 16 W. N. C. 239; Clark v. Ingraham, 39 Legal Int. 393; Blood v. Taylor, 2 Chester Co. Rep. 493.

The following cases, frequently cited as establishing the contrary doctrine, are not in point.

In Hadsall v. Clark, 2 Chester Co. Rep. 493, cattle bought with pension money having been seized and sold under execution, the defendant brought trespass against the sheriff, but the court, while holding that the sheriff was not liable, said: "Whether the section (4747) should be construed as protecting pension money from seizure after it comes into the hands of the pensioner * * * it is not necessary that we should decide."

In Minnick v. McDonald, 1 Pa. C. C. Rep. 191, pension money deposited in a bank, all used by pensioner except $300, for which the bank gave a negotiable interest bearing certificate, was held attachable because "When the fund was deposited in bank and the certificate taken it had lost its distinctive character. The bank was the debtor of the defendant."

In McCalla v. Brennan, 14 W. N. C. 513, a pension draft was deposited in bank and cash credit given therefor, and checks were drawn against the fund. An attachment execution issued, was served on the garnishee but not on the defendant, and after judgment against the garnishee, payment by the garnishee and satisfaction of judgment, on a rule taken by the defendant to open judgment, it was held that the judgment having been marked satisfied could not be disturbed. There the pensioner had received his pension money, loaned it to the bank as a general deposit and drawn checks against it, and in the language of Minnick v. McDonald, "It had become a debt due from the bank."

All of these cases decide simply that after pension money has been received and the pensioner has converted the same into other property, invested the same at interest, or taken other securities for it, the proceeds are subject to legal seizure.

Pension money in the possession of the pensioner is not attachable.

Folschow v. Werner, 51 Wis. 85; Eckert v. McKee, 9 Bush (Ky.) 355; Burgett v. Fancher, 35 Hun (N. Y.) 647; Stockwell v. Nat. Bk. of Malone, 36 Hun (N. Y.) 583.

Kellogg v. Waite, 12 Allen, 530, was begun before the passage of the Act of 1866, which was subsequently re-enacted without change in the Revised Statutes as section 4747; the only Act then applicable to the attachment of pension money being, as stated by Judge Hoar, the Act of 1838, which only applied to pensions granted by that Act, and the ruling of the court was: "It seems when this pension was paid to the agent, who is now summoned as trustee, there was no provision of law to exempt it from attachment."

In Spelman v. Aldrich, 126 Mass. 113, the pension money was deposited in a bank to the credit of the wife.

In State, Jardain, v. Fairton Sav. Fund Asso. 44 N. J. 376, money was deposited in bank subject to check; in Cranz v. White, 27 Kan. 319, it was deposited with other money in bank and from time to time drawn against by check before attachment.

The case of Friend v. Garcelon, 77 Maine, 25, does contain the doctrine claimed for it, pure and simple, viz.: that although the pensioner is protected from having his money seized until it gets into his actual possession, yet as soon as he gets it, he can have no benefit from it. It can be immediately seized and taken away from him.

Messrs. Harding & Frear, for defendant in error:

The demurrer to the defendant's plea admitted the facts set forth in the plea, but did not admit the argument contained in the plea: that there was not a deposit of money.

Armstrong v. Comrs. of Allegheny Co. 37 Pa. 280.

Under the thirty-fifth section of the Act of June 16, 1836, there are three occasions for attachment execution: 1, in the case of a debt due to defendant; 2, when defendant has deposited money; and 3, when goods or chattels are pawned, pledged or demised. It is not necessary that money should be pawned, pledged or demised to make it subject to attachment process.

The cases relied on by counsel for plaintiff in error, viz.: Lennig's App. 9 W. N. C. 508; Buckner v. Croissant, 3 Phila. 219; Gregg v. Hilson, 8 Phila. 91, and Good v. Obertauffer, 1 Troubat & H. Pr. p. 947, N. 10, are not in point, because they are cases of goods pawned or pledged and not of money deposited.

A deposit is a naked bailment of goods, to be kept for the bailor without recompense, and to be returned when the bailor shall require it.

Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dic. p. 375.

The half pay of an officer of the government is not liable to be taken by his creditors; but when the pay has reached the beneficiary and lost its distinctive character it is to be governed by the direction of the law.

Elwyn's App. 67 Pa. 367.

Section 4747, R. S. U. S. reads as follows: "No sums of money due or to become due to any pensioner shall be liable to attachment, levy or seizure, by or under any legal or equitable process whatever, whether the same remains with the pension office, or any officer or agent thereof, or is in course of transmission to the pensioner entitled thereto, but shall inure wholly to the benefit of such pensioner."

The language of the Act limits its operation to the time when the money is received by the pensioner. Why should it be strained by construction to operate after it reaches its destination? The object of the statute is to give the pensioner full control and possession of his pension. When this is secured to him the protection ceases. The argument, once pension money always pension money, is not a good one.

Congress cannot control the pension money after it has reached the beneficiary; he can pay his debts with it if he so wishes, or he can keep it in his pocket out of the reach of his creditors; but if he puts it within the reach of his creditors, it rests on no different footing than money earned by labor for his neighbor. The term pension money means money in the control of the government which is due a pensioner. Its character of pension money ceases when it reaches the pensioner.

"The question is whether this provision furnishes any protection to or exemption of the money after it comes into the pensioner's hands. A careful examination inclines us to the conclusion that it does not. The meaning of the section seems to be that the protection is extended so long as the money remains in the pension office, or its agencies, or is in course of transmission to the pensioner. It is money due or to become due, and not money collected that is protected by the law."

Friend v. Garcelon, 77 Maine, 251.

Pension money is not protected by the statute, after it reaches the hands of the pensioner.

Triplet v. Graham, 58 Iowa, 136; Webb v. Holt, 57 Iowa, 712; State, Jardain, v. Fairton Saving Fund Asso. 44 N. J. Law, 376: Spelman v. Aldrich, 126 Mass. 113; Cranz v. White, 27 Kan. 319; Kellogg v. Waite, 12 Allen, 530.

The New York cases of Burgett v. Fancher, 35 Hun, 647, and Stockwell v. Nat. Bank of Malone, 36 Hun, 583, relied upon by plaintiff's counsel were decided under the New York Code.

Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the court:

On the first day of May, 1885, Mason C. Rhodes, executor of the last will and testament of Sidney Bailey, deceased, entered a judgment in the Court of Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, against Eben Rozelle, for debt, $100 with interest and costs; on the next day he issued an attachment execution thereon, with clause of scire facias to Isaac F. Tillinghast, garnishee. The writ was served on the defendant, and all debts, deposits, etc., due or owing the defendant in the hands of the garnishee, were levied and attached in satisfaction of the judgment.

On June 27, 1885, the defendant filed a special plea, in substance as follows: that the defendant has no money, goods, effects, or merchandise in the hands of Tillinghast, the garnishee, except the sum of $800, which he received from the United States, as a pension for the loss of his son, while in the military service of the Government, during the War of the Rebellion; that the money attached is the identical money so received, and that it is in the hands of the garnishee for safe keeping only; that it is not held by the garnishee as a pledge, pawn, loan or deposit to be returned in kind, or in gold, silver or legal tender money of like amount, but in the identical money left in his custody.

The defendant's contention is, first, that the money is not subject to seizure in any form of legal procedure; and second, that if it is liable to be taken in execution for the defendant's debts in any form, it is not subject to seizure on an attachment execution. The answer of the garnishee is to the same effect, and the questions for consideration here are raised upon a rule to show cause why judgment should not be entered against the garnishee on his answers, and upon a demurrer to the defendant's plea.

The defendant, after issue joined on the demurrer without leave, added the pleas of nil debet, payment with leave, etc.; but the cause was disposed of in the court below, and argued here, solely upon the demurrer.

Is the money subject to seizure for the debts of the defendant under legal process in any form? Section 4747 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides as follows: "No sum of money due or to become due to any pensioner shall be liable to attachment, levy or seizure, by or under any legal or equitable process whatever, whether the same remains with the pension office, or any officer or agent thereof, or is in course of transmission to the pensioner entitled thereto, but shall inure wholly to the benefit of such pensioner."

The money which is exempted from legal seizure, under this section, it will be observed, is particularly designated; it is "any sum of money due or to become due to any pensioner." This refers of course, to money due or becoming due from the pension department; it is not pretended that the language of the statute can have any wider application than this. The further provision is that such money shall not be liable to levy or seizure, under any process in law or equity, "whether it remains with the pension office or any officer or agent thereof." It is very plain that the $800, in the hands of Tillinghast is not "money due or to become due" from the pension department; nor is it money which "remains in the pension office, or in the hands of any officer or agent thereof."

It is money, which, some time previous to the attachment, had been paid to the pensioner, and which when paid to him "inured wholly to his benefit;" it was his money, he could dispose of it as he pleased.

The exemption provided by the statute, upon any fair and reasonable construction, will only protect the fund while in course of transmission to the pensioner; after that it is liable to seizure as other money. Some analogy was intended, we think, to the rule of law which prevails as to the fees and salaries of public officers, which, as long as they maintain their distinctive character, have always been held not liable to be taken by creditors, under any form of process, by levy, sale, attachment, or sequestration. Davis v. Duke of Marlborough. 1 Swans. 79; Rundle v. Scheetz, 2 Miles, 330; Hutchinson v. Gormley, 48 Pa. 270.

Therefore in Elwyn's Appeal, 67 Pa. 367, the half pay of an officer of the Government was held not to be liable to seizure by creditors; but when it had actually reached the beneficiary, and had lost its distinctive character, when as money it was in a proper sense a distributable fund, lying in the hands of the law, it was held to be governed by the direction of the law.

The precise question, it is true, is one of first impression in Pennsylvania, no case which rules it having been brought to our notice.

In Friend v. Garcelon, 77 Maine, 25, however, the exact question has been fully considered and decided. Chief Justice Peters, of the Supreme Judicial Court, in passing upon this point, says: "The question is whether this provision furnishes any protection to, or exemption of, the money, after it comes into the pensioner's hands. A careful examination inclines us to the conclusion that it does not. The meaning of the section seems to be that the protection is extended, so long as the money remains in the pension office, or its agencies or is in course of transmission to the pensioner; it is money due or to become due that is protected by the law."

Spelman v. Aldrich, 126 Mass. 118; Cavanaugh v. Smith, 84 Ind. 380; Faurote v. Carr, (Ind.) 6 West. Rep. 281; State, Jardain, v. Fairton Sav. Fund & Bldg. Asso. 44 N. J. Law, 376; and Cranz v. White, 27 Kan. 819, although differing in some respects from the facts of this case, are substantially to the same effect.

But, assuming that the money was liable to seizure, to satisfy the defendant's debts, was it the proper subject of an attachment execution, so that Tillinghast might be charged as a garnishee? It is contended that "deposits of money," in the twenty-second and thirty-fifth sections of the Act of June 16, 1836, must, in analogy to the principle announced in Lennig's Appeal, 9 W. N. C. 503, be construed to be such as constitute the relation of debtor and creditor, between the depositary and the depositor. In order to have a complete understanding of this question, a reference to the provisions of the Act of 1836 becomes necessary.

Prior to 1836 the goods and chattels, lands and tenements only, of the defendant were liable to be taken in execution upon a judgment; stocks in incorporated companies held by him, it is true, were made liable to seizure and sale under the Act of March 29, 1819. With this exception, however, the general provision of the law was as stated.

By the twenty-second section of the Act of 1836, however, it is provided that in addition to stocks owned by the defendant in any body corporate, "deposits of money, belonging to him, in any bank or with any person or body corporate or politic, and debts due to him, shall be liable, like other goods and chattels, subject to all lawful claims," etc.; and by the twenty-third section, "goods, or chattels pawned or pledged by the defendant, as security for any debt or liability, or which have been demised, or in any manner delivered or bailed for a term," are declared to be "liable to sale upon execution, as aforesaid, subject nevertheless," etc.

The thirty-fifth section of the same Act provides, however, that in the case of a debt due to the defendant, or of a deposit of money made by him, or of goods and chattels, pawned, pledged or demised, as aforesaid, the same may be attached and levied, in satisfaction of the judgment, in the manner allowed in the case of a foreign attachment; in which case the writ shall contain a clause of scire facias to the garnishee, etc. See Wray v. Tammany, 13 Pa. 394; Gochenaur v. Hostetter, 18 Pa. 414; Strouse v. Becker, 44 Pa. 206.

While, therefore, all the goods and chattels of the defendant, whether they have been previously "pawned, pledged or demised, as aforesaid," or not, are liable to seizure and sale on execution under a fi. fa., it is only such goods and chattels as have been "pawned or pledged by the defendant, as a security for a debt or liability, or which have been demised or in some manner delivered or bailed for a term," that are liable to an attachment execution; the party in whose possession the goods are must have such a title or interest therein that they cannot be taken from him. Lennig's App. 9 W. N. C. 508.

But there is no restriction in the thirty-fifth section to any particular kind or class of debts due, or deposits of money made by the defendant; that section applies in the most general terms to all debts and deposits; and while the twenty-second section provides that such debts and deposits shall be liable, like other goods and chattels, the thirty-fifth section, as was said by Mr Justice Woodward, in Reed v. Penrose, 36 Pa. 239, prescribes that the manner of levying and seizing all such credits and choses in action shall be like that allowed in foreign attachment.

It may be conceded, perhaps, that if the money which Rozelle deposited with Tillinghast had been in the view of the sheriff, and within his power, he might, upon a fieri facias, have taken of it, to the amount of his writ; but the money, it must be conceded, was a deposit with Tillinghast; and even if liable to levy upon a fi. fa. it was also liable to an attachment in execution in his hands.

In disposing of the rule and the demurrer we must of course assume the truth of the facts which the defendant and the garnishee have set forth in the plea and answer, respectively; but we are not bound to accept their legal conclusions. A deposit, properly so called, is a naked bailment, and exists where one of the contracting parties gives something to the other to keep, who is to do so gratuitously and obliges himself to return it, in individuo, when he shall be requested. When one deposits money with another for safe keeping, the latter to return not the specific money, but an equal sum, the transaction is also called a deposit, but it is an irregular deposit. Bouvier, Law Dict. Deposit.

Now the transaction between Rozelle and Tillinghast was undoubtedly a deposit of money, plain and simple; the money was left with Tillinghast for safe keeping, to be returned, not in money of like amount, but in the identical money deposited; and it is of no consequence that the garnishee in his answer, and the defendant in his plea, deny that it was a deposit, as by the admitted facts it was plainly nothing else.

It is true that a depositary is held to the exercise of ordinary care only; but when he becomes the depositary of a fund, he assumes that relation under the law as it exists, and thereby subjects himself to the chances that it may be attached in his hands for the depositor's debts; and if he thereby incurs a larger measure of responsibility, it is but the legitimate consequence of his own voluntary act.

Upon a careful examination of the whole case, we find no error in this record, and the judgment is affirmed.

Error to the Common Pleas of Carbon County, to review a judgment for the defendants in a case stated. Affirmed.

The case stated was as follows:

That Charles Albright died at his residence in the Borough of Mauch Chunk, County of Carbon, State of Pennsylvania, on the 28th day of September, A. D., 1880, leaving to survive him his wife, Naomi E. Albright, and that in his last will and testament, dated the 18th day of September, A. D., 1880, among other bequests made the following:

Fifth. "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife my law library for and during her natural life, and after her death to the Carbon County Law Library, its successors and assigns."

That said Naomi E. Albright, wife of Charles Albright, deceased, died November 9, A. D., 1884.

The Carbon County Law Library was established by Act of Assembly, approved the 9th day of April, A. D., 1868, P. L. 776, a copy of which Act is hereto attached (marked A) and made a part of this case.

If the court should be of the opinion that the Carbon County Law Library has no such existence under the Act of Assembly hereinafter cited (marked A) as would entitle it to take under the clause of said will above cited, or that the bequest to the Carbon County Law Library, contained in the clause of the will of Charles Albright, deceased, above cited is void under the provisions of section 2 of the Act of Assembly, approved the 26th day of April, A. D., 1885, P. L. 332, a copy of which section is hereto attached (marked B) and made a part of this case; and that said Library is the property of the estate of Charles Albright, deceased, then judgment to be entered for the defendants in this case; but if the court should be of the opinion that said bequest is not void, and that said Library is the property of the Carbon County Law Library, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs in this case, the costs to follow the judgment and both parties reserving the right to sue out a writ of error thereon.

A. No. 720. 1868, P. L. 776.

An Act relative to the establishment of a Law Library in the County of Carbon.

Section 1. Be it enacted, By the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that all fines, amercements and penalties imposed by the courts of Carbon County, and all recognizances declared forfeited by said courts, which under the existing laws are not payable to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for its own use are hereby directed to be paid to the committee hereinafter named for the establishment and maintenance of a law library, to be kept in the court house of the said county, for the use of the Court and Bar thereof.

Provided, however, That the provisions of this Act shall not extend to any moneys which, under existing laws, are payable to the public school fund or funds for school purposes.

And provided further, That this Act shall not be construed to impair or affect any claim for costs or for damages to which any person may, under existing laws, be entitled to out of such forfeited recognizances for injuries sustained by such person by the commission of the crime or misdemeanor, on account of which such recognizances may have been given.

Section 2. The money thus arising shall be expended from time to time under the direction of a committee composed of three resident members of the Bar of said county to be appointed by the court of common pleas of said county, at the next term immediately after the passage of this Act; said committee to continue until the next succeeding first day of January, and the said court shall annually, at the last term of said court in each year, appoint said committee to serve from the first day of January then ensuing for one year, or until their successors are chosen; Provided, That said court shall have the power to fill any vacancy which may occur in said committee by reason of death or otherwise.

Section 3. The said court shall from time to time adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the proper use and preservation of said library, and shall require said committee annually, at the last term of said court in each year, as well as at other times, when it may be deemed expedient to present to the court a detailed account in writing of their doings, showing the condition of the library, number of volumes and such other information as may be required, together with a statement of all moneys received or expended by them during the year, which report shall be inspected by the court and remain open to exceptions until the first day of January then next ensuing, after which, if no exceptions are filed, the same shall be filed away among the archives of said library, and all funds and property belonging to said library in the hands of said committee shall be immediately handed over to their successors, which duty may be enforced in case of default by attachment or otherwise as the court may direct.

Section 4. The county commissioners of said county are required, as soon as practicable, to designate a room in the court house of said county for said library, from which the books of said library shall not be removed, except by order of the court in term time, or in accordance with the rules and regulations adopted as above directed; and the clerk of the court of quarter sessions is required to prepare within ten days after the close of each term of said court, two certified lists of all recognizances forfeited during said term, one of which lists he shall deliver to the committee aforesaid and the other to the district attorney of said county; and it shall be the duty of said district attorney to proceed forthwith to collect the amounts thereof and pay the same to the said committee.

Section 5. All laws inconsistent herewith be, and the same are, hereby repealed.

Elisha W. Davis, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

James L. Graham, Speaker of the Senate.

B. No. 347. 1855, P. L. 332.

An Act relating to corporations and to estates held for corporate, religious and charitable uses.

Section II. That no estate, real or personal, shall hereafter be bequeathed, devised or conveyed to any body politic, or to any person in trust for any religious or charitable uses, except the same be done by deed or will, attested by two credible, and at the same time, disinterested witnesses, at least one calendar month before the decease of the testator or alienor; and all dispositions of property contrary thereto shall be void, and go to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin or heirs according to law; Provided, That any disposition of property within said period bona fide, made for a fair, valuable consideration shall not be thereby avoided.

Approved, the 26th day of April, A. D., 1855.
James Pollock.

The court entered judgment for the defendants, and this was assigned as error.

Messrs. Allen Craig, Frederick Berto-

lette, and L. H. Barber, for plaintiffs in error:

The Act of Assembly establishing the Carbon County Law Library creates a corporation or body politic. "There are some persons and associations, who have a corporate capacity only for particular, specified ends, but who can in that capacity sue and be sued as an artificial person. These bodies are termed quasi corporations. Yet, as it is not essential to a corporation that it should be vested with all the usual powers of corporations, but only that it should be clothed with perpetual succession and be recognized by the law as an artificial person, such bodies are really corporations."

Sharswood's Bl. Com. Bk. 1, Vol. p. 1. 469, note 1.

When it manifestly appeared from the different clauses of several local Acts of Parliament that conservators of a river navigation should take land by succession and not by inheritance, although they were not created a corporation by express words they were so by implication; and that being so, they were entitled to sue in their corporate name.

Conservators of River Tone v. Ash, 10 Barn. & C. 349.

A corporation is a legal institution, devised to confer upon the individuals of which it is composed, powers, privileges, and immunities which they would not otherwise possess, the most important of which are continuous legal identity and perpetual or indefinite succession under the corporate name, notwithstanding successive changes by death or otherwise in the corporators or members of the corporation.

1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 91.

In the creating of a corporation the law does not seem to require any set form of words to be made use of, as incorporo, fundo, erigo, etc., but any words equivalent will be sufficient.

2 Bac. Abr. p. 438.

If the King grants lands to the men or inhabitants of D. hæredibus et successoribus suis rendering rent for anything touching these lands, this is a corporation but not to other purposes.

2 Bac. Abr. p. 439.

A legislative Act which authorizes the judges of a particular court to take bonds to themselves in their official capacity, held to confer on them as to such bonds a corporate character.

Abb. Dig. Corp. p. 364, § 92.

There is no particular form of words requisite to create a corporation. A grant to a body of men to hold mercantile meetings has been held to confer a corporate capacity. A grant of lands to a county or hundreds, rendering rent, would create them a corporation for that single intent, without saying, to them and their successors.

2 Kent, Com. p. 276, 11th ed. 320; Denton v. Jackson, 2 Johns. Ch. 325.

A corporation is an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law. Being the mere creature of law, it possesses only those properties which the charter of its own creation confers upon it, either expressly or incidental to its very existence. These are such as are supposed best calculated to effect the object for which it was created. Among the most important are immortality and, if the expression may be allowed, individuality; properties by which a perpetual succession of many persons are considered as the same, and may act as a single individual.

Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 636 (17 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 659).

A corporation is a franchise, possessed by one or more individuals with the capacity of perpetual succession and of acting as a single individual.

2 Kent, Com. p. *368, 11th ed. 308.

Succession is a corporate franchise, by which property passes from predecessor to successor, as it does from ancestor to heir, by inheritance. Neither are particular words necessary to create the corporation; a public grant of corporate privileges is, per se, an incorporation to give the capacity of enjoyment according to the grant; as, to the inhabitants of a town, to have guildam mercatoriam, which unites them by the franchise and makes them as a natural person for the purpose. And as the only thing for which a charter is necessary is to grant the franchise of succession, its actual enjoyment and exercise is, per se, evidence that it was by lawful and competent authority.

Magill v. Brown, Bright. Rep. 370, 371.

"The King's creation may be performed by the words 'creamus, erigimus, fundamus, incorporamus,' or the like. Nay, it is held that if the king grants to a set of men to have guildam mercatoriam, a mercantile meeting or assembly, this is alone sufficient to incorporate and establish them forever."

1 Bl. Com. p. 474.

The Legislature may create a corporation without requiring conformity to the usual mode of organization known to the common law.

Penobscot Boom Corp. v. Lamson, 33 Am. Dec. 656.

It cannot be questioned that no particular form of words is ever required to constitute a corporation. It was so successfully held in the Case of Sutton's Hospital, 10 Coke, Rep. 30, and is so laid down in Kyd on Corporations; 2 Kent, Com. 27; Roll. abr. title, Corporations, F. 1; Bow v. Allenstown, 69 Am. Dec. 501.

Wherever it is apparent that the intention of the Legislature will be defeated if certain parties are not found to possess corporate powers, they will be held to be created a corporation.

Dyer, 100 A; Russell v. Devon, 2 Term Rep. 672; Stebbins v. Jennings, 10 Pick. 183; North Hempstead v. Hempstead, 2 Wend. 109; Bow v. Allenstown, 69 Am. Dec. 501.

Any body of persons capable of acting as one man, and in a single name fixed by law, having succession, is in some sense a corporation.

Louisville etc. R. R. Co. v. County Ct. 62 Am. Dec. 449.

The Act of Assembly incorporates the Carbon County Law Library by implication. The grant of the Legislature to the Committee of the Law Library and their successors, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a library, evinces such a purpose and imposes such a burden as can only be exercised and carried out in a corporate capacity.

So corporations may exist by implication. If there be granted by the State to individuals such property, rights or franchises, or imposed upon them such burdens, as can only be properly held, enjoyed, continued or borne, according to the terms of the grant, by a corporate entity, the intention to create such corporate entity is to be presumed; and corporate capacity is held to be conferred, so far as is necessary to effectuate the purpose of the grant or burden.

Dyer, 400; Conservators of River Tone v. Ash, 10 Barn. & C. 349; Denton v. Jackson, 2 Johns. Ch. 325; Coburn v. Ellenwood, 4 N. H. 101; Atkinson v. Bemis, 11 N. H. 46; North Hempstead v. Hempstead, 2 Wend. 109; Thomas v. Dakin, 22 Wend. 9; Stebbins v. Jennings, 10 Pick. 188; Cooley's Bl. Com. Bk. 1, 472, note 4.

A corporation may be created by implication without express words of creation. It was held that, as it manifestly appeared that the conservators were to take lands by succession and not by inheritance they were a corporation by implication, although not created so by express words.

2 Bac. Abr. 440; 2 Kent, Com. 270, note E, 12th ed.

Direct words are not necessary to constitute a corporation. Incorporation may arise by necessary implication from the language of a legislative Act.

Mahony v. State Bank, 4 Ark. 620; Murphey v. State Bank, 7 Ark. 57; Abb. Dig. Corp. 363, § 84.

When the Crown grants lands to "the Men of Islington" at a certain rent, this incorporates them, for otherwise the grant could not be fully carried into effect.

Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict. 299.

An Act of the Legislature, which requires the supervisors of a county to erect a portion of a county into a levee district, to exercise corporate powers, makes a levee district so organized by the supervisors a corporation, and a public corporation, even if the Act in terms does not declare it a corporation.

Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406.

Nor is it necessary that the name of the corporation should be expressed in the Act of incorporation; it may implied from the nature of the Act.

The name may not only be expressed in the patent but implied in the nature of the thing. As, if the King should incorporate the inhabitants of Dale with power to choose a mayor annually, although no name be given, yet it is a good corporation by the name of the mayor and commonalty.

Field, Corp. 32, § 24.

When a corporation is created a name is always given to it; or supposing none to be actually given, a name will attach to it by implication; and by that name alone it must sue and be sued and do all legal acts, although a very minute variation therefrom is not material.

1 Potter, Corp. p. 17, § 12.

A corporation may have a name only by implication.

Sharswood's Bl. Com. Bk. 1, 475, note 4.

But although a corporation must have a name, yet that must be understood to be either expressed in the patent, or implied in the nature of the thing.

2 Bac. Abr. p. 441.

The King's creation may be performed by the words, "creamus, erigimus, fundamus, incorporamus," or the like, says Blackstone as already cited. The Act of Assembly creates by the word establish. The definition of fundamus is we found, we establish; of erigimus, we erect, we found.

Andrews & Ainsworth's Lat. Lex.

To establish is defined by Webster and Worcester, to found, to institute. We have, then, in the Act of Assembly the same creative and operative words, necessary, in law, to form a corporation.

The court below not only held that the Carbon County Law Library was not a corporation and incapable of taking the bequest, but it also held that the library and committee thereof, as established by the Act of Assembly, was not such an association of individuals, or entity, as was competent to take the bequest.

"In reviewing the judicial history of this State it is believed that there will be found no decision that an incorporation is necessary to give to any association of individuals the capacity of taking and enjoying an estate in perpetuity, either of the assumed name of the society, or by trustees, for their use."

Magill v. Brown, Bright. Rep. 352.

Our contention is that the Carbon County Law Library is either a corporation, or else a legal entity, or association of individuals directed and governed by a committee, and, in either case, capable of taking the bequest.

Messrs. Freyman & Kiefer, for defendants in error:

By the terms of the case stated the question is brought down to the existence of the plaintiff in error as given to it by the Act just cited. The title of the Act declares that it is "An Act Relative to the Establishment of a Law Library in the County of Carbon." It is not an Act to incorporate.

The first section provides that the fines, etc., are to be paid to a certain Committee "for the establishment and maintenance of a law library, to be kept in the court house of said county, for the use of the Court and Bar thereof." Could a corporation be kept in the court house? Clearly, the library spoken of in the first section is a mere collection of books for the use of the Court and members of the Bar. But it is argued that by the terms of the Act perpetual succession is given to the Committee. But what provision is made for this succession? The court shall appoint, and shall fill vacancies in, said Committee. In corporations of every style and class the succession is regulated by the members or corporators themselves, and not by an outside party.

The affairs of the alleged corporation are not to be controlled by the Committee, as assumed by the plaintiffs in error. The third section of the Act provides for the adoption of rules and regulations by the court. The power of governing its own affairs is one of the fundamental rights of a corporation. It is to act as one person, although composed of many. The many are to speak and act as one. In the regulation of the affairs of the alleged corporation the Committee are powerless, except to expend the funds paid to them, and then only for one specified object, viz.: the purchase of books. And even in this they are acting under the court, and as its agents or officers. The Committee act in all matters relating to the law library, so far as they have power to act, simply as the agents or officers of the court, and must account to the court. All this is repugnant to the idea of a corporation. It cannot be pretended that the court is the corporation; and yet a careful perusal of the Act shows that the court is the governing power to look after the affairs of the law library. It has exclusive control over the same as well as over the committee.

The full control given to the court excludes any presumption that any incorporation was intended, and shows that the intent of the legislative mind was to provide for a collection of law books for the use of the Court and Bar of Carbon County, and for the preservation and care of these books.

It is not necessary that there should be a corporation or body politic in order to accomplish the purposes and objects of the Act; and therefore none can be said to have been created by implication or inference. All the objects of the Act can be attained without the creation of a corporation. The object was the collection and preservation of a lot of law books; and provision is made for the accomplishment of this end. All necessary restrictions and safeguards are thrown around the property when collected; and it does not follow, as in many of the cases cited, that a corporation is to be implied from the necessity of the case. Therefore the cases cited by the counsel for plaintiffs in error have no application to this case.

The Carbon County Law Library has no such legal existence under the Act as to enable it to take under the will.

In Magill v. Brown, Bright, Rep. 347, it is held that a devise to an unincorporated religious association is good, but the decision rests upon the ground that it is a bequest to a charitable use.

Methodist Church v. Remington, 1 Watts, 219; and Witman v. Lex, 17 Serg. & R. 90, are to the same effect.

This bequest can only be sustained, if at all, upon the ground that it is a charitable bequest, and then it is at once met by section 11 of the Act of April 26, 1855, P. L. 332, which declares a bequest to a charity void if the testator died within one calendar month after making his will.

No particular form of benevolence is necessary to constitute a charity. General Albright certainly gave his library to the Carbon County Law Library from motives of charity, intending thereby to benefit the members of the Bar of Carbon County.

In Pickering v. Shotwell, 10 Pa. 27, the devise was of the residue of the testator's estate to "be applied, under the direction of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the northern district, as a fund for the distribution of good books among poor people in the back part of Pennsylvania, to the support of a free school, or institution, in or near Philadelphia." The court after reviewing several decisions says: "In Pennsylvania such a bequest would not be the less charitable, though the books were scientific."

A voluntary association of individuals, who have contributed funds for a public purpose, will be regarded as a charity, and a court of equity in this State has jurisdiction over the parties. Funds supplied by the gift of the Crown, or from the Legislature, or from private gift, for legal, general or public purposes, are charitable funds, to be administered by a court of equity. Therefore, where money is given by will, gift or voluntary contribution of individuals, to a voluntary, unincorporated hose company or fire association formed for general and public usefulness, without individual emolument or advantage, it is a charity over which a court of equity will exercise control. Thomas v. Ellmaker, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 98.

Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon a careful examination of this case, we are of opinion that the legacy created in the will of the late Charles Albright, deceased, in favor of the Carbon County Law Library, could only be sustained as a gift or legacy to charitable uses. The Carbon County Law Library has no corporate existence; it is not even an unincorporated society; it has no membership, no constitution or contract of association, in fact, no organization. The library of books is, of course, a thing inanimate, belonging perhaps to the county, and, as the learned judge of the court below suggests, has no more capacity to receive a legacy or a bequest than the court house itself.

It is unnecessary, however, for us to decide whether or not the objects and purposes of the law library, as contemplated in the Act of April 9, 1868, constitute a charity, for if the testator's provision be a bequest to a charitable use, it is defeated by the Act of April 26, 1855 (P. L. 332), and if not, it is void for want of a proper person to receive it.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROAD IN BENZINGER TOWNSHIP.

In a statutory proceeding for a public road, the court of quarter sessions should either unqualifiedly approve or disapprove the road laid out and returned; it cannot approve a part only.

(Argued Feb. 16, Decided March 21, 1887.)

Certiorari to the Quarter Sessions of Elk County, to review a decree confirming in part a report of viewers laying out a public road. Reversed.

In pursuance of a petition filed by divers inhabitants of the Township of Benzinger, setting forth that they labored under inconvenience for want of a public road or highway to begin in a public road leading from Kaul's Mill to George Reuscher's at a point near Erhardt Gahn's barn and to end in a public road leading from Swissmont to Rathbun at a point near where said road crosses West Creek in said township, the court appointed viewers who duly made a view of the proposed road and reported in favor of opening it.

Exceptions to such report were filed by certain citizens and taxpayers, as follows:

1. That the road is entirely unnecessary and would benefit no one but the owners of a small sawmill on the line of said road, and their employees; that said sawmill will in all probability be abandoned in about two years and the road be of no further use.

2. That there is now a good public road leading from St. Mary's to Swissmont, which answers all purposes of travel and traffic between said points, which said public road is about the same distance between St. Mary's and Swissmont as the proposed road would be.

3. That Benzinger Township is now in debt to the amount of over $8,000 and is unable to raise money to build the roads already granted by your said court, and that the granting of the proposed road would for this, if no other reason, be burdensome to the inhabitants of said township.

Depositions were taken by the parties and after hearing the court made the following order: "Now May 27, 1886, confirmed that the road be opened to a point convenient to the sawmill of Sykes & Caflish and the other part of the road not to be opened until further order of the court. By the Court."

The exceptants took this appeal assigning as error the action of the court in confirming only a part of the report of viewers, and in ordering the road to be opened to an intermediate point, instead of confirming or rejecting the whole.

Mr. Harry Alvan Hall, for appellants:

The distance between the termini of the road laid out as shown by the plot attached to the report of viewers is three miles and 4,585 feet. Situated along the proposed line of the road one mile and 2,831 feet from the eastern terminus at Swissmont is the sawmill of Sykes & Caflish, to which intermediate point the court ordered the road to be opened.

The order is void for uncertainty, if for no other reason, for it does not state from which of the termini the road is to be opened to the sawmill of Sykes & Caflish, and consequently it does not appear which end of the road the court intended to open.

The real intention of the order, however, is evidently to grant only a part of the road and to make Sykes & Caflish's mill one of the termini, thereby altering the road laid out by the viewers very materially by curtailing it about one half. This the court had no power to do.

Road from Herr's Mill, 14 Serg. & R. 204.

The viewers had no notice of the proposed alteration.

It will be contended that the order of the court was a confirmation of the whole report, and that the portion which refers to the opening of the road was only an exercise of judicial discretion as to how far the road should be opened at this time. The court has no such discretion. The only discretionary power vested in the court regards the confirmation or rejection of the report of viewers; when that is done discretion is at an end.

After an approval of the report of viewers and an order fixing the width of the road the judicial functions of the court have terminated. The court in making an order to open acts merely in a ministerial capacity which could equally well be exercised by the clerk of the courts.

Road to Ewing's Mill, 32 Pa. 282.

The clerk of the court has the same power to issue an order to open that the court has. It will scarcely be contended that the clerk could exercise any discretion in regard to how much of the road should be opened.

The court cannot designate an intermediate point in an order to viewers.

McConnell's Mill Road, 32 Pa. 285; Road in Lower Merion Township, 58 Pa. 66.

Mr. Walter W. Ames, for appellees:

By the last portion of its order, the court intended to restrict the expenditures in opening the road, for the time being, by keeping it under its control; the court was only exercising judicial discretion as to how far the road should be opened at this time. There was no intention to change the termini; these things are shown by the order, which, after stating to what point it should be opened adds, "and the other part of the road not to be opened until further order of this court."

But objection is made that the order is uncertain in not stating which end of the road should be opened; there is little ground for discussion here, as the report states where the road commences and where it ends; and in the absence of other designation it is easily seen that the intention was to open the road from the starting point to Sykes & Caflish's mill.

The appellees do not contend that the court has a right to designate intermediate points in the order to view; it was not done in this case; hence, McConnell's Mill Road, 32 Pa. 285, and Road in Lower Merion Township, 58 Pa. 66, do not apply.

In the Road to Ewing's Mill, 32 Pa. 282, cited by appellant, the court did enunciate the principle that is contended for in this case, in terms applied to the facts in the case then under consideration, that where the report was filed, confirmed and the road ordered opened a certain width, without exceptions, the judicial functions of the court have terminated; but where exceptions are filed within the time required, the court must, necessarily, adjudicate.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

The exceptions filed by the supervisors of the township had so much merit that instead of simply approving the road as laid out by the viewers, the court confirmed "that the road be opened to a point convenient to the sawmill of Sykes & Caflish, and the other part of the road not to be opened until the further order of the court."

It is suggested by the petitioners that all after the word "confirmed" may be treated as surplusage. But this should not be done in the statutory proceeding for a public road. The court should either unqualifiedly approve or disapprove the road laid out and returned. Unless satisfied of the necessity for the road under the circumstances, the court may refuse approval, notwithstanding the favorable report of the viewers.

After a public road has been laid out, approved and entered on record, the duty of the supervisors begins, which duty is prescribed by the statute. It is not in the province of the court to condition the approval by an order to open an indefinite part convenient to a sawmill, and forbid the opening of the other part until further order. Such a conditioned approval evidences that the court was of opinion that there was no present necessity for the road as laid out. The court cannot approve a part only. If this order be held valid, it is neither more nor less than approval of a part; the order to open the other part may never be made.

The entire road, in the opinion of the court, may be unnecessary; and in that case it matters not that the court should believe a fraction of it necessary, for the road must be considered as a whole.

The order of confirmation, dated May 27, 1886, is reversed.

Thomas JAMES' APPEAL.

To sustain an order for the support of minor grandchildren under the Acts of June 13, 1836, and April 15, 1857, the record must be regular in form and must show that the quarter sessions had jurisdiction of the party and the subject matter.

2. The court of quarter sessions has no power to entertain the petition or make the order, unless the petition is by some one having an interest in the support of the poor person.
3. An order for support under these Acts cannot be enforced by attachment.

(Argued April 6, Decided April 18, 1887.)

JULY Term, 1886, No. 190, E. D., before Mercur, Ch. J., Gordon, Trunkey, Sterrett, Green and Clark, JJ.

Certiorari sur appeal from an order of the Quarter Sessions of Philadelphia County, to review an order of support. Reversed.

The facts as they appeared from the record were as follows:

This was a proceeding in the court below to compel Thomas James to support Henrietta and Lizzie James, aged respectively sixteen and thirteen years, on the allegation that they were poor and unable to work, and that he was their grandfather. One Jane Dubois, in no way related to any of these persons or liable for their maintenance, made affidavit, June 29, 1885, that Henrietta James was fifteen, Lizzie twelve, were poor and unable to work, and that they had a grandfather John James, who was able to support them, but would not; whereupon, a citation issued, which, upon hearing, was dismissed by the court, July 17, 1883.

On September 20, 1885, Jane Dubois again made her affidavit that Henrietta James was sixteen, Lizzie thirteen, poor and unable to work, and had a grandfather, Thomas James, able to support them; whereupon, a citation issued to him September 30, 1885, to appear on October 2, 1885, in the Court of Quarter Sessions of Philadelphia to show cause why he should not support them.

On October 2, 1885, an order was made by the court on Thomas James, to pay for the support of Henrietta, and Lizzie James, "to each the sum of $3 per week during their minority, and that he enter security in the sum of $1,000 for the faithful performance of this order."

Thomas James not complying with the order of the court, the said Jane Dubois again made affidavit to the fact of noncompliance; whereupon, the court ordered an attachment to issue, commanding him to pay, and that he stand committed until the same shall be fully paid and complied with.

On June 16, 1886, the court granted a rule to show cause why the order of court, made October 2, 1885, should not be set aside and revoked, which is still pending and undetermined.

These children, at the time said order was made, were not, nor have they ever been nor are they likely to become, a charge upon the City of Philadelphia, as Henrietta, aged eighteen, died in January, 1887, and Lizzie, aged fifteen, has been employed constantly, and has earned and is earning $4 to $5 per week.

On July 19, 1886, certiorari issued to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the County of Philadelphia, returnable to the first Monday of January, 1887.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in entertaining the cause, in making the order for support and in directing the attachment to issue.

Mr. J. Rich Grier, for appellant:

The proceeding in the court below, from its inception to its conclusion, to be legal, must be founded upon and executed under the provisions of the Act of June 13, 1836, Pamph. L. 539 to 551, the fifth and sixth sections of which provide that "application must first be made to the overseers of the poor, for support and maintenance, and no person shall be entered on the poor book of any district or receive relief from any overseers before such person, or some one in his behalf, shall have procured an order from two magistrates of the county for the same;" and by the twenty-eighth section it is provided that "The father and grandfather, the mother and grandmother, the children and grandchildren of every poor person not able to work, shall, at their own charge, being of sufficient ability, relieve and maintain such poor person at such rate as the court of quarter sessions of the county shall order and direct, on pain of forfeiting a sum not exceeding $20 per month, should they fail therein, which shall be levied by the process of the said court, and applied to the relief and maintenance of such poor person."

In this case no application was made to the overseers of the poor by the poor person; no order procured, and no petition presented or complaint made to the court by the overseers, by the father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, children or grandchildren, in behalf of Henrietta and Lizzie James for support and maintenance; and all of the proceedings were without authority of law and not according to law; therefore, the order of the court should not have been made.

The court below was not justified in making the order on appellant "to enter security in the sum of $1,000, for the faithful performance of this order," for there is no such authority given the court by any of the provisions of the Act.

Dierkes v. Philadelphia, 93 Pa. 270.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding under the Act of June

13, 1836, and its Supplement of April 15, 1857, P. L. 191, to compel Thomas James to pay for the support of two of his minor grandchildren. The court of quarter sessions made the order prayed for. The making of this order and the method of enforcing the payment of the sums directed to be paid present the errors assigned.

As the Act of Assembly does not authorize any appeal in such cases we cannot review the evidence, but are restricted to an examination of the record only. To sustain the order the record must be sufficiently regular in form, and must show that the quarter sessions had jurisdiction of the party and the subject matter.

The twenty-fifth section of the Act of June 13, 1836, does not state in specific language by whom the application may be made. Other parts of the the same Act sufficiently show that when the application is made by the overseers of the poor, an order must first have been obtained from two magistrates of the proper county, directing them to furnish relief to the poor person named. It is to relieve and support such poor person that the aid of the quarter sessions can be invoked. Until the obligation is imposed on the overseers to furnish relief, they have no interest in such poor person as to authorize them to apply to the quarter sessions under the Act of 1836. Any person having no interest could not make the application.

The Supplementary Act of April 15, 1857, modifies the former Act to this extent: it gives to the quarter sessions jurisdiction to make the order or decree, either on the petition of the overseers of the poor or of any other person or persons having an interest in the support of such poor person or persons, and either with or without an order of relief having been first obtained.

The court has no jurisdiction on the application of any person or authority not designated by this Act. Wertz v. Blair County, 66 Pa. 16.

It was held in O'Connor's Appeal, 104 Pa. 437, that a poor person, who came within the Act imposing upon a relative the liability to relieve and support him, might make the application himself; that he had such an interest in himself that he might make the application under the Act of 1857.

The court of quarter sessions has no power or authority to entertain the petition or make the order, unless the petition is by some one having an interest in the support of the poor person. Such an interest is essentially necessary to give the court jurisdiction. The Act is silent as to the kind or extent of the interest. O'Connor's App. supra.

The whole proceeding necessary to give the court jurisdiction is prescribed by the statute. The record must show those facts. In this case they are not shown. There is no averment in the petition that the person making it has any interest in the support of the poor persons named. It follows that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application.

The method attempted for the enforcement of the order is not authorized by the statute. The Act of 1836, and in that respect not changed by the Act of 1857, directs the sum ordered to be paid "shall be levied by the process of the said court," and be applied to the relief and maintenance of such "poor person." Dierkes v. Phila. 93 Pa. 270.

The statute prescribes no other or further remedy for its enforcement. The order, in so far as it directed that Thomas James stand committed until the money be paid, is clear error.

The several assignments of error are, therefore, sustained. Judgment reversed.

5. The modified decree should provide, in such case, for the ascertainment and allowance of the interest claimed by the defendant, and also of the damages claimed by the plaintiff.

(Decided April 26, 1887.)

MOTION to settle form of judgment order. The case on the appeal is reported in 5 Central Reporter, 388.

The facts appear from the opinion.

Mr. Milton A. Fowler, for appellants.

Mr. O. D. M. Baker, for respondent.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was before us on the appeal from the interlocutory judgment, it appeared from the findings that the unpaid portion of the purchase money ($10,500) had been tendered to the executors on the first of March, 1882, and that on their refusal to accept the same and deliver the deed, that sum had been deposited by the plaintiff in the First National Bank of Lowville to the credit of the executors, to be paid to them on the delivery of the deed. There was nothing to show that after that deposit the plaintiff had derived any benefit from the use of the fund, and presumptively it had lain idle and unproductive. Therefore the purchaser was not charged with interest on the purchase money.

It is now shown by affidavits that, shortly after this deposit, the fund was wholly or in part withdrawn from the bank by the plaintiff, and we are now asked to add to the modifications directed in the opinion, a further provision charging the plaintiff with interest on the amount so withdrawn.

If the fact had appeared in the case when before us on appeal, this modification would doubtless have been proper, and even now we might find means to make it, if no other facts were shown on the part of the plaintiff raising a counter equity.

But in opposition to the application of the defendants, the plaintiff presents affidavits showing that during the pendency of this action, in consequence of neglect and mismanagement on the part of the defendants, the ditches on the premises have been allowed to be filled up, the buildings to become dilapidated, the water works to go to decay, the fences to be destroyed, and the value of the property to be thus depreciated to an amount exceeding the interest on the unpaid purchase money.

If these facts had appeared, they undoubtedly would have influenced our judgment in respect to allowing interest upon the purchase money, or making some other provision for compensating the plaintiff for the damages alleged to have been sustained. Where specific performance is decreed the court will, so far as possible, place the parties in the same situation they would have been in if the contract had been performed at the time agreed upon; and by the application of the rule of courts of equity, by which things which ought to have been done are considered as having been done at the proper time, the vendor is regarded as trustee of the land for the benefit of the purchaser, and liable to account to him for the rents and profits, or for the value of the use and occupation, and the purchaser is treated as trustee of the purchase money unpaid, and charged with interest thereon, unless the purchase money has been appropriated and no benefit has accrued from it to the purchaser.

But this is not the only manner which the court has adopted to adjust the equities of the parties. For instance, where the subject of the purchase was a leasehold estate in a mill, and the delay of performance of the contract was attributable to the vendor for his failure to show good right to assign his lease, and dilapidations had occurred, he was charged with the expenses of repairs required to put the mill in tenantable condition, and of those which had been incurred for keeping up the machinery until the purchaser could prudently take possession.

And in Ferguson v. Tadman, 1 Simons, 530, where the estate had deteriorated in value by reason of mismanagement and neglect, during the five years which elapsed between the filing of the bill for specific performance and the decree, the amount of the deterioration, with interest, was ascertained and allowed to the plaintiff out of the purchase money, which had been paid into court.

In Worrall v. Munn, 38 N. Y. 137, these principles were recognized and the vendee, having obtained a decree for specific performance, was allowed the damages sustained during the pendency of the suit by deterioration from waste committed by the defendant during the pendency of the suit.

If the matter should now be opened for the purpose of letting the defendants in to claim interest on the purchase money, it would be no more than just that the same indulgence should be extended to the plaintiff to let him in to prove the damages he claims by reason of deteriorations caused by mismanagement and neglect. These points appear to be the only ones as to which the parties have been unable to agree in settling the form of the judgment.

From the affidavits presented, it would seem that the damages claimed by the plaintiff would about equal the interest claimed by the defendants; but if the judgment below is modified so as to admit the allowance of interest, it should also be modified so as to admit proof of the damages claimed. If the statements in the affidavits are correct, justice would apparently be done by leaving the matter as it is and confining the modifications of the interlocutory judgment to those directed in the original opinion of this court, which appear to be substantially contained in the modified judgment as proposed on the part of the plaintiff. The details, however, are subject to settlement in the supreme court.

But if the defendants desire to insist upon their claim to be allowed interest and to contest the amount of damages resulting from deterioration and mismanagement, the modified judgment should contain provisions referring it to the referee to ascertain what amount of the sum deposited in the bank was withdrawn by the plaintiff, or subject to his control, and for what length of time, and charging him with interest thereon during that time. The amount of deterioration of the property by reason of mismanagement and neglect, between the first of March, 1882, and the time of plaintiff's obtaining possession should also be ascertained and charged, either to the defendants, as executors, or to the defendant Emily P. Beach, as the equities may appear. She certainly has no reason to complain of any loss she may sustain through this litigation, as it appears to have been caused by her persistent refusal to carry out the contract, which, according to the findings of fact, was intelligently entered into by her, and was a fair contract for the full value of the farm and was beneficial to all concerned in the estate. By this unjustifiable refusal on her part all parties have been subjected to damage, and there is no reason why the loss should fall upon the plaintiff who seems to have been always ready to perform his part of the contract.

It is to be hoped that upon the principles here indicated the counsel for the respective parties may be able to agree upon the form of judgment to be entered; otherwise, it may be settled by the supreme court, and the interlocutory judgment may be modified so as to provide for the ascertainment and allowance of the interest claimed by the defendants; and also of the damages claimed by the plaintiff, at the election of the defendants. If the defendant shall not consent to have the damages ascertained and allowed, the application for the allowance of interest is denied.

All concur.

1. The efficacy of a payment to avert the effect of the Statute of Limitations as a bar, resides in the conscious and voluntary act of the debtor, explainable only as a recognition and confession of the existing liability.
2. A payment upon a debt, obtained from the debtor through the pressure of an examination and an order of the court in proceedings supplementary to execution, is not such a payment as will, under the provisions of the statute, revive the promise of third person to pay such debt, such payment not being made by any act or agency of the promisor.
3. Whether or not a payment by such promisor of one half of the debt upon and in consideration of the transfer to him of one half of such debt, was also made and accepted as a payment upon the original promise to be answerable for the whole debt, if not paid by the debtor, was a question of fact for the jury.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Onondaga Circuit on a verdict directed for plaintiffs in an action to recover a balance due upon an alleged loan. Reversed.

This action was brought by Charles C. Blair and John W. Truesdell against Patrick Lynch, December 2, 1879. The complaint alleged the following facts:

1. That plaintiffs were partners engaged in the business of brokers in the City of Syracuse.

2. That on or about January 31, 1873, the defendant, as administrator of Andrew J. Lynch, deceased, held a certain bond and mortgage on a salt lot in the Salt Springs Reservation, dated September 7, 1870, executed by Michael and Patrick Slattery to Andrew J. Lynch to secure the payment of $6,000.

3. That on January 31, 1873, defendant, as such administrator, sold and assigned said bond and mortgage to John O. S. Lynch, who, on March 12 thereafter, assigned the same to J. F. and A. Wilkinson as collateral security for the loan of $2,000.

4. That on July 1, 1873, and while this mortgage was held by the Wilkinsons, the defendant, Patrick Lynch, requested plaintiffs to purchase it for him at the price of $4,000 and agreed to pay a commission therefor of $100. July 15 thereafter John O. S. Lynch applied to plaintiffs for a loan of $3,500 on said bond and mortgage. He declined to sell them absolutely, but would assign them as collateral security for such loan, and give the plaintiffs authority to sell the same without notice to him, if the note which he was to give on such loan was not paid at maturity. The plaintiffs communicated said offer to defendant, who instructed them to make the loan on the security of the bond and mortgage and agreed that if John O. S. Lynch failed to pay the loan, defendant would then take an assignment thereof from plaintiffs and pay them the loan and interest and $100 as commission.

July 19, 1873, in pursuance thereof, plaintiffs loaned $3,500 to John O. S. Lynch, and took assignments of the bond and mortgage from both the Wilkinsons and John O. S. Lynch. The assignment from said Lynch was absolute in form but taken with the understanding that he was at liberty to redeem the same after maturity of the note.

5. That the notes given by John O. S. Lynch were dishonored and on being informed thereof, defendant requested plaintiffs to bring suit in their own name and get the demand into judgment, saying that he would then take an assignment of the mortgage and judgment and pay plaintiffs the amount of the loan and interest, costs of the suit, and $100 commission, as aforesaid.

Action was accordingly brought, and after commencement thereof John O. S. Lynch agreed to allow judgment for the sum of $3,200; and on direction of defendant, the plaintiffs accepted said offer, and judgment was entered accordingly.

6. That after obtaining said judgment, at request of defendant, the plaintiffs examined John O. S. Lynch on supplementary proceedings which were commenced in May, 1874, and continued until July thereafter, and plaintiffs realized on such proceedings, and on direction of defendant applied on the balance due on said purchase or agreement, the following sums: August 31, 1874, $101.74; December 31, 1874, $101.74; August 31, 1875, $101.74; December 31, 1875, $101.74; January 31, 1879, $40.

7. That on November 25, 1873, defendant gave to plaintiffs his promissory note for the sum of $1,800, for six months with interest, being one half of said loan and one half agreed commission, which note was paid at maturity. At the same time defendant promised that he would, before maturity of said note, pay the other half and take a full assignment of said mortgage. At the time of giving the note he took an assignment of one half interest in the mortgage. Defendant has from time to time promised, both before and after examination of John O. S. Lynch, to settle up with plaintiffs and to pay them their loan commissions and interest.

8. That on said property on which the mortgage in question was a lien, there were two prior liens, one for $1,000 and the other for $1,800, which were assumed by Andrew J. Lynch, when he took the mortgage in question, all of which was known to the defendant, but unknown to plaintiffs; that the foreclosure of these prior liens was had at the instance of the defendant, who became a purchaser at the sale thereunder, and by such sale the lien of the mortgage held by plaintiffs was cut off and destroyed.

The defendant's answer admitted the first, second and third allegations of the complaint and denied all the other material allegations, and for a further defense pleaded usury and the Statute of Limitations.

It appeared at the trial from plaintiffs' witnesses that November 5, 1873, when defendant gave the note mentioned in the seventh allegation of the complaint, plaintiffs executed and delivered to defendant the following instrument:

"For and in consideration of the sum of $1,800 this day paid by Patrick Lynch, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, we hereby sell and assign one half of our interest in the above described bond and mortgage, and hereby agree with the said Patrick Lynch to pay over to him one half of all the moneys hereafter collected upon said bond and mortgage, and said Patrick Lynch is the owner of a one half interest in the said bond and mortgage and hereby agrees to pay one half of all expenses incurred in the collection of the same.

Syracuse, November 25, 1873.

Blair & Truesdell."

The plaintiffs, to avoid the Statute of Limitations, relied upon the payments procured through supplementary proceedings in the action against John O. S. Lynch and the payment of the $1,800 as alleged in the seventh paragraph of their complaint. The plaintiffs' evidence tended to support the allegations in their complaint.

The defendant offered no evidence, but after close of plaintiffs' evidence moved for nonsuit, on the ground that the cause of action was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that the alleged agreement is void under the Statute of Frauds. The motion was denied, and defendant then requested that the court submit "as questions of fact upon all the evidence in the case, such matters as the court thinks the case turns upon, one being the question as to whether the defendant employed the plaintiffs to purchase the mortgage for him, and agreed to pay them for the same if they did; and the second being as to whether the mortgage became the property of the defendant by virtue of plaintiffs' purchase of the mortgage from John O. S. Lynch."

Plaintiffs moved for the direction of the verdict for them, because there was no question of fact for the jury, on the ground that "There was no dispute upon the evidence upon the main proposition that Blair and Truesdell, as agents for Patrick Lynch, transacted this business and that he undertook to repay to them the amount of the money." The motion was granted and defendant duly excepted. The jury returned a verdict as directed, and judgment was duly entered thereon.

On appeal to the general term this judgment was affirmed, and defendant appealed to this court.

Mr. Louis Marshall, for appellant:

I. The court below acted upon the theory that because plaintiffs' witness was not disputed by witnesses, his version of the case was undisputed that there was no question except one of law presented by the evidence. This was, however, clearly error, since it is now well settled that a court or jury is not bound to adopt the statements of a witness simply because no other witness has denied them, or the witness is not impeached.

A witness may be contradicted by circumstances as well as by statements of others contrary to his own, or there may be such a degree of improbability in his statements as to deprive them of credit, however positively made, or he may be interested in the question at issue, and have a motive which would impel him to testify falsely. In all such cases, uncontradicted evidence even is to be submitted to the jury, and may be disregarded by it.

Elwood v. Western Union Tel. Co. 45 N. Y. 549; Kavanaugh v. Wilson, 70 N. Y. 177; Gildersleeve v. Landon, 73 N. Y. 609; Koehler v. Adler, 78 N. Y. 287; Wohlfahrt v. Beckert, 92 N. Y. 490: Tolman v. Syracuse R. R. Co. 31 Hun, 397.

II. The agreement alleged in the complaint is void by the Statute of Frauds, for the reason that it is either an agreement on the part of the defendant to answer for the debt of John O. S. Lynch, or the purchase of a chose in action of the value of more than $50, no memorandum of which agreement is in writing.

Talmadge v. Spofford, 9 Jones & S. 428; Belknap v. Bender, 75 N. Y. 446; People v. Beebe, 1 Barb. 379; Hagar v. King, 38 Barb. 200.

III. The plaintiffs' cause of action did not accrue within six years before the commencement of this action, and is therefore barred by the Statute of Limitations.

An action upon a guaranty accrues when an action against the principal debtor accrues; and payments by persons other than the guarantor are ineffectual to save the bar.

McMullen v. Rafferty, 89 N. Y. 456; Douglass v. *Howland, 24 Wend. 35; Morris v. Wadsworth, 17 Wend. 103.

Wood, in his work on "Limitation of Actions," says on page 325: "Where money is paid for another under such circumstances that the law will imply a promise to repay it, and no time is fixed for its repayment, the right of action accrues at once."

Payne v. Gardiner, 29 N. Y. 168.

When money is borrowed and no time for payment is fixed by the contract of loan, the debt is instantly due, and an action may be brought without demand, the bringing of the action being a sufficient demand to entitle the lender to recover. Even if the debt is by the terms of the agreement to be paid on demand, yet no special demand is necessary, the money being due without it.

Norton v. Ellam, 2 Mees. & W. 461; Howland v. Edmonds, 24 N. Y. 307; Wenman v. Mohawk Ins. Co. 13 Wend. 267.

In order to make a money payment a part payment within the statute it must be shown to be a payment of a portion of an admitted debt, and paid to and accepted by the creditor as such, accompanied by circumstances amounting to an absolute and unqualified acknowledgment of more being due, from which a promise may be inferred to pay the remainder.

Wood, Limitation of Actions, § 221; Foster v. Dawber, 6 Wels. Hurlst. & G. 853.

A part payment is thus placed upon the same footing as an acknowledgment.

Bateman v. Pinder, 3 Q. B. N. S. 574.

The following requisites are necessary, in order to give to a part payment the effect of nullifying the Statute of Limitations:

1, The payment must have been made on account of a debt; 2, it must have been made on account of the debt for which the action was brought; 3, it must have been made as a part payment of a greater debt.

Tippets v. Heane, 1 Cromp. Mees. & R. 252.

It follows, therefore, that to avoid the statute a part payment or acknowledgment must not only be made under such circumstances as to amount to the admission of the existence of a liability, but there must also be a recognition of a liability to pay, in such a mode as will authorize the inference of a new promise.

Commercial Mut. Ins. Co. v. Brett, 44 Barb. 489; Allen v. Webster, 15 Wend. 284; Van Keuren v. Parmelee, 2 N. Y. 523; Shoemaker v. Benedict, 11 N. Y. 176; Bloodgood v. Bruen, 8 N. Y. 362; Deyo v. Jones, 19 Wend. 491.

The moneys collected by the plaintiffs from John O. S. Lynch in supplementary proceedings do not constitute payments which destroy the effect of the Statute of Limitations.

The reason of the rule that part payment of a debt enlarges the time within which an action can be brought thereon is that such payment is an acknowledgment by the debtor of his liability for the whole debt; and from this acknowledgment a new promise to pay is implied, dating from the time of the part payment. To bring a case within the reason of the rule the payment must be made by the party to be charged, or by one authorized to make a new promise on his behalf for the residue.

Harper v. Fairley, 53 N. Y. 442.

Upon the same principle it has been held that a payment by one of several joint debtors is not sufficient to revive the demand as against the other.

Van Keuren v. Parmelee, 2 N. Y. 523.

A part payment by a surety does not revive the demand against the principal, unless made at the express request of the principal.

Winchell v. Hicks, 18 N. Y. 558.
